SLAVE COMPENSATION BILL.

The Order of the Day having been read on the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. SPEAKER left the chair, and the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House on this Bill, Mr. BERNAL in the chair.

The first clause was agreed to.

On the second being put, which relates to the Compensation Fund, —

Mr. HUME said: — I wish the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be kind enough to explain the meaning of this clause.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I will tell the Honourable Gentleman the purport of it, in two words. The Slave Compensation Fund was provided for, partly in money and partly in stock. Before the Bill passed, certain claims were paid in money: but there is now a surplus of stock, and a deficiency of money, and the object of this clause is to allow stock to be sold out to supply the deficiency of money. In fact, the clause is intended to remove a technical difficulty which had arisen rather unexpectedly.

Mr. BAINES. — I should like to hear from the Right Honourable Gentleman what proportion of the 20,000,000*l.* voted for the liberation of slaves has been already distributed, and whether any inquiry has been made into the conduct of the masters towards their apprentices; for it should not be forgotten that the proprietors of the slaves are now the masters of the apprentices. I also wish to know whether, if it should turn out that any apprentices have been treated with cruelty by their masters, the Government intend to withhold from such masters the remainder of the sum which Parliament has voted them as compensation?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the Honourable Member for Leeds will refer to the accounts, he will find that they show the precise manner in which the compensation fund has been distributed, and the amount which has been paid to the different planters. As to the other question whic has been put to me by the Honourable Member for Leeds, I have only to observe, that Government has not the power to withhold from the planters any part of the compensation to which they are entitled by Act of Parliament on making good their claims.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — This subject is one which excites great interest throughout the country generally, and especially amongst my own constituents. Indeed, if I may infer what the state of feeling is from the numerous letters which I receive upon the matter from my part of the country, the public is most anxious that justice should be done, not only to the planters, but also to their emancipated apprentices.

SIR GEORGE GREY. — Her Majesty's Government are most anxious to render impartial justice to all the parties interested in this great question. They have always tendered, and are still willing to tender, every information in their power respecting the working of this measure. Not the slightest opposition will be offered by them to the re-appointment of the committee which sat last Session, and they will cheerfully lay before it every document in their possession which is calculated to throw light upon the subject of its investigation.

Mr. BAINES. — I do not know whether I understood the Right Honourable Gentleman correctly, when I understood him to say, that even if the slave owners should violate the compact made between them and the Parliament of this country, the Government would not be entitled to withhold from them any part of the compensation which yet remains unpaid?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I assure the Honourable Member for Leeds, that I can only repeat the answer which I gave him just now. Her Majesty's Government has no power to withhold any part of the compensation money. By law, it belongs to the parties to whom it has been adjudicated, and nothing but an Act of Parliament can take it from them, or authorise the Treasury to withhold the payment of such portion of it as remains due to them.

Mr. BAINES. — A general notion prevails in the country, that the negro apprentices have been exposed, by their masters, to very cruel treatment; and it has in consequence become a matter of ous consideration how the subject may be most effectually brought under the consideration of Parliament. After the enormous sums paid for the liberation of the negroes, Government is bound to see that the contract on the part of the planters be fairly and conscientiously fulfilled. I hope the Government will in some way or other take care that the planters perform their part of the contract, and that they will withhold the compensation yet unpaid from those who have violated that contract, as is stated, contrary to every principle of justice and humanity.

Mr. HUME. — It appears to me that my Honourable Friend the Member for Leeds is bound both in justice to the public who have paid, and in justice to the planters who have received, so large a sum of money by way of compensation, to bring forward, in a specific shape, the charges which he has just made against the good faith and humanity of the planters. Why not bring them at once under the notice of Parliament? I see, from a Report which has appeared in the public journals, that a short time since there was a public meeting held, in London, on this subject, which was attended by no less than nine Members of Parliament. Why have none of them brought before the House the cruelties which were at that meeting alleged to have been perpetrated by the masters upon their apprentices? If they do not like to come foward themselves, let them place their papers in my hands, and I will bring the whole subject under the notice of the House. That is the right and proper course to pursue; and it is neither just nor proper for Honourable Members to be constantly making charges against the planters which the planters are not present to meet, and for which their defamers produce no proofs.

Mr. BAINES. — I do not understand what my Honourable Friend means.

Mr. HUME. — Then I will tell my Honourable Friend the Member for Leeds what I mean. It is alleged that the Acts of the planters towards the negro apprentices are such, that the only way of relieving the latter from the oppression of the former is by making the apprenticeship clause, which is not to terminate till 1840, terminate in August, 1838. Now, if my Honourable Friend the Member for Leeds, or if any other Honourable Member, is cognisant of any individual act of cruelty,—if he really believes in the truth of the statements so directly impugning the conduct of the planters to their apprentices, it is his bounden duty to bring them under the notice of the House. He is also bound to state the names of the particular planters whom he alleges to be guilty of these cruelties, in order that the censure of Parliament and of the public may fall upon those who are really guilty, and may not be directed against those who are innocent. That is the only way in which justice can be done to both sides in this matter.

Mr. BAINES. — In case no other person, of greater weight and influence, shall bring this subject before the House, I will, unquestionably, take it up myself. I hold, that justice should be done as well to the planter as to the negro; for, with my anxiety not to bring any unfounded charge against the planter, is mingled an anxiety to satisfy the negro that he will always, if oppressed, meet with support and protection from Parliament.

The above clause, together with several others, were severally agreed to, with verbal amendments.

House resumed; Bill to be reported on Monday next.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, the Report of this Bill was brought up, and agreed to; and on the motion of the Right Honourable Gentleman that the Bill be ingrossed and read a third time on Monday next, —

Mr. CHALMERS said: — I beg to give notice, that I will, on Monday, move the omission of the fifteenth clause, which transfers to the Consolidated Fund a charge of 10,000*l.* for secret service money, which has hitherto been fixed on the Civil List.

Mr. GROTE. — I beg also to give notice, that I will, on Monday, move the omission of the clauses allowing her Majesty to grant pensions not exceeding 1200*l.* every year, and that I shall take the sense of the House on my motion. I should have done so last night, but for the lateness of the hour at which the debate terminated.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to avail myself of the present opportunity, as the most fitting one, to reply to some remarks which were made last night by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon a statement of absolute facts which I ventured to bring under the consideration of the House; and however much I differ in opinion on most subjects from many Honourable Members, still there can exist no difference between us on matters of figures, and matters of fact. I will therefore generally state now, what I did allege, and I will show how insufficient and unsatisfactory the answer of the Right Honourable Gentleman was. I stated my object distinctly; I declared that that object was, not to continue in the amount of the Civil List the expenses of the two departments of the Lord Chamberlain of the household, and the Lord Steward; at the same time observing, that I did not wish to affect the amount to be granted for the privy purse of 60,000*l.* But, Sir, what I chiefly contended for was this: — that, as we are reducing the salaries in every establishment in the country, as nearly as circumstances will permit, to the level of 1792 (a period before the rise of prices occasioned by the war of the French revolution), we should not be acting fairly by the people if we did not apply the same rule of reduction to the Civil List in all its departments. In order to elucidate my meaning, I showed that the expenses of the Lord Chamberlain's department were in 1792, 47,900*l.*, and that they were, now, 66,400*l.* My Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to that statement, told the House that the salaries in that department, which were formerly 1200*l.*, had been reduced to 900*l.* But if the expense in 1792 was 47,900*l.*, and if it has been increased to 66,400*l.*, in spite of his alleged reduction in the salaries, it is evident that the expenditure of the department has increased since 1792 nearly one half of the amount which it then extended to. And here let me observe, that it has always been a great object to take care that no undue favour should be shown to any public department. Now, what is the fact as to the fees which were paid to those offices? They have been reduced, it is true, but only "reduced." I ask whether it is not a monstrous thing that tradesmen, supplying articles to the royal household, on receiving their appointment, should be compelled to pay heavy fees to the Lord Steward's and the Lord Chamberlain's offices? If these fees are reduced, what will be the result? Why, that the tradesmen who now make an extra charge of five per cent., to enable them to meet these fees, will then be enabled to supply goods at so much less. So far from its being an argument against me, I say the whole statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman was in my favour, and I complain that the Government do not give the public the benefit of these reductions. In the Lord Steward's department the expenditure was, in 1792, 29,153*l.*, and it is, now, 36,381*l.* So, again, in that of the Master of the Horse, the expenditure was, in 1792, 12,700*l.*, and it is, now, 27,600*l.* I have this morning examined the accounts of the four departments of the Lord Chamberlain, of the Lord Steward, of the Master of the Horse, and of the Master of the Robes, for the six years beginning with 1786 and ending with 1792, and I find that the annual expenditure of the four departments for that period was, upon an average, 90,956*l.*, and yet it is now proposed to raise the expenditure of the same four departments to 131,000*l.* and upwards. Thus there is an excess of the Civil List for the present reign above that allowed to the Sovereign between the years 1786 and 1792 of 40,000*l.* odd money. I think that the House ought to pause before it grants such an augmentation to the Civil List for a reign which will last, as I hope, for at least fifty years to come. I would refer to the observations made on a former occasion by the Honourable Member for Liskeard (Mr. Charles Buller), and I would appeal to the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether we ought, in the present enlightened age, to continue the antiquated and useless sinecures which are charged upon the Civil List, and whether they ought not to be swept away, so as to bring back the expenditure to the scale of 1792? Instead of raising the charge 40 per cent., my Right Honourable Friend ought to have reduced it 40 per cent., for the difference between the prices of 1792 and those of the present day is by no means such as to justify the enormous increase which my Right Honourable Friend now proposes to make, more especially after the credit which he has taken for the reduction of salaries in the different departments. When we have made reductions in all other departments of the public expenditure, is it right to leave the Civil List the only department in which reduction is unattainable? The amount of the tradesmen's bills in the departments of the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord High Steward, Master of the Horse, and Master of the Robes, in the years 1786 to 1792 averaged 118,000*l.*; the amount is now to be 172,000*l.*, being an increase of 54,000*l.*, in what I call the tradesmen's bills, in addition to the 40,000*l.* which I have already stated to be the increase in the salaries of those departments. I have taken pains to calculate the increase of prices on all articles since the period of 1792, and the utmost increase which I can discover is from 17½ to 20 per cent.; so that there is nothing to justify this wanton expenditure. In some articles, indeed, the increase is small; in the prices of others a reduction has taken place. When the country reflects on the fact, that out of a House of 400 Members only 22 could be found to vote for my motion last night, it will be convinced that a majority of this House is opposed to the reduction of taxation. I am anxious to effect the reduction of taxation, and my anxiety to do so is much aggravated when I find tens of thousands of poor labourers, living upon 4*s.* 6*d.* a week; and that, in the counties of Dorsetshire and Wiltshire, the labouring men, with families, are living on not more than 8*s.* a week on the average of the whole year. I think her Majesty should be made acquainted with such circumstances. She should study the wants and wishes of her people, and endeavour to live in their affections, instead of suffering her Ministers to wring from them, on her account, the utmost extent of money which the aristocracy in this House may be willing to grant. One half of the officers in the royal household might be dispensed with, as they are not necessary either to the comfort or dignity of the Sovereign, and are only a part of that foolish, empty parade which was exhibited so glaringly during the reign of George IV. For my own part, I cannot endure to see men standing stiff and erect in gold laced liveries. I wish to see nothing but rational reduction made in the Civil List; but I wish that reduction to be made for the sake of her Majesty, and out of consideration for the wants of the people, of whom many are nearly destitute of the common necessaries of life. In 1792, 16,000,000*l.* was the whole amount of annual revenue derived from the people. Now, 50,000,000*l.* are wrung from their hard earnings. In 1792, 5,000,000*l.* covered the whole expenses of the Civil List, of the army, of the navy, of the ordnance, and of the miscellaneous estimates. Now 20,000,000*l.* are required for the same objects. I do not believe that the enormous income settled on her by this Civil List is desired by her Majesty — no, it is only demanded for her by her Ministers; and I therefore complain, on the part of her Majesty, — whose comfort and dignity I am the last man in the world to abridge, and whose hold on the respect and affections of her subjects I am anxious to confirm, and not to weaken,—that her Ministers are endeavouring to fix upon her the obloquy of supporting an immense load of abuses and sinecures in which she has not a particle of interest. Whatever may be the opinion of the House, I feel that I have done my duty in calling its attention to this subject, and I leave Honourable Gentlemen to answer, hereafter, as they best can, to their constituents, for continuing the Civil List on the scale proposed by Ministers, instead of reducing it, as I have recommended, to a corresponding level with every other public establishment.

Mr. FIELDEN.—I should be the last person to oppose any impediment or obstruction to the grant of a suitable provision for her Majesty; but it is my duty to protest against the vote of such a sum as we are now invited to settle on the Crown. What is the condition of a great proportion of the population of the empire? In Ireland we find no less than 2,300,000 souls who subsist for a great part of the year by begging. Then, let the House look to Scotland—nay, even to England. The hand-loom weavers of both countries, whose wages for the most part have lately been reduced from 3½*d.* to 2½*d.* a-day, are starving. The workmen who supply the most splendid stuffs to ornament the persons of the rich—who furnished the most beautiful fabrics used at the festivities with which the inhabitants of the capital lately welcomed her Majesty, are now in a pitiable state of misery. I have heard a clergyman, in his evidence before the Poor Law Committee, declare that the labourers in his neighbourhood were reduced to live on bread and water. Now, when we see the mass of the working classes suffering such privations, I think, with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that they have a right to complain that the Queen's advisers have not acquainted her Majesty with the real condition of her subjects. Sure I am, that had her Majesty been apprised of these melancholy facts, she would not have accepted the grant tendered without first requiring at the hands of Ministers a redress of her people's grievances.

The motion was then agreed to, and the Bill ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITY BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER having moved the Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into a committee of the whole House,—

Mr. GOULBURN said:—I believe this is the proper time to state my objections to the further progress of this Bill, without a committee of the whole House to reconsider the resolutions on which it is founded. These objections do not arise from any wish to throw an obstacle in the way of making an adequate provision for her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent; but the point I have in view, and which I am anxious to impress on the House, is, that in all money Bills we should be careful not to depart from the line of precedent on this subject, which guards the public against improper conduct on the part either of individual Members, or of the Government of the country. The principle on which the House has acted with respect to money grants is, that no grant can be made until it shall have been considered by a committee of the whole House. That principle stands on a just ground, because it affords ample opportunity of previous discussion. A second principle, immediately arising out of the first, is, that after a money Bill has been brought in, the House has no power of augmenting the sum previously fixed; otherwise the intention of the original rule, which was to secure the fullest discussion of the grant in the committee, might be defeated. Bearing in mind these principles, and looking at the printed Bill, Honourable Gentleman will see that it directly violates the rules and orders of the House. The resolution of the House, on a previous evening, was, that her Majesty be enabled to grant an additional sum, not exceeding 8000*l.*, out of the Consolidated Fund, as a more adequate provision for her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. On looking to the Bill to see how that resolution is to be carried into effect, I find that her Majesty is to be empowered to grant, by letters patent, to her Royal Highness, for the term of her natural life, an annual payment or annuity of 30,000*l.* Now, it is obvious to any one, that on the face of the Bill no connection can possibly be discovered between the grant of 30,000*l.* in the body of the Bill, and the vote in committee of supply of 8000*l.*

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The words are, "the additional yearly sum."

Mr. GOULBURN. — Yes; but those are not the terms in which the vote ought to have been made. The House will bear in mind the second principle I have stated, that there is to be no augmentation of the sum fixed in the preliminary resolution. Even admitting the whole force of the word "additional," on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to insist, I am prepared to show that there is in the 30,000*l.* an additional grant, for which no provision has ever been made by Parliament. The Duchess of Kent's income consisted of three sums, granted by separate Acts of Parliament; — one of 6000*l.*, settled on her Royal Highness for life at the period of her marriage. The next was a sum of 6000*l.*, given by an Act passed in 1825, to enable the Duchess of Kent to provide for the support and education of the Princess Victoria. That sum is in no way extended beyond that purpose, nor is there a word to imply that it was granted to the Duchess of Kent, for life. There is not a word to intimate that it was granted for the life of the Princess Victoria, but it is expressly stated that it was given for her support and education. Let the House construe the Act, therefore, as they will, the grant cannot be extended beyond the life of the Princess. I believe that when the Princess Victoria became Queen, this annuity necessarily ceased. My opinion is, that the Act was limited to the period during which the Princess Victoria required support and education, and that, when the necessity expired, the grant dropped; and, I confess, I heard with some surprise, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought we were authorised to issue money under that Act since the elevation of the Princess Victoria to the throne. I will take the principle in a more extended sense, and maintain, what cannot be denied, that a grant made for the support and education of the Princess Victoria could not enure after she had expired; and if it be contended that the grant was given for the life of the princess, — whenever she died we should have been bound, necessarily, to put an end to it. Even if the first position I have laid down be controverted, no one can deny that the death of the Queen would terminate the grant altogether. I think my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will admit that.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Oh no! I do not; and I will presently state to my Right Honourable Friend why I do not.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I should like to hear by what argument the Right Honourable Gentleman will maintain that her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent would be entitled to the grant after the death of the Queen; but if we have a right to put an end to it, as I will assume for argument's sake, on the death of her Majesty, the matter reduces itself to this — that the Duchess of Kent has an annuity granted to her during the life of the Princess Victoria. I beg the House will follow me in my argument upon this point, for I fear I have not made myself very intelligible. This Bill proposes to give 30,000*l.* to the Duchess of Kent for life; but I am told that 8000*l.* additional is all that the resolution authorises, and, as Ministers state it to be so, the Bill ought to have been drawn to grant 8000*l.* in addition to the provision previously made for her Royal Highness by Act of Parliament. That will be conformable to the manner in which votes are made in committee of supply; but here we are giving by this Bill a grant of 30,000*l.* for life. I have shown by reference to the statute, that the grant of 6000*l.*, made in 1825, was for the life of the Princess Victoria. Taking that statute in its most extended sense, 6000*l.* granted for the life of the Queen cannot be taken as an annuity granted to the Duchess of Kent during her own life; and although the probability is, that the Queen will survive her Royal Highness, yet an annuity granted to an individual for life is far more valuable than an annuity granted to one individual for the life of another; and although it is probable that an annuity granted to the Duchess of Kent for her own life would not have a duration so long as an annuity granted to her for the life of the Princess Victoria, yet it would be more valuable to her Royal Highness if granted for her own lifetime. Thus the grant made in the Bill is more valuable than that stated in the resolution, and is, therefore, a violation of the rules of the House. But, if I am right on the other point, and the grant was given merely for the support of the Princess Victoria during her education, then, I say, I have made out a case to show that the 6000*l.*, now granted, ought to have been granted in committee of supply, before it was introduced into the Bill. I will not apply the argument to another 6000*l.* set apart by a subsequent Act for the same purpose, and now granted under the same circumstances, respecting which I take the same view. If the tenure upon which an annuity is first granted be rendered more valuable than it at first was, the grant is, in fact, actually larger than that which has at first been voted by the committee. I have felt it my duty to bring this question before the House, for if the Bill had passed in its present shape, a precedent would have been created for all succeeding Governments to vary the amount of grants of the public money from the sum voted in committee. This practice has not been followed under former reigns, for when the tenure upon which annuities were granted to royal princes was changed, the resolutions of the committee distinctly stated the real nature of the grant to be conferred. All that I now ask is, either that this Bill should, like former Bills of the same kind, follow the terms of the resolution of the committee of supply, or that a resolution should be come to in committee, expressly granting to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent 30,000*l.* per annum for life, in lieu of all allowances now given by Acts of Parliament. I therefore think the proper course will be, to move a committee of the whole House for the purpose of making a grant to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, my Right Honourable Friend, in bringing the subject before the House, has done what was precisely his duty, and I personally thank him for directing the attention of the House to it. If the Right Honourable Gentleman be correct in his reasoning, or in the inferences he draws from the Act to which he has referred, the Bill on the table of the House is, undoubtedly, not conform- to the resolutions with which it is our duty to take care that it shall be entirely coincident. I wish, however, to remind the House, that, even if the arguments of the Right Honourable Gentleman were correct, there can have been no mystification on my part. I originally informed the House, that the income of the Duchess of Kent was 22,000*l.*, and that I proposed to make it 30,000*l.*; therefore, there can be no charge of bad faith on my part, nor have I understood the Right Honourable Gentleman to cast any imputation on the Government. I know there is a difficulty in procuring the attention of the House to such a subject; but as the facts lie in a small compass, I shall not feel it necessary to occupy their attention for any length of time. As my Right Honourable Friend has stated, the Duchess of Kent holds her income under three Acts of Parliament, the first of which, called the Jointure Act, it is not necessary to take into consideration. The preamble of the Act of 1825 stated, that its object was to provide for the more honourable support and education of the Princess Victoria. In the enacting part of the statute, however, no mention was made of the Princess Victoria; the grant was made to the Duchess of Kent, though it is true there were no words in the Act giving it to her Royal Highness for life. The third Act of 1831, which was to provide for the better support of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and for the better support and education of the Princess Victoria, granted an annuity to the Duchess of Kent of 10,000*l.*, stating, at the same time, that 4000*l.* was for her own life, and 6000*l.* for the life of the present Queen, then Princess Victoria. With respect, then, to the grant of 4000*l.*, that sum must be regarded as an increase to the Duchess of Kent's jointure. The only remaining question that can arise regards the annuity of 6000*l.* granted to her Royal Highness in 1831, for the life of the present Queen, and the grant made in 1825. I believe, however, the House will agree with me, that there are no real difficulties respecting either of these grants. With respect to the grant of 6000*l.* made in 1831, to which I would first address myself, there cannot be a possibility of doubt, I think, that it enured during the lifetime of the Queen. The Act declares that the annuity shall subsist from the time of the grant, and during the life of the Queen. Now, if it be a principle of law that in doubtful enactments the intention of the Legislature is to be arrived at by the preamble of the Bill, the preamble of the Act will show that such was their intention in this case. But there is nothing at all doubtful in the wording of the Act itself, which declares that the annuity is to commence from the time of the grant to enure for her Majesty's life, and to be payable to the Duchess of Kent. It appears to me that any other construction would be in direct contradiction to the words of the statute itself. The question is, simply, — is the Queen living, or not? If she be living, so is this annuity, which is granted by letters patent, according to the terms of the Act of Parliament. I hold, then, on every principle, that so long as her Majesty continues to exist, this is a subsisting annuity. I will take the liberty of referring the House to a precedent, which I consider has a most important bearing on this question, namely, the annuity granted by statute to the Duke and Duchess

Clarence for their lives. The Duke and Duchess of Clarence ceased to exist, in that capacity, when they attained the throne. But did their annuity cease? Certainly not; it was granted to them during their lives; and it was afterwards surrendered by a special act of the Sovereign himself, Parliament having granted him a better provision. I say, then, if you can put such a construction upon the words of this Act as to say that the annuity granted for the life of the Princess Victoria is to cease now she has become Queen of England, the annuities granted to the Duke and Duchess of Clarence ought to have ceased in like manner, when they became King and Queen of England. I have stated my construction of the statute of 1831. I know that does not prove the case of the statute of 1825, because it is not in that instance stated that the annuity is for a separate life. But I should say, also, that the letters patent are granted in the same terms as the Act. If there had been in the statute of 1825, which granted this annuity to the Duchess of Kent, the words "for her life," as there were in the statute of 1831, which granted the Duke and Duchess of Clarence's annuity, no doubt could have been entertained as to the construction. But, although these words do not appear, are they not, I would ask, as fully implied as though they had been actually inserted? An Act of Parliament is passed, granting an annuity to the Duchess of Kent,—and if it do not imply that such annuity shall continue during her life, I want to know what other construction can be put upon it? Does it mean during the pleasure of the Crown? Would it be consistent to make this Act of Parliament operative, only, during the pleasure of the Crown? Suppose a person were to grant to another an annuity of 1000*l.* a-year; would it not be considered as granted for life?

I am glad to see the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite (Sir E. Sugden) taking notes, as we shall have the advantage of the Right Honourable Gentleman's legal knowledge on this question. I cannot see any ground for doubting that this was a grant for life. If it were regarded as a grant during pleasure, that construction would defeat the intention of the statute. Is it, on the other hand, to be taken as a grant for the education of an individual, to cease when that education is completed? If we give it that construction, it is an annuity with no certain termination; for who is to say when education ceases? Between subject and subject there is nothing more common than to allow to the wife 1000*l.* a-year, or any other sum, for the support of the younger children of the marriage. If any or all of the children die, yet no one doubts that the mother is entitled to receive the same amount as if they had lived. I know that grants made by the Crown are construed differently from settlements made from subject to subject. Amongst subjects every thing is construed in favour of the grantee: such, I believe, is the legal practice in such cases; whereas, as to the Crown it is construed most favourably to the grantor. I have gone through these various topics as shortly as I could. I trust I have satisfied the House that there is no question about the Act of 1813; neither can there be any doubt as to the meaning of the Act of 1831; and with respect to the Act of 1825, if the grant be not for the life of the Queen, we put a construction upon the terms of the statute directly contrary to that which in all other cases would be considered the fair acceptation. I assure that Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Sir E. Sugden) I am most anxious to have his opinion; for while I endeavour to show that the present course has not been adopted by me without sufficient reason for following it, I am most desirous, where a question of the privileges of Parliament is concerned, that no other course should be taken than that which is the most wise, the most fitting, and the most proper; and if it be proved to me that another form of proceeding ought to be followed, I will most willingly adopt the suggestion. All I now seek for is, to show that I have not acted without reasonable grounds for the present proceeding.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I wish to say a few words before the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite addresses himself to the question. Two points are involved in this question;—one regarding the amount now received by the Duchess of Kent under various Acts, and the amount to be allowed to her by this Bill; the other point raised by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goulburn) relates to the forms of the House, and the mode of proceeding which should be adopted, in order to make this Bill conformable to precedents. As to the first question, I think my Right Honourable Friend's argument fully sufficient to dispose of it. But, with regard to the other point,—whether or not the Bill is conformable to the resolutions of the Committee, I do think, after the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman, that there may be considerable doubt on it; and I shall be happy to hear the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, opposite, address himself to both parts of the question; for I agree that, in the present proceedings, it would be as well to leave no doubt on the subject, but that we should act in precise conformity with former precedents.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I have to congratulate the House on the manner in which this subject has been discussed; and I assure her Majesty's Government that there is no intention on this side to throw any difficulty in the way of the grant. It will be recollected that, when the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed his resolution for the additional 8000*l*., I suggested to him the propriety of taking a vote for the 30,000*l*.,—the amount including all former grants which it was intended to give to the Duchess of Kent,—in order to avoid any objections of this sort, and not from any feeling of opposition. The Right Honourable Gentleman, however, declined to do so, and took his resolution for the 8000*l*. I do not blame the Right Honourable Gentleman for not having adopted my suggestion, as he acted on legal advice; but I offer this explanation to the House to show that my object was not to raise an impediment, but to prevent any inconvenience which might arise from its being afterwards found necessary to go into committee again. I will now come to the question at issue. The Right Honourable Gentleman cannot complain of his want of legal knowledge, for he has discussed this subject with an ability that few of the legal profession could excel. There are three questions immediately under discussion;—two arising from Acts of Parliament, and the third having reference to the forms of the House. There can be no doubt as regards the two annuities of 6000*l*. and 4000*l*.: that they were granted for the life of the Duchess of Kent, cannot be disputed. By the resolution that we have passed, her Royal Highness is entitled also to 8000*l*. a-year, in addition; she is, therefore, undoubtedly entitled to 18,000*l*. a-year. The only question, then, is with respect to an additional 12,000*l*., necessary to make up the total sum of 30,000*l*. Now, first, as to the Act of 1825. The Right Honourable Gentleman contends that both in the preamble of the Bill, as well as in the title, there are words that show it is for the support and education of the princess, and though it is not there stated, he says that it was an annuity granted by the Crown to the Duchess of Kent, and must be considered to enure for the life of the Queen. The Right Honourable Gentleman has put the case of a certain sum being granted to a married woman, for the benefit of herself and her children; and says, that although the latter may die, yet still the mother would be entitled to the sum allocated for their joint benefit.

Now, no one can doubt that, as a general rule, it is so; but this case stands on totally different grounds. If a man leave his wife 5000*l*. a-year for her own support, and the education of her children, it is implied that she is to bring up the children as long as they require her care; but it can never be supposed that the annuity is intended to cease on the death of the latter; and I will state to the House my opinion on the construction of the Act of 1825,—not as an individual sitting on the Opposition benches, but with as much sincerity as if I were speaking to a private friend. The rule of law is, when there is obscurity in the words of an Act, that we look to the preamble; but it is not so here. The title of the Act of 1825 agrees with the preamble, which describes it as an Act to provide an annuity for the maintenance and education of the Princess Victoria. It was not granted, as the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer has put it, as in the case of a settlement upon a wife for bringing up her children, but expressly for the support and education of the princess. Then comes the enactment; and, as there is an ambiguity in it, we are entitled to look at the preamble to clear away doubt, and ascertain what was the real intention of the Act. Now, as a lawyer, taking into consideration the preamble with the enacting part, and putting a fair and not a rigid construction on the Act, I hold, that the intention was—to provide an annual sum to the Duchess of Kent, for the support and education of the princess. During what time? Why, of necessity, as long as the princess required support and education. Had it been the intention to grant this annuity for life, it would have been stated; but, in my opinion, in point of equity and law, the necessity for which the grant was made having now ceased, the annuity of 6000*l*. no longer exists. Now, the other question, that of the annuity of 10,000*l*. under the Act of 1831, is of a different nature—is a widely different Act from the one passed in 1831. The annuity might have been wanted beyond the minority of the princess, and, therefore, the Act of 1825 was drawn up in general and ambiguous terms, to provide for any contingencies. But when the Legislature intended that a grant should be made for the life of the Duchess of Kent, it well understood how to carry its purpose into effect; and therefore, in the Act of 1831, the grant was expressly stated to be for her own life. The preamble of that Bill was to provide for "the better support of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the honourable support and education of the princess." That Act empowered Parliament to grant an annuity of 10,000*l.*; 4000*l.* a-year was given to the duchess for her own support, and therefore for her own life; the 6000*l.* was confined to the life of the princess, having been provided for her education, and was not given to the duchess in her own right.

I do not agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the annuity is to enure for the life of the princess. If that be the case, it will be necessary to go into a committee of the whole House. Now, I am satisfied that, under any circumstances, that grant cannot be continued beyond the life of the duchess. Nothing is said in it about executors or administrators; and, if it were intended as a personal gift, it cannot by law descend to personal representatives. Another question arises from the Act of 1831. Is the Duchess of Kent entitled to the annuity of 6000*l.* during her own life, in the event that has happened? I think certainly not, either in law or equity. That sum was given for the education of the princess, and when that object is rendered unnecessary, that grant should cease. The grant to the Duke of Clarence is not a parallel case; it was given to him for his natural life, and no change of station could have terminated it; although, in fact, it was surrendered on his Royal Highness's accession to the throne of these realms.

The next question is, how this proceeding will be affected by the resolutions of the House. And, upon this point the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department has requested my opinion. It will not be denied that a grant made to the Duchess of Kent for her own life, cannot be affected by any circumstances. But, admitting the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be correct in his opinion, that the second Act gave to the Duchess of Kent the annuity during the life of the Princess Victoria, it is perfectly clear that the House must resolve itself into a committee of the whole House in order to make a new grant. It matters not which life is the more valuable. I put it this way. You ose to put in a life worth only one purchase, for a life you wish to take out worth forty years' purchase. I contend that we cannot substitute the life of one year for the one of forty years, notwithstanding the great difference in value, inasmuch as it is a distinct and different grant; you must, therefore, come to the House for another resolution, to enable you to transfer this annuity, which had been granted for the life of the Queen, to the Duchess of Kent. I submit that, in point of law, and certainly in point of equity, and according to a fair construction of the words of the Act of Parliament, the annuity of 12,000*l.* does not exist for the purposes of the Duchess of Kent's expenditure.

It appears to me highly necessary, that we should be correct in our proceedings in the present case, as well in order that the country may fully understand the nature of the proposed grant, as to prevent any inconvenience hereafter. There is no dispute as to the terms of the Act of 1831, so far as that the 4000*l.* was granted to the Duchess of Kent for her life, and the 6000*l.* to the Duchess of Kent to provide for the honourable support and education of her Royal Daughter. The 6000*l.* grant was for the life, not of the Duchess of Kent, but of the Princess Victoria. The question that arises, then, is, whether from the altered condition of the princess Victoria, she being now the Sovereign of these realms, the annuity of 6000*l.* is still in force? The Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer contends, that it enures for the life of her Majesty, even after the death of the Duchess of Kent. Now, notwithstanding the authority upon which that opinion has been given, I cannot acquiesce in its correctness. If it were so, the 6000*l.*, being granted expressly to the Duchess of Kent for the purposes named in the Act, there can be no doubt that her Royal Highness might, at her death, make choice of any person to act as her executor to the trust of the education of the princess, and allocate to that person, even supposing he resided in a foreign country, the 6000*l.* a-year granted by Parliament for a specific purpose. I am, however, of a contrary opinion. I hold that this annuity of 6000*l.* does not enure beyond the life of the Duchess of Kent. The Act grants the annuity to the Duchess of Kent for the objects specified, but says not one word about executors or administrators. I say, then, that upon the duchess dying, there is an end to all claim on account of such an object. Parliament might continue the grant of 6000*l.* for the honour and support of the Princess, but it would name the person to whom it granted the annuity.

Take the opposite view of the question. Suppose a mere stranger appointed as executor to the Duchess of Kent. He might, perhaps, after her decease, apply the annuity, not to the support of the princess, but to the payment of the Duchess of Kent's debts, and thus the intentions of the Act of Parliament would be defeated. Then, Sir, as regards the question, whether the Duchess is entitled to this annuity of 6000*l.* under the circumstances in which her Royal Daughter is now placed, I think, by the terms of the Act of Parliament, she is not, — certainly, she is not in equity. But, as it is the general feeling of the House, and of none more than myself, that her Royal Highness should enjoy the whole 30,000*l.* per annum, as some mark of the nation's gratitude for her careful education of her Illustrious Daughter, and for fitting the Princess to fill the high office of Sovereign of this country, without offering any further observations, or the least objection to the grant, I merely suggest that a committee of the whole House should take the question into consideration, for the purpose of making our proceedings conformable to precedent.

The Right Honourable Gentleman will, I trust, do me the credit of believing that I throw out this suggestion, not for the purpose of retarding the progress of the proposition he has submitted, or of embarrassing the Government, in the slightest degree, but rather to assist them, and to prevent any future inconvenience.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am extremely glad of the proposal made by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite, and, without going further, I must say, the course laid down by him will relieve the House from the danger of misapprehension in a matter of such importance. I will, therefore, adopt the course suggested by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and will move that the House do resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, in order to pass a resolution which shall be in conformity with its rules. If the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman sees no objection, I will, in order to give effect to his suggestion, fix the committee on the Bill for a future day.

Committee was then deferred till Monday next.

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITIES.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Queen's Message (11th of December) read.

Resolved, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into a committee, to consider further the said Message. Acts (58 Geo. III. c. 53., 6 Geo. IV. c. 72., 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 20.) read and referred.

The House then resolved itself into a committee.

Resolution proposed, "That the several annuities granted to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, in pursuance of several Acts of the 58th year of King George III., the 6th year of King George IV., and the 1st and 2d year of his late Majesty King William IV., shall cease and determine at such time as may be fixed by any Act to be passed in the present Session of Parliament; and that, in lieu thereof, her Majesty be empowered to grant, out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, a clear yearly sum of 22,000*l.* to her said Royal Highness for her life, which sum, in addition to the yearly sum of 8000*l.* already agreed to be granted in the present Session, amounts to the clear yearly sum of 30,000*l.*, for the life of her said Royal Highness.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have a motion to bring forward, of which I have given notice; but at the suggestion of my Right Honourable Friend near me I will not now detain the House, hoping that another opportunity will be afforded me for the purpose.

SIR G. SINCLAIR. — I will follow the example of my Honourable and Gallant Friend; at the same time I must observe, that the discussion that has taken place will be productive of great advantage.

The resolution agreed to; to be reported on Monday next.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

Considered in committee, and reported with an amendment. Amendment agreed to; Bill to be read a third time on Monday next.

JURIES AT SESSIONS BILL.—PRISONERS (IRELAND) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LAW OF TENANCIES.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Not seeing the Attorney General in his place, I shall postpone the motion of which I have given notice, respecting the present state of the law of landlord and tenant, to Monday.

PONTEFRACT ELECTION.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I rise to present a petition, which has just been put into my hand, from James Coppock, praying for reconsideration of the order of yesterday for enlarging the time for entering into recognisances. I have shown the petition to the gentleman who brought the matter forward on the part of Mr. Gompetz; and as I mean to move, on Monday, that the order be rescinded, I shall now move that the petition be printed. The petition states, that the petitioner having seen the debate of last night, has since ascertained that the witness, Mr. Moss, who represented himself as the parliamentary agent of Mr. Gompertz, neither was nor ever had been so; the real parliamentary agent is a Mr. Florence. As I think it hardly fair that the sitting Member should be prejudiced by an ex parte statement, I therefore move that this petition be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that it be printed.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — It ought to be borne in mind that Mr. Moss stated, in his evidence, last night, that he was parliamentary agent in conjunction with Mr. Florence.

The motion was then agreed to.

POST OFFICE.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I am sorry not to observe my Noble Friend the Postmaster General in his place, particularly as I have given notice of the petitions I am now about to present. I am, however, under the necessity of presenting, at any rate, one of them without further delay; and that is a petition from that most respectable and important body the corporation of the city of London in Common Council assembled; and they certainly are, of any class of her Majesty's subjects, the most likely persons to be regarded as having a right to deal with the important subject of the Post Office. No persons have a deeper interest in the good regulation of that great establishment, than the citizens of this great city, whom the petitioners represent; and no part of her Majesty's dominions ought to demand greater attention to the opinion which is here entertained on this subject, than the city of London. The corporation of that city have deemed it their duty to take this matter into consideration, and after giving it their best attention, they have adopted the present petition. They state that cheapness and celerity in the conveyance of letters will tend, in a very great degree, to the advancement of the commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of this country, and are also highly important for the collection and diffusion of information, by which the education of the people will be greatly accelerated, as well as friendly intercourse forwarded. The mercantile classes of the city of London have turned their attention to this subject — they have gone very fully into the details — they have themselves very extensive experience on the question — they have the capacity beyond most men of examining the particulars and principles of any system which may be adopted for its improvement; therefore their opinion is entitled to operate by way of testimony in reference to any plan; and they give it in favour of Mr. Rowland Hill's. They do not specify that plan in particular in its details as the one to which they give their approval, or which they call upon the Legislature to adopt; but it is clearly to that plan they point, because they apply themselves to the Ninth Report of the Commissioners upon the Post Office Inquiry, and pray particularly for the adoption of that recommendation which is to try the plan, by the twopenny post.

I am very happy to observe that my Noble Friend (the Earl of Lichfield) is now in his place. Having stated so much, I need hardly remind your Lordships that upon such a subject there is no authority so high as that of the trading community; and connected with this question, there is, perhaps, no person of higher authority among mercantile men than a Noble Friend of mine, and a Member of your Lordships' House (Lord Ashburton), who has more than once called your Lordships' attention to this matter. Without precisely pledging himself to the whole of this measure, my Noble Friend has come to the opinion that the conveyance of letters is not of itself, and in itself, in its own nature, due regard being had to the convenience of the public, a proper subject of taxation for the purposes of revenue. That, no doubt, the difficulty may be great of retracing our steps, after having for so long a period made it the subject of taxation, my Noble Friend does not deny, nor do I; but if it be a question whether a great mercantile country ought to make the postage or conveyance of letters a subject of revenue or a matter of taxation—if such a proposition be made, I think the answer of my Noble Friend would be in the negative, as well as the answer which I myself would give. I venture to appeal to your Lordships, who have heard this subject discussed in this place more than once. I will now take it that even after a larger revenue has grown up upon wrong principles, by raising money for the public service by taxing the communications by post,—I will take it that even after so large a revenue as a million and a half has been collected and received, even if the alteration were attended with a very considerable present diminution of that income — even if it tended generally to lower that revenue — it would, in the end, not only compensate itself, and raise the revenue to its former pitch, but would even greatly increase that revenue. Such is the proposition which, as soon as the question comes before your Lordships in a more fit shape to decide, I for one am prepared to maintain. I will not merely allude to the reduction of postage alone for the purpose of raising my argument. I do not refer to the taking off of the 12½*d.*, as some contend for, — the 9*d.*, as others think will be necessary, — or the 6*d.*, which others, again, make their calculation from; — I will go at once to the taking off the whole — of going at once to the one penny per ounce or half ounce, which the proposition of Mr. Hill. I do not mean to assert that such a diminution of the postage would so largely increase the number of letters as to bring up the gross revenue to its present amount. I will go farther. I look forward to the great boon which it would confer upon the whole mercantile world in this country — the vast increase which it would give to the great trading interests of the country, by which the revenue in every branch must be greatly and wonderfully increased.

I rejoice at the presence of my Noble Friend the Postmaster General, because I wish much to tell him that he has failed to satisfy my mind that the plan suggested by Mr. Hill is so totally impracticable as he has stated it to be. I conceive that the whole of my Noble Friend's calculation is founded upon a statement that the total number of letters, now, is between 42,000,000 and 43,000,000. Now, any person hearing that statement made, would suppose that it was, in point of fact, founded on positive data — that my Noble Friend had reasoned on such data, when he urged his opinion against what are called the speculative calculations and estimates of the author of the new plan. I did not rightly understand my Noble Friend, whether, in his calculations, he included the twopenny and threepenny post, or confined himself exclusively to the general post? Mr. Hill, and the authorities of the Post Office, are at direct issue. It is a matter of estimate and calculation upon both sides. That is the very point in dispute between the two parties. Mr. Hill calculates the letters going through the Post Office at seventy-nine millions and a half — in round numbers, eighty millions. Here they are at direct issue in their assumptions. I believe it is a fact beyond dispute, that twenty-two millions and a half pass through the Post Office in London in a year. Ten millions of those go through the general post, while twelve millions and a half go through the twopenny or threepenny. In the calculations, therefore, we are to deduct the ten millions from the twenty-two millions and a half. My Noble Friend has taken those ten millions, and makes his calculation for the whole country. He finds these yield 460,000*l.*, and then he finds the whole of the general post letters for the United Kingdom yield about four times that sum. This proceeds on the assumption that the average value of the country letters to the revenue is precisely the same as the average value of the letters in the London district; the average of each letter in the London district is calculated at 1*s.* 0½*d.* Every one knows that the amount of postage in London is larger than in the country, because the London letters include large packages of foreign letters, which go to swell the amount of the postage received, and to increase the average value of the letters, and may raise it to 1*s.* 0½*d.* in the London district. But in the country districts there are no such circumstances, because very few foreign packages are sent into the country. I happen to have the means of knowing what the amount is for one town, in a midland county, a quarter of a million of letters passing through that town in a year, and I believe the average value of those letters is not 1*s.* 0½*d.*, but 7½*d.* or 8*d.*, —certainly not more than 9*d.* That makes a material difference. With regard to Mr. Hill's plan, it is not correct to state that it affords no provision for any increased expense in the Post Office department, in consequence of the increased number of letters, and the amount of business to be attended to; the reverse is the fact, because he allows 225,000*l.*, for the additional expense of working his plan.

I will state now, as I have stated to a former Postmaster General, that an ignorant and humble individual, like myself, ought to be very careful how he comes into contact with the authorities of any department under Government. No doubt, great weight is due to their opinions, and great authority is necessarily ascribed to their statements. Very ample drafts are made on, I cannot say the credulity, but credit of Parliament, when nothing is said to impeach their authority, by statements that individuals know nothing of the matter, — that those who are beyond the walls of the establishment can have little information, and their alarms are expressed at any change in a department which yields a great proportion of the revenue. Great praise is bestowed on those who are connected with that department; and, perhaps, it may be well earned by those who are acting under what I take to be a wrong system; but that is not their fault. I have been very much put to it to find out how it is all those praises of that establishment, which we have heard of late occasions, are bestowed, — and that those, I will not say, vituperations, but somewhat contemptuous expressions, of all who are beyond it, have been indulged in.

The impracticability is another grand objection to this plan; there is nothing new in that objection. Indeed, the word has often been used in this House, and elsewhere, as establishing an insuperable objection to all systems for the improvement of the Post Office. I can refresh the memory of your Lordships, by referring to the places and occasions when this word has been used as reasonably and quite as positively as it is now employed. Your Lordships will recollect, that in the year 1784, a gentleman, named Palmer, recommended the adoption of a system of mail coach carriages, when, at that time, the mails were carried at the rate of three miles and a half an hour. Mr. Palmer was of opinion that they could be carried at the rate of seven miles an hour, if not more. Do not your Lordships recollect the alarm which the announcement of this proposition spread through every department of the Post Office? Do you recollect the indignation, the absolute contempt, — the scornful contempt with which it was received by all the officials of the Post Office? A contempt equalled only by the loud chorus of applause which they rung in the ears of Parliament in praise of every one man, every one rule, every one regulation in any way connected with any one department of that most perfect establishment, the Post Office of 1784, with its safe, sure, and steady mails of three miles and a half an hour!

The committee of the House of Commons, in its Report upon this subject, in 1797, declared, that "the more we consider the plans of Mr. Palmer, the more are we convinced of the insuperable difficulty in attempting to bring them into operation. The officers of the Post Office, whom we regard as the best judges of the question, have been examined before us, and are unanimously of opinion that the thing is totally impracticable." Another committee, reporting on the same subject, said, "We have examined the oldest and ablest officers of the Post Office" (it was always the oldest and ablest, for the committees considered the term synonymous), "and the oldest and ablest officers have no confidence whatever in the plan." Indeed, in looking over these Reports I find that it was always the "oldest and ablest" who had the greatest contempt for improvement, and that the older an officer was the greater contempt he had for the officer who was less old than himself. They were all, however, both young and old, positively of opinion that the plan of Mr. Palmer was not only impracticable, but dangerous to commerce and finance. It is frightful for your Lordships to think of the dangers which the commerce and finance of the country have escaped since that period! They have been exposed not only to the dangers of the French war and the orders that recommendation which is to try the plan, by the twopenny post.

I am very happy to observe that my Noble Friend (the Earl of Lichfield) is now in his place. Having stated so much, I need hardly remind your Lordships that upon such a subject there is no authority so high as that of the trading community; and connected with this question, there is, perhaps, no person of higher authority among mercantile men than a Noble Friend of mine, and a Member of your Lordships' House (Lord Ashburton), who has more than once called your Lordships' attention to this matter. Without precisely pledging himself to the whole of this measure, my Noble Friend has come to the opinion that the conveyance of letters is not of itself, and in itself, in its own nature, due regard being had to the convenience of the public, a proper subject of taxation for the purposes of revenue. That, no doubt, the difficulty may be great of retracing our steps, after having for so long a period made it the subject of taxation, my Noble Friend does not deny, nor do I; but if it be a question whether a great mercantile country ought to make the postage or conveyance of letters a subject of revenue or a matter of taxation—if such a proposition be made, I think the answer of my Noble Friend would be in the negative, as well as the answer which I myself would give. I venture to appeal to your Lordships, who have heard this subject discussed in this place more than once. I will now take it that even after a larger revenue has grown up upon wrong principles, by raising money for the public service by taxing the communications by post,—I will take it that even after so large a revenue as a million and a half has been collected and received, even if the alteration were attended with a very considerable present diminution of that income — even if it tended generally to lower that revenue — it would, in the end, not only compensate itself, and raise the revenue to its former pitch, but would even greatly increase that revenue. Such is the proposition which, as soon as the question comes before your Lordships in a more fit shape to decide, I for one am prepared to maintain. I will not merely allude to the reduction of postage alone for the purpose of raising my argument. I do not refer to the taking off of the 12½*d.*, as some contend for, — the 9*d.*, as others think will be necessary, — or the 6*d.*, which others, again, make their calculation from; — I will go at once to the taking off the whole — of going at once to the one penny per ounce or half ounce, which is the proposition of Mr. Hill. I do not mean to assert that such a diminution of the postage would so largely increase the number of letters as to bring up the gross revenue to its present amount. I will go farther. I look forward to the great boon which it would confer upon the whole mercantle world in this country — the vast increase which it would give to the great trading interests of the country, by which the revenue in every branch must be greatly and wonderfully increased.

I rejoice at the presence of my Noble Friend the Postmaster General, because I wish much to tell him that he has failed to satisfy my mind that the plan suggested by Mr. Hill is so totally impracticable as he has stated it to be. I conceive that the whole of my Noble Friend's calculation is founded upon a statement that the total number of letters, now, is between 42,000,000 and 43,000,000. Now, any person hearing that statement made, would suppose that it was, in point of fact, founded on positive data — that my Noble Friend had reasoned on such data, when he urged his opinion against what are called the speculative calculations and estimates of the author of the new plan. I did not rightly understand my Noble Friend, whether, in his calculations, he included the twopenny and threepenny post, or confined himself exclusively to the general post? Mr. Hill, and the authorities of the Post Office, are at direct issue. It is a matter of estimate and calculation upon both sides. That is the very point in dispute between the two parties. Mr. Hill calculates the letters going through the Post Office at seventy-nine millions and a half — in round numbers, eighty millions. Here they are at direct issue in their assumptions. I believe it is a fact beyond dispute, that twenty-two millions and a half pass through the Post Office in London in a year. Ten millions of those go through the general post, while twelve millions and a half go through the twopenny or threepenny. In the calculations, therefore, we are to deduct the ten millions from the twenty-two millions and a half. My Noble Friend has taken those ten millions, and makes his calculation for the whole country. He finds these yield 460,000*l.*, and then he finds the whole of the general post letters for the United Kingdom yield about four times that sum. This proceeds on the assumption that the average value of the country letters to the revenue is precisely the same as the average value of the letters in the London district; the average of each letter in the London district is calculated at 1*s.* 0½*d.* Every one knows that the amount of postage in London is larger than in the country, because the London letters include large packages of foreign letters, which go to swell the amount of the postage received, and to increase the average value of the letters, and may raise it to 1*s*. 0½*d*. in the London district. But in the country districts there are no such circumstances, because very few foreign packages are sent into the country. I happen to have the means of knowing what the amount is for one town, in a midland county, a quarter of a million of letters passing through that town in a year, and I believe the average value of those letters is not 1*s*. 0½*d*., but 7½*d*. or 8*d*., —certainly not more than 9*d*. That makes a material difference. With regard to Mr. Hill's plan, it is not correct to state that it affords no provision for any increased expense in the Post Office department, in consequence of the increased number of letters, and the amount of business to be attended to; the reverse is the fact, because he allows 225,000*l*., for the additional expense of working his plan.

I will state now, as I have stated to a former Postmaster General, that an ignorant and humble individual, like myself, ought to be very careful how he comes into contact with the authorities of any department under Government. No doubt, great weight is due to their opinions, and great authority is necessarily ascribed to their statements. Very ample drafts are made on, I cannot say the credulity, but credit of Parliament, when nothing is said to impeach their authority, by statements that individuals know nothing of the matter, — that those who are beyond the walls of the establishment can have little information, and their alarms are expressed at any change in a department which yields a great proportion of the revenue. Great praise is bestowed on those who are connected with that department; and, perhaps, it may be well earned by those who are acting under what I take to be a wrong system; but that is not their fault. I have been very much put to it to find out how it is all those praises of that establishment, which we have heard of late occasions, are bestowed, — and that those, I will not say, vituperations, but somewhat contemptuous expressions, of all who are beyond it, have been indulged in.

The impracticability is another grand objection to this plan; there is nothing new in that objection. Indeed, the word has often been used in this House, and elsewhere, as establishing an insuperable objection to all systems for the improvement of the Post Office. I can refresh the memory of your Lordships, by referring to the places and occasions when this word has been used as reasonably and quite as positively as it is now employed. Your Lordships will recollect, that in the year 1784, a gentleman, named Palmer, recommended the adoption of a system of mail coach carriages, when, at that time, the mails were carried at the rate of three miles and a half an hour. Mr. Palmer was of opinion that they could be carried at the rate of seven miles an hour, if not more. Do not your Lordships recollect the alarm which the announcement of this proposition spread through every department of the Post Office? Do you recollect the indignation, the absolute contempt, — the scornful contempt with which it was received by all the officials of the Post Office? A contempt equalled only by the loud chorus of applause which they rung in the ears of Parliament in praise of every one man, every one rule, every one regulation in any way connected with any one department of that most perfect establishment, the Post Office of 1784, with its safe, sure, and steady mails of three miles and a half an hour!

The committee of the House of Commons, in its Report upon this subject, in 1797, declared, that "the more we consider the plans of Mr. Palmer, the more are we convinced of the insuperable difficulty in attempting to bring them into operation. The officers of the Post Office, whom we regard as the best judges of the question, have been examined before us, and are unanimously of opinion that the thing is totally impracticable." Another committee, reporting on the same subject, said, "We have examined the oldest and ablest officers of the Post Office" (it was always the oldest and ablest, for the committees considered the term synonymous), "and the oldest and ablest officers have no confidence whatever in the plan." Indeed, in looking over these Reports I find that it was always the "oldest and ablest" who had the greatest contempt for improvement, and that the older an officer was the greater contempt he had for the officer who was less old than himself. They were all, however, both young and old, positively of opinion that the plan of Mr. Palmer was not only impracticable, but dangerous to commerce and finance. It is frightful for your Lordships to think of the dangers which the commerce and finance of the country have escaped since that period! They have been exposed not only to the dangers of the French war and the orders

Clarence for their lives. The Duke and Duchess of Clarence ceased to exist, in that capacity, when they attained the throne. But did their annuity cease? Certainly not; it was granted to them during their lives; and it was afterwards surrendered by a special act of the Sovereign himself, Parliament having granted him a better provision. I say, then, if you can put such a construction upon the words of this Act as to say that the annuity granted for the life of the Princess Victoria is to cease now she has become Queen of England, the annuities granted to the Duke and Duchess of Clarence ought to have ceased in like manner, when they became King and Queen of England. I have stated my construction of the statute of 1831. I know that does not prove the case of the statute of 1825, because it is not in that instance stated that the annuity is for a separate life. But I should say, also, that the letters patent are granted in the same terms as the Act. If there had been in the statute of 1825, which granted this annuity to the Duchess of Kent, the words "for her life," as there were in the statute of 1831, which granted the Duke and Duchess of Clarence's annuity, no doubt could have been entertained as to the construction. But, although these words do not appear, are they not, I would ask, as fully implied as though they had been actually inserted? An Act of Parliament is passed, granting an annuity to the Duchess of Kent,—and if it do not imply that such annuity shall continue during her life, I want to know what other construction can be put upon it? Does it mean during the pleasure of the Crown? Would it be consistent to make this Act of Parliament operative, only, during the pleasure of the Crown? Suppose a person were to grant to another an annuity of 1000*l.* a-year; would it not be considered as granted for life?

I am glad to see the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite (Sir E. Sugden) taking notes, as we shall have the advantage of the Right Honourable Gentleman's legal knowledge on this question. I cannot see any ground for doubting that this was a grant for life. If it were regarded as a grant during pleasure, that construction would defeat the intention of the statute. Is it, on the other hand, to be taken as a grant for the education of an individual, to cease when that education is completed? If we give it that construction, it is an annuity with no certain termination; for who is to say when education ceases? Between subject and subject there is nothing more common than to allow to the wife 1000*l.* a-year, or any other sum, for the support of the younger children of the marriage. If any or all of the children die, yet no one doubts that the mother is entitled to receive the same amount as if they had lived. I know that grants made by the Crown are construed differently from settlements made from subject to subject. Amongst subjects every thing is construed in favour of the grantee: such, I believe, is the legal practice in such cases; whereas, as to the Crown it is construed most favourably to the grantor. I have gone through these various topics as shortly as I could. I trust I have satisfied the House that there is no question about the Act of 1813; neither can there be any doubt as to the meaning of the Act of 1831; and with respect to the Act of 1825, if the grant be not for the life of the Queen, we put a construction upon the terms of the statute directly contrary to that which in all other cases would be considered the fair acceptation. I assure that Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Sir E. Sugden) I am most anxious to have his opinion; for while I endeavour to show that the present course has not been adopted by me without sufficient reason for following it, I am most desirous, where a question of the privileges of Parliament is concerned, that no other course should be taken than that which is the most wise, the most fitting, and the most proper; and if it be proved to me that another form of proceeding ought to be followed, I will most willingly adopt the suggestion. All I now seek for is, to show that I have not acted without reasonable grounds for the present proceeding.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I wish to say a few words before the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite addresses himself to the question. Two points are involved in this question;—one regarding the amount now received by the Duchess of Kent under various Acts, and the amount to be allowed to her by this Bill; the other point raised by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goulburn) relates to the forms of the House, and the mode of proceeding which should be adopted, in order to make this Bill conformable to precedents. As to the first question, I think my Right Honourable Friend's argument fully sufficient to dispose of it. But, with regard to the other point,—whether or not the Bill is conformable to the resolutions of the Committee, I do think, after the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman, that there may be considerable doubt on it; and I shall be happy to hear the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, opposite, address himself to both parts of the question; for I agree that, in the present proceedings, it would be as well to leave no doubt on the subject, but that we should act in precise conformity with former precedents.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I have to congratulate the House on the manner in which this subject has been discussed; and I assure her Majesty's Government that there is no intention on this side to throw any difficulty in the way of the grant. It will be recollected that, when the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed his resolution for the additional 8000*l.*, I suggested to him the propriety of taking a vote for the 30,000*l.*, — the amount including all former grants which it was intended to give to the Duchess of Kent,—in order to avoid any objections of this sort, and not from any feeling of opposition. The Right Honourable Gentleman, however, declined to do so, and took his resolution for the 8000*l.* I do not blame the Right Honourable Gentleman for not having adopted my suggestion, as he acted on legal advice; but I offer this explanation to the House to show that my object was not to raise an impediment, but to prevent any inconvenience which might arise from its being afterwards found necessary to go into committee again. I will now come to the question at issue. The Right Honourable Gentleman cannot complain of his want of legal knowledge, for he has discussed this subject with an ability that few of the legal profession could excel. There are three questions immediately under discussion; — two arising from Acts of Parliament, and the third having reference to the forms of the House. There can be no doubt as regards the two annuities of 6000*l.* and 4000*l.*: that they were granted for the life of the Duchess of Kent, cannot be disputed. By the resolution that we have passed, her Royal Highness is entitled also to 8000*l.* a-year, in addition; she is, therefore, undoubtedly entitled to 18,000*l.* a-year. The only question, then, is with respect to an additional 12,000*l.*, necessary to make up the total sum of 30,000*l.* Now, first, as to the Act of 1825. The Right Honourable Gentleman contends that both in the preamble of the Bill, as well as in the title, there are words that show it is for the support and education of the princess, and though it is not there stated, he says that it was an annuity granted by the Crown to the Duchess of Kent, and must be considered to enure for the life of the Queen. The Right Honourable Gentleman has put the case of a certain sum being granted to a married woman, for the benefit of herself and her children; and says, that although the latter may die, yet still the mother would be entitled to the sum allocated for their joint benefit.

Now, no one can doubt that, as a general rule, it is so; but this case stands on totally different grounds. If a man leave his wife 5000*l.* a-year for her own support, and the education of her children, it is implied that she is to bring up the children as long as they require her care; but it can never be supposed that the annuity is intended to cease on the death of the latter; and I will state to the House my opinion on the construction of the Act of 1825,—not as an individual sitting on the Opposition benches, but with as much sincerity as if I were speaking to a private friend. The rule of law is, when there is obscurity in the words of an Act, that we look to the preamble; but it is not so here. The title of the Act of 1825 agrees with the preamble, which describes it as an Act to provide an annuity for the maintenance and education of the Princess Victoria. It was not granted, as the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer has put it, as in the case of a settlement upon a wife for bringing up her children, but expressly for the support and education of the princess. Then comes the enactment; and, as there is an ambiguity in it, we are entitled to look at the preamble to clear away doubt, and ascertain what was the real intention of the Act. Now, as a lawyer, taking into consideration the preamble with the enacting part, and putting a fair and not a rigid construction on the Act, I hold, that the intention was — to provide an annual sum to the Duchess of Kent, for the support and education of the princess. During what time? Why, of necessity, as long as the princess required support and education. Had it been the intention to grant this annuity for life, it would have been stated; but, in my opinion, in point of equity and law, the necessity for which the grant was made having now ceased, the annuity of 6000*l.* no longer exists. Now, the other question, that of the annuity of 10,000*l.* under the Act of 1831, is of a different nature — is a widely different Act from the one passed in 1831. The annuity might have been wanted beyond the minority of the princess, and, therefore, the Act of 1825 was drawn up in general and ambiguous terms, to provide for any contingencies. But when the Legislature intended that a grant should be made for the life of the Duchess of Kent, it well understood how to carry its purpose into effect; and therefore, in the Act of 1831, the grant was expressly stated to be for her own life. The preamble of that Bill was to provide for "the better support of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the honourable support and education of the princess." That Act empowered Parliament to grant an annuity of 10,000*l.*; 4000*l.* a-year was given to the duchess for her own support, and therefore for her own life; the 6000*l.* was confined to the life of the princess, having been provided for her education, and was not given to the duchess in her own right.

I do not agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the annuity is to enure for the life of the princess. If that be the case, it will be necessary to go into a committee of the whole House. Now, I am satisfied that, under any circumstances, that grant cannot be continued beyond the life of the duchess. Nothing is said in it about executors or administrators; and, if it were intended as a personal gift, it cannot by law descend to personal representatives. Another question arises from the Act of 1831. Is the Duchess of Kent entitled to the annuity of 6000*l.* during her own life, in the event that has happened? I think certainly not, either in law or equity. That sum was given for the education of the princess, and when that object is rendered unnecessary, that grant should cease. The grant to the Duke of Clarence is not a parallel case; it was given to him for his natural life, and no change of station could have terminated it; although, in fact, it was surrendered on his Royal Highness's accession to the throne of these realms.

The next question is, how this proceeding will be affected by the resolutions of the House. And, upon this point the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department has requested my opinion. It will not be denied that a grant made to the Duchess of Kent for her own life, cannot be affected by any circumstances. But, admitting the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be correct in his opinion, that the second Act gave to the Duchess of Kent the annuity during the life of the Princess Victoria, it is perfectly clear that the House must resolve itself into a committee of the whole House in order to make a new grant. It matters not which life is the more valuable. I put it this way. You propose to put in a life worth only one year's purchase, for a life you wish to take out worth forty years' purchase. I contend that we cannot substitute the life of one year for the one of forty years, notwithstanding the great difference in value, inasmuch as it is a distinct and different grant; you must, therefore, come to the House for another resolution, to enable you to transfer this annuity, which had been granted for the life of the Queen, to the Duchess of Kent. I submit that, in point of law, and certainly in point of equity, and according to a fair construction of the words of the Act of Parliament, the annuity of 12,000*l.* does not exist for the purposes of the Duchess of Kent's expenditure.

It appears to me highly necessary, that we should be correct in our proceedings in the present case, as well in order that the country may fully understand the nature of the proposed grant, as to prevent any inconvenience hereafter. There is no dispute as to the terms of the Act of 1831, so far as that the 4000*l.* was granted to the Duchess of Kent for her life, and the 6000*l.* to the Duchess of Kent to provide for the honourable support and education of her Royal Daughter. The 6000*l.* grant was for the life, not of the Duchess of Kent, but of the Princess Victoria. The question that arises, then, is, whether from the altered condition of the princess Victoria, she being now the Sovereign of these realms, the annuity of 6000*l.* is still in force? The Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer contends, that it enures for the life of her Majesty, even after the death of the Duchess of Kent. Now, notwithstanding the authority upon which that opinion has been given, I cannot acquiesce in its correctness. If it were so, the 6000*l.*, being granted expressly to the Duchess of Kent for the purposes named in the Act, there can be no doubt that her Royal Highness might, at her death, make choice of any person to act as her executor to the trust of the education of the princess, and allocate to that person, even supposing he resided in a foreign country, the 6000*l.* a-year granted by Parliament for a specific purpose. I am, however, of a contrary opinion. I hold that this annuity of 6000*l.* does not enure beyond the life of the Duchess of Kent. The Act grants the annuity to the Duchess of Kent for the objects specified, but says not one word about executors or administrators. I say, then, that upon the duchess dying, there is an end to all claim on account of such an object. Parliament might continue the grant of 6000*l.* for the honour and support of the Princess, but ostensibly, Christians. And hence the words in the first part of the declaration of the Act of Geo. IV. are, "I declare, on the faith of a Christian," &c. The difficulty which the Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists feel is not any difficulty as to making professions of security to the Established Church, but as to making any declaration which on the face of it is equivalent to an oath. They will not sacrifice the principle, if in place of an oath your Lordships permit persons professedly Christians to make a declaration instead; but if the present amendment be adopted, they will at once abandon the principle. Without stating any decided opinion on this question, I do most strongly object to interposing, by a side wind, so important a change in the municipal government of the country as that advocated by the Noble and Learned Lord. Considering that the most important body, for whose relief it is intended, the Quakers, have to-night, in the petition presented by the Noble Marquess, repudiated the relief proposed by the Bill; considering, also, that one of the other two classes comprised in the preamble, the Separatists, comparatively of recent date, and very inconsiderable in number, are almost wholly confined to Ireland, to which part of the United Kingdom the Bill does not apply; I think it would be much better to postpone the Bill till a later period of the Session. At all events, I trust that the suggestion neither of the Noble and Learned Lord, nor of the Noble Baron, will be adopted by your Lordships.

The MARQUESS of BUTE.—It is with great reluctance that I trouble your Lordships on any occasion, and it is with difficulty I ever offer my opinions in opposition to those of your Lordships with whom I have generally the honour to agree; but differing, as I do, from most of my Friends around me, I do not think it right to give a silent vote on this subject. It is not without much pain, I say, that I do not concur with the Right Reverend Prelate, whose opinions I always view with great respect. He has known me from my youth, and I ever felt the deepest regard for him. I cannot help considering this Bill a bad Bill, and I extremely regret that it has come up to your Lordships' House. I hope it will not be passed in its present state. I certainly think the amendment which has been proposed would be an improvement to it; but I do think it would have been more creditable to Parliament if the same measure had been introduced, on this subject, as was brought forward in 1836. This I think the more necessary, as your Lordships must recollect that the character of the corporations which existed in 1828, when the Test and Corporation Act was repealed, has been entirely changed by the Bill of 1835. I entertain the greatest regard for anything that can exalt the Christian religion, but I deny that the question of the admission of Jews to certain offices in corporations affects its interests.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE.—I feel bound to resist the adoption of my Noble Friend's amendment;—yet not because I think that it had better not be introduced into the present measure. I agree there are many persons who cannot be designated as Christians, who should be relieved from taking the declaration on the faith of Christians, and who can be safely entrusted with offices which involve the management of local concerns, and in which persons of all persuasions can be rendered useful servants of the public. At the same time, however I may be inclined to extend the principle of the Bill in that particular, hereafter, to persons of other persuasions, I do not consider that a sufficient reason for delaying its extension to those particular sects to which the measure refers. This is not a measure brought forward by her Majesty's Government, nor does it proceed on any great principle; but it has been introduced, as I understand, with the view of removing, to a certain degree, the evil of excluding particular persons from voting at municipal elections, owing to their conscientious scruples. In many of the large towns there are numbers of persons practically excluded from voting upon these occasions. If your Lordships think as I do, that the tolerant character of the measure now before you ought to be extended, you should not be deterred from carrying out the Bill, or rather the principle of the Bill, to a still greater length. I do not object to the doctrine respecting the measure which has this night been advocated in your Lordships' House; but what I contend for is this, that the Bill was not originally so framed as to meet these views. So far I agree with the Noble Lords who have spoken. I agree likewise with some of them in thinking that there is, and always must be, great difficulty in legislating upon subjects of this nature, where definitions respecting religious belief and opinions are required; for I find it not easy to imagine how courts of law could enter upon such inquiries without assuming to themselves inquisitorial powers inconsistent with the principles of the British constitution. I profess myself favourable to acting upon broad principles; but until a measure of that nature is introduced with full notice, I think the most advisable course will be to pass this Bill at all events; for, as far as it goes, it will be a positive gain, extending, as its enactments do, to the three denominations. Gradual relief has always been the practice of the Legislature, and an instance of this occurred only two years ago, when certain disabilities affecting the Separatists were removed. Then, further, I wish to observe, that in passing this Bill, which is confessedly good so far as it goes, your Lordships do not preclude yourselves from acting, at a future time, upon more extended principles. I am perfectly willing, hereafter, to support a measure for restoring rights enjoyed by religious sects, but I do not see how the present Bill can be extended, especially without previous notice. For these reasons I shall feel bound to resist the amendment.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The arguments which have just fallen from the Noble Marquess convince me that he ought to have arrived at a conclusion the very opposite of that to which he has come. My Noble Friend has told your Lordships that our arguments are unanswerable — that it would be vain to attempt any reply to our reasonings — that the data are beyond all possibility of dispute, and the deductions altogether irresistible; but still my Noble Friend declares that he shall vote against us — and why? Simply because he agrees with us. After following us the whole way, he makes, suddenly, a crane-necked turn, so swift as to elude the senses, and goes off in the other direction. When I hear him assert the same principles of toleration with my Noble Friend (Lord Holland) and myself, and lend the sanction of his high authority to our opinions; when I am thus naturally congratulating myself on the comfort and strength we shall presently derive from his vote, all at once the cup is dashed, unquaffed, from my lips, and, my Noble Friend's speech remaining with us, his vote is gone. He approves all my argument, both premises and inferences; I have given reasons that are irrefragable. But if any thing was wanting, this has been supplied in ample abundance by my Noble Friend at the table (Lord Holland), who has laid down the soundest principles, and enforced them by the most luminous reasoning. And if the measure was still not sufficiently heaped, the Noble Marquess opposite (Lord Bute) has filled it up to overflowing, by the judicious statement of new matter, and facts hitherto not brought to bear on the point. All this chain of irresistible reasoning, as my Noble Friend confesses it to be, must surely make him join in our conclusion. But, no: "Your arguments are unanswerable," says my Noble Friend, "and therefore I differ with you; your premises are sound, your deductions unexceptionable, your conclusions irresistible, and therefore I will resent them and vote against you." But why, my good Lord, one naturally asks, why vote against us? It cannot be because we are in the right that we have disentitled ourselves to your support. What, then, is the reason? for reason there must be for such an unexpected course. The reason turns out to be more strange and unexpected still — it is because we are likely to be defeated — because there are so many sure to vote against us — that my Noble Friend will add his vote to theirs. He agrees with us, and wishes us success; but because our adversaries, who are his adversaries also, muster strong, and may very likely defeat us, and prevent us from attaining the object both I, and my Noble Friend, alike, are desirous of; therefore, in order that our defeat may be insured, he will add his vote to theirs; and, in order to deprive himself and us of all chance of carrying the point we both earnestly wish, he will vote with our common adversaries because they are already too many for us.

I make no doubt that your Lordships have partaken of my astonishment at the process of reasoning by which the Noble Marquess has succeeded in convincing himself that he ought to say to so many of us as agree with him — "You wish to carry an extended measure, and so do I — I will not support you." I know, my Lords, the serious mischief that has been done by such invidious exclusions, and I own that were I a member of any excluded sect, as a Jew or a Cameronian, I should feel that I was stigmatised — that the Legislature had no confidence in my loyalty and good faith — that less confidence, at least, was reposed in me than I had a right to claim, because more was reposed in others whose claims were not higher than my own, and that I was ill-treated by the Legislature's making the invidious distinction between me and them. All this, however, might pass away as matter of feeling only; but then I should begin to reflect and reason on the matter, and I should find myself not only worse treated than others, but worse off when the Bill had passed than I had been before; and my chance much diminished of obtaining a just regard to my scruples, — of being placed on the same footing with others whose religious scruples had entitled them to present relief. This matter really deserves the consideration of your Lordships and of my Noble Friend. Each sect excluded by the unjust and inconsistent operation of this Bill has the prospect of admission within the pale of the constitution materially lessened by the numbers of those whom its operation comprehends. When those who are all uniting their efforts to gain admission continue a numerous body, with much influence, and with all the reasons in their favour derived from the injustice of excluding so many, their prospects of success are fair and cheering; but when you open the door at which all are alike knocking with their combined force, and let in a considerable number, how manifest is it that, if the door is instantly shut in the face of those who remain, their prospects are overcast in proportion to the diminution which their numbers have sustained?

I am aware that this is a topic requiring to be discreetly, and even delicately, handled; according to the circumstances of each case, it must always be decided whether you will obtain a great good for a large body of persons, upon the weight and influence of those still left out, and thus remove to a greater distance the period of universal toleration. But are the sects now about to be admitted so numerous as to justify this unfair treatment of those you are leaving out? Far from it. Let us look to the only numerous body whom it comprehends — the Quakers. They are the great sect whom the promoters of the measure undertake to relieve; but what is the fact with regard to that important and highly respectable class of men? They declare that they cannot conscientiously avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill, and that for them it will have no kind of operation. I highly esteem the Quakers as individuals; I venerate their principles, — the pure principles of toleration and of peace, — and I admire their practice, accurately conforming to those blessed doctrines. I am, therefore, unable to feel otherwise than grievously disappointed that a measure, professing to be for the advantage of a body who have been for five and thirty years very zealous fellow-labourers in the cause of peace and liberty, should prove to them no advantage at all. I cannot help looking to the petition which has been presented to the House by the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), and which in substance declares that the Bill to them is worth no more than the parchment on which it is about to be engrossed. That petition is from the most confidential and authoritative portion of the Society of Friends. To describe it as only speaking the sentiments of the individuals who sign it, is a mere fallacy. It is from the committee annually appointed at the general yearly meeting, and which bears the same relation to the general body of Quakers there assembled, which the commission of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland bears to that venerable body, during the interval of its sittings. These petitioners are appointed to watch over the affairs of the society, and they possess the confidence of the whole sect; and I am thus convinced, from the expression of their opinion, that the Bill will be utterly useless to the society at large. Then who are left to benefit by this measure? One or two scattered congregations of Moravians, and about as many of Separatists; and it is for this handful of men that you are going to stigmatise all the Jews, and all the other sects whom the Bill avowedly and purposely excludes? My Noble Friend will, I know, reply, that in proportion as the numbers comprehended are small, the force of the former argument is lessened, the argument usually drawn from the loss of power to obtain admission for the excluded sects. I grant it; but then the argument against passing the Bill at all, and excluding any sects, acquires tenfold force, — force proportioned to the insignificance of the relief which it actually affords. For, most undeniably, the only shadow of a justification which can be imagined of stigmatising any sects by saying they shall not be relieved, is drawn from a reference to the amount and importance of the body whom you are relieving. Reduce their numbers to a mere handful, and away goes every vestige of a reason for the unjust and invidious measure, and nothing of it remains but its invidious injustice.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE — I beg to be understood, though admitting the force of argument by which the amendment is supported, that I yet consider such an amendment inadmissible in deliberating on such a Bill with such a notice: so large a principle as the Noble and Learned Lord the mover of the amendment contemplates, is inconsistent with a measure so framed.

I certainly must propose the Bill as it stands, as I consider I should endanger its success, and be acting against the interests of those persons comprehended in its provisions, if I were to wait till the proposition that the Jews shall be admitted to the same privileges should stand a chance of being affirmed.

LORD HOLLAND.—I agree that the course which my Noble Friend proposes to take, namely, that of going on with the Bill in its present shape, is better calculated to secure success now, and to extend that success hereafter, than the other course which I, and those who thought with me, feel bound to take in supporting the amendment. No doubt any Noble Lord may support the Bill, without being a jot less friendly to the more extended principle. My more immediate purpose, however, in rising, is, to notice a remark which fell from a Learned and Right Reverend Prelate near me. That Right Reverend Prelate appeared to me to contend, that the purpose of the declaration is to ascertain the Christianity of the person chosen to fill an official situation. Now, to me, it does seem that that is not a matter within the province of human authority. It is contrary to that freedom which forms one of the foundations of Protestantism. To admit such a principle into British legislation, would be a step towards the establishment of an Inquisition. It is directly the reverse of the principles upon which Parliament has always acted, with the exception of that blot upon our legislation, — the sacramental test. English laws, and Protestant and English government, are adverse to inquisitorial legislation. The constitution recognises no power to inquire into men's thoughts on religious subjects. It was on the principle of the right to ascertain men's thoughts. that the Inquisition was founded; and everything like an inquisition I am prepared to resist.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — I regret to have heard what has just fallen from the Noble Lord, as I have purposely avoided putting forth any speculative principles on this subject, intending to reserve myself on those points to a future occasion. I beg to observe, that the declaration merely goes to ascertain whether the party makes a profession of Christianity or not, — nothing more; and I must be allowed to say, that so long as any union subsists between the Church and the State in this country, it can hardly fail to be thought necessary that persons holding office shall at least come within the denomination of Christians.

The clause, as originally framed, was put, and agreed to, the amendment being negatived.

The House then resumed, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

CANADA.

LORD BROUGHAM.— I beg leave to give notice, that I shall put a question to-morrow to my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, respecting those Returns which I moved for a few evenings since.

Adjourned.

The following petitions were severally presented; namely,—

Highway Act,—By Mr. ORMSBY GORE,—of trustees of the Burlton and Llanymyneeh turnpike roads, for amendment.—Referred to the Select Committee on the Highway Act.

Ballot,—By Mr. PHILPOTTS, Mr. LAMBTON, and another Honourable Member, in favour of,—from the city of Gloucester, signed by 1660 persons; and from Lymington and South Shields.

Fishguard Harbour Act,—By Mr. ALDERMAN THOMPSON and Mr. G. F. YOUNG, for repeal of so much thereof as authorises the collection of a passing toll,—from Wexford and Sunderland.

On presenting the petition from Sunderland,—

Mr. ALDERMAN THOMPSON said:—Seeing that, on former occasions, the House would not countenance the principle of a passing toll, I am at a loss to discover why that principle should be extended to the case of Fishguard Harbour; and I cannot refrain from expressing my hope, that the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will not allow this Session to pass over without introducing a Bill to take away this power from the promoters of the Fishguard Harbour improvement.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER.—I beg to say, that the Honourable Member for Scarborough, in the last Session of Parliament, introduced a Bill having a similar object in view, which Bill was thrown out, on the ground that the principle of a passing toll was altogether inadmissible. I therefore presume that the House must have been ignorant of the facts of that case when they allowed this Bill to pass.

Read a first time; to be read a second time on Wednesday, the 21st of February, and to be printed.

ROWLAND MILNER.

SIR E. CODRINGTON. — I hold in my hand a petition which I am very anxious to present and to call the attention of the House to, because it is one which is important, not only to the individual who is the petitioner, but to the service to which I have the honour to belong. It is under these circumstances that I beg leave to make a few observations, in conformity with the notice which I have given. Sir, this is the petition of Mr. Rowland Milner, formerly a lieutenant in the navy, complaining of being deprived of his rank on a charge brought against him after the lapse of eleven years, and praying for inquiry. Mr. Milner states, that when a lieutenant in the navy in the year 1821, he received a letter from the Secretary to the Admiralty, dated the 29th September of that year, charging him with having committed a fraudulent act (of which he had never before heard one word whispered) in the year 1810! Observe, this letter was received in the year 1821 — after a lapse of eleven years from the period when this improper conduct was alleged to have occurred. I will venture to say, that when Honourable Gentlemen opposite shall have heard the whole case, they will admit that the "eternal principles of justice" have in this instance been grossly invaded and violated. The letter to which the petition refers alleged that he, the petitioner, had given a power of attorney to a person named Alexander to receive his half pay, but that he received it himself. Now this is an allegation which might easily be proved or disproved; because no officer can receive his half pay without the application being accompanied by certain affidavits, upon the receipt of which, accompanied by a reference to the books of the department, that half pay is paid; and if an officer receives his half pay personally, he is equally obliged to give a receipt for it; therefore a record is always kept of the sums paid, whether those payments be made to agents or to the parties themselves. Mr. Milner is charged with receiving his half pay himself, and with giving also a power of attorney to receive it to an individual named Alexander. Now had this man presented himself to receive the money, the application would at once have been stopped, for reasons which I shall presently state. He would have been told, "You have presented affidavits, and the documents are so and so, we cannot pay you."

The imputation against Mr. Milner is this, that in the year 1810 he took 12*l.* on the security of his half pay, that is to say, that he raised this by way of loan from a party, being nominally the amount of his half pay from the 13th of March to the 7th of July of that year, but he not being entitled thereto. From the 7th of December, 1809, to the 15th of June, 1810, was the actual period for which he had to receive half pay; so that the affidavit alleged to have been made must have left out a period of ninety-six days prior to the dates given, and twenty-six days short of the real time for which Mr. Milner was entitled to half pay. Therefore any one would have said at once that there must have been a forgery in the case. The persons whose duty it was to pay the half pay on affidavit, &c. would immediately have said, "There must be something wrong here; this power of attorney does not include the whole period for which the party is entitled to receive half pay." Why, Sir, if there were anything fraudulent in the transaction, Mr. Milner was subject to be tried by a court-martial. But what was the answer of this man when he first received the letter from the Admiralty? It was to this effect: "I never heard of the man, or of the transaction referred to." And what other answer, I ask, could he give? But he receives a second letter from the Secretary to the Admiralty, requiring him to furnish further information on the matter. Mr. Milner then says, "I cannot give you further information, for I have never heard of or seen this man." He is, however, immediately struck off the list — he is not brought face to face with his accuser, but is scratched off the list of the navy, and deprived of his half pay. He then says, "Bring me to a court-martial;" and this demand is treated with contempt. He then says, "Well, if you will not bring me to a court-martial, prosecute this man in the civil courts, — let me be brought against him on oath." But he is told, "Oh, no! you cannot do this." There are, Sir, many peculiarities in this case. I believe the man is as innocent of the charge imputed to him as I am myself; and I never heard of Mr. Milner till his case was investigated by me. I beg to say, that I have no personal interest in the matter, except to do justice to the aggrieved party in the case. The petitioner only asks to be brought face to face with his accuser. I should observe, that this case was taken up very warmly by Mr. ex-sheriff Parkins, but, as the result has proved, without success. The Solicitor to the Navy states that Mr. Milner received this half pay personally, and that he then went abroad. Now, a fraud is of course implied in this declaration; but how stands the fact? Why, Sir, Mr. Milner first received his half pay in the year 1811; and, moreover, if ever such an affidavit had been presented as that which is alleged to have been made, he would have lost ninety-six days' half pay. Now, one has a right to look at a man's motives, particularly when he seeks to perpetrate a fraud. It is clear that men are always actuated by some motive, either good or bad. It is said that the petitioner gave this affidavit and power of attorney for the purpose of raising a loan of 12*l.* on his half pay; whereas, by carrying a proper affidavit to any of the dockyards, he would have received that to which he was really entitled, namely, 40*l.*, and upwards. Paymaster Grey says that Milner never received his half pay till the year 1811, when he was disabled. Now, Honourable Gentlemen will be surprised to hear that I have the affidavit said to have been made — that I can produce it, and that that, together with the power of attorney, both documents being forged, are now in my pocket. But supposing, for the sake of argument, that a fraud was committed, how happens it that it was never found out till eleven years after it is said to have occurred? How such an error could ever have been committed is, perhaps, not my affair, but I say, the whole transaction is discreditable to the board under whose management it could be suffered to occur. Now, to show, on the other hand, that forgeries are occasionally practised in these cases, I know of an instance which occurred in 1833 or 1834, of a surgeon's assistant, who had been in the West Indies, who, on his arrival home, found that his money had been already paid under an error. But, Sir, I should mention that there was a Captain Wilson in the royal navy, whose word, I think, might be taken under any circumstances——

The SPEAKER. — Does the matter upon which the Honourable and Gallant Officer is about to speak refer to the immediate subject of the petition, because otherwise he is out of order?

SIR E. CODRINGTON. — It is in explanation of the statements contained in the petition; and the petitioner, indeed, refers to Captain Wilson for the truth of that which he alleges. This officer contrived that Mr. Milner and Mr. Alexander should come on board his ship and meet. "How do you do, Mr. Milner?" said Captain Wilson; and then turning round to the other party, "What," said he, " you not know Mr. Milner?" "Oh," said the other, "I know that when he was first lieutenant of such and such a ship, Captain so and so," &c. Now both names given by Alexander were wrong. Sir, Mr. Milner asks the House to give him such relief as it may deem fit; and I do think it most important that when we hear so much of the eternal principles of justice, we should give to this much-injured man that relief which he seeks at our hands.

The SPEAKER. — What other relief does he really seek than that of pecuniary relief?

SIR E. CODRINGTON. — The restoring him to his rank in the navy, Sir. I do not mean to say that such a consummation may not involve a question of money; but I am sure, that if the House are alive to the hardships of this gentleman's case, they will do justice. The man is almost deranged in consequence of being thus unjustly disgraced and deprived of his half pay. I will not trouble the House further than by saying, that if any Honourable Gentleman wishes to see the papers, I shall be glad to show them to him.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—I have very great pleasure in seconding the prayer of this petition.

Ordered to lie on the Table.

DUDLEY ELECTION RECOGNISANCES.

Mr. PRYME. — I have to move, Sir, that the petition of William Meryweather Turner, of Overbury Court, in the county of Worcester, which was printed with the Votes on Friday last, be now considered. That petition, it will be recollected, prays for further time for amending and entering into his sureties.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I wish to ask the Honourable Member, if he is prepared with any evidence to justify the House in taking the step proposed? I know of no case in which a motion of this nature has been agreed to without some evidence being produced.

Mr. PRYME. — I am prepared with evidence. I move that Mr. William Meryweather Turner be called in.

Mr. W. Meryweather Turner called in and examined at the bar, by

Mr. PRYME and other HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Is a barrister at law. Is the petitioning candidate against the late return for the borough of Dudley. Gave in the name of Montague John Meryweather as one of the sureties. Mr. Montague John Meryweather is witness's brother; his brother has adopted another name, that of Turner, in addition to his name of Meryweather. He obtained the King's licence to use the name of Turner, in consequence of certain property being willed to him on that condition. Witness's brother does not adopt the name of Turner generally, but only in chancery proceedings. He signs his name usually as Montague J. Meryweather, and is known as Captain Meryweather. He has been three times gazetted as Montague J. Meryweather. Witness considered it proper to give in the name by which his brother was generally known. The name of Turner was not given in, because there might have been some difficulty on the part of the examiners in knowing who was the party. Witness was not present when his brother was called upon to sign the affidavit. Captain Meryweather resides at Overbury Court, near Tewkesbury. Resides there with his father, Mr. William Stroms Meryweather. Witness's brother was gazetted as Montague J. Meryweather, subsequently to the issue of the letters patent, authorising him to take the name of Turner. Has seen his brother sign his name three different ways: namely, in ordinary proceedings, Montague J. Meryweather; in the Chancery suit in which he is engaged, Montague John Meryweather Turner; and occasionally witness has seen him sign his name Meryweather Turner only. Witness's brother is not a housekeeper.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw. The objection was made to the name by the examiners.

Mr. PRYME. — No objection has been offered against the second security. I will presently move that the time for the sureties entering into their recognisances in the case of the Dudley Election Petition be extended till 26th of December.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I have a witness in attendance who has made inquiries, and the evidence he is prepared to give is, I understand, directly contrary to that which the petitioner has just given at the bar of the House. I move that Mr. John Campbell be called in.

Mr. John Wilson Campbell called in, and examined by SIR T. FREMANTLE and other Honourable Members. — Is a surveyor of roads; resides at Dudley. Has been to Overbury in Worcestershire to make inquiries respecting the family of Meryweather. Inquired for Overbury Court, but it was not known; found Overbury House. Inquired for Captain Meryweather; could find no such name; found Captain Turner, residing at Overbury House. Was informed that he had lately come there from Cheltenham. Was informed that Captain Turner, Mr. Turner, Mrs. Turner, and Miss Turner, lived at Overbury House. Made no inquiries as to the solvency of Captain Turner. Has no knowledge of what property he may possess. Witness directed his inquiries simply as to whether such a person as Captain Meryweather was residing at Overbury, or not. Found no person to answer the description of Captain Montague Meryweather. Witness obtained his information from the people of the village. Did not go to Overbury House. Was four or five hours in the village. Has no knowledge of the persons of whom he made inquiries; they were the inhabitants of the village. Inquired at the first house at which the information was likely to be obtained; made no selection. Does not know whether or not there is a posting house or an inn at Overbury. Put up at a public house, and made inquiries of the landlord. Went to Overbury to make these inquiries at the request of several respectable persons at Dudley. Came to town for the purpose of giving evidence in this case. Saw the postman who delivers the letters at Overbury; he told witness that the letters were addressed to Mr., to Captain, and to Mrs. Turner, but not to the name of Meryweather.

Witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. PHILLPOTTS. — I wish to state that some time since I was introduced to Mr. Meryweather, senior, as Mr. Meryweather. I have dined with him, and know him only as Mr. Meryweather. I believe his son goes by the name of Captain Turner.

Mr. HUME. — I beg also to observe that, during the late general election, I received a letter from Mr. Meryweather, the father. It was signed W. S. Meryweather; the name of Turner was not added.

Mr. PRYME. — I wish to ask the first witness one question. I will move, therefore, that he be recalled.

Mr. William Meryweather Turner again called to the bar, and examined by

Mr. PRYME. — The name of witness's father is Meryweather; he has never gone by the name of Turner, the junior branches of the family, only, having been directed by the will to use that name. The name of his father's place of residence is Overbury Court; witness himself resides there when in the country. Overbury Court is rented by witness's father from Mr. Martin, the Member for Tewkesbury.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. PRYME. — I will now move that the time for the sureties entering into their recognisances in the case of the Dudley election petition be extended to Tuesday, the 26th of December.

On the question being put, —

SIR T. FREMANTLE said: — I cannot see how this indulgence can be granted. If a gentleman signs his name Meryweather instead of Turner, which was the name put in, and an exception is taken by the examiners, it does not appear to me that by merely extending the time for completing the recognisances, we shall get rid of the difficulty. The name is signed Meryweather when it should have been Turner — a complete change of the name therefore is necessary.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I would suggest that the remedy is this, — as Mr. Turner and Mr. Meryweather Turner are one and the same person, we should direct the examiners to try the validity of the surety, and not to change the name. The only question for the examiners is the solvency of the parties, they have not to do with the legal points of the case.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — If I recollect the words of the Act aright, we have no discretion in this matter. It appears to me, and I would submit it to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that the general convenience would be consulted by leaving this question entirely in the hands of the examiners appointed by the House, be their decision what it may.

Mr. PRYME.—The Honourable Member for Buckingham and his party took a very different view in the case of the Pontefract petition, on Friday last. That case was less strong than the present, yet the House granted the indulgence prayed.

SIR T. FREMANTLE.—I was not in the House on the occasion to which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman alludes.

Mr. PRYME.—I thought the Honourable Baronet was in the House during the discussion on the Pontefract case. At any rate he differs from what was then the opinion of those Honourable Members with whom he usually acts. Here we havè a case which I think calls for the indulgence of the House. A gentleman has given in his name as a surety in prosecuting this petition, and having the King's letters patent to take a name which he does not usually adopt—he very properly gives in that name by which he is best known. Now, against this we have the evidence of Mr. Campbell, a Quaker. I know that Quakers are sometimes the best witnesses, but at others they are the worst. He has stated that he went to Overbury—that he could not find the name of Meryweather—that the persons residing at Overbury House go by the name of Turner, not of Meryweather; whereas we have the evidence not only of the petitioning candidate, but also the testimony of two Honourable Members of this House, that the father is known by no other name than that of Meryweather. I say, therefore, that the testimony of the witness Campbell is inconsistent. I appeal to the House whether ample ground has not been shown that the justice of the case will best be consulted by extending the time, as I have moved?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—Perhaps it is unfortunate that the House has no equitable jurisdiction in these matters. But it appears to me that there is a mode of disposing of this case without any difficulty, that is, by enlarging the time for entering the recognisances. An opportunity will thus be afforded to the parties of making the necessary alteration in the name; and the solvency of the parties can be ascertained by the examiners in the mean time.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—The House ought to be quite sure that the signature given in is that which will bind the party as a surety. Here we have a case of an individual assuming three different names. He has not, in this instance, signed the name which it appears he is accustomed to use in signing legal documents; this does appear to me somewhat suspicious, and requires explanation. My opinion is, that the better course would be to postpone this discussion until we can have the account which Captain Turner himself may have to give of this alteration in his usual signature. I merely suggest this; I do not press it upon the House.

Mr. COURTENAY.—This indulgence has been asked as a mere matter of form, but it appears to me to be a matter of substance, and not of form. We find that a person is entitled to certain property (having, I believe, no other property), only on the condition of his using the name of Turner; he, however, signs his name as Meryweather. Now, I am not prepared to say, that he has not forfeited his right, under the will, by so signing his name.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS.—Oh! oh!

The SOLICITOR GENERAL.—The duty of the examiners is to look to the sufficiency of the sureties, and their decision in that point is final. I would suggest to the House, as the case of Friday last was nearly similar to this, that what was done then should be done now. I think we ought to grant the extension of time to the 26th of December, as asked. In this case, the examiners have refused to inquire into the sufficiency of the sureties. Now, if the House is satisfied that no fraud was intended on the part of the petitioning candidate, or the surety, I do not see why they should not extend the time, in order that the examiners may make the necessary inquiry. It does not matter what name a man signs to the document; if he were to sign "John Noakes," he would be equally liable, provided the fact of signing were proved. But it is necessary that he sign his proper name, in order to give the parties an opportunity of examining into his solvency.

Mr. MACLEAN.—The case of Friday last and that now before us are not at all analogous,—the distinction is obvious. In the one case, the surety gave in his proper name, but having two places of residence, he stated only one of them. But here a man, having three different names, gives in one, and that not his legal name. Is he to be inquired for as Captain Montague Turner, Montague Meryweather, or Meryweather Turner? I think no case for the interference of the House has been made out.

Mr. C. WOOD. — The name he gave in was the name he is generally known by, but he signs a legal document by his legal name. There is nothing more common; and I can refer to a case in point, — that of Lord Stuart Wortley: his legal name is Mackenzie, but he never uses this name except in signing legal documents.

SIR R. PEEL. — The argument of the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down tells against himself. Lord Wortley, it appears, invariably signs to a legal document his legal name of Mackenzie; but in this case the legal name was not signed. The Act states that, at the time of lodging the petition, the name of the surety shall be delivered in writing to the Speaker's clerk; that of course implies the legal name, not the name that the individual may be known by only at his own residence in the country. In the present case, the wrong name has been given in, and the examiners have, therefore, refused the surety. It appears, then, to me, that the House has no further jurisdiction. Now, we must look at what may be the effect of this motion, as a precedent. The House has to consider whether, by thus relaxing its rules, it is not holding out a premium to fraud in future cases. In my opinion, the provision of the Act which regulates such proceedings is both wise and legitimate; and if set aside, or relaxed without much caution, there would, I think, be great inconvenience thrown in the way of the examiners, in inquiring into the sufficiency of the sureties in election petitions. At the same time, if it shall appear, after proper inquiry, that in this case no fraud was intended, and that there can be no danger in the precedent, then it is competent for the House to overrule the decision of the examiners. Call on the party whose name has been given in; let him explain; and if the House is then satisfied that it was a bonâ fide transaction, and that there has been no attempt at concealment, then let us take the proper steps to do justice in this particular case, and to prevent the precedent being used for the purposes of fraud in after times. But, Sir, upon a matter of so much importance, I would respectfully submit, Sir, that we ought to have your opinion; for by thus suspending little by little the provisions of the law, we may carry relaxation to a very dangerous extent.

The SPEAKER. — Being called upon to state my opinion on this matter, I must do so as my conscience dictates, however sorry I may be to express an opinion which is possibly at variance with the feelings of a majority in the House. I consider that, in every transaction of this kind, it is of importance to adhere rigidly to the rule of law when once laid down, because this, in the end, will prove the best way to insure fairness and justice to all parties. In the case now before the House, a witness has been called in and examined; he states that he gave in the name of a person, as one of his sureties to an election petition, whose name had been changed to Turner by royal licence, by which name he signs all legal documents, not as an addition to, but as a substitution for, his original patrimonial name. Yet this person, being fully aware of the circumstance, puts in the name of this very party as his surety, with a signature at variance with that to which he is legally entitled, and which he ordinarily uses in legal documents. I really think that the general interests of this House would be better consulted by adhering rigidly to the rule.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I will not offer an opinion as to the rule which has been laid down; but I do say, that we had better adhere rigidly to that rule, or admit a relaxation in all cases in which the justice of the case requires it. It is, perhaps, to be rgretted that, on Friday night last, or rather on Saturday morning, after one o'clock, when a motion somewhat similar in its object to the present, in reference to the Pontefract election, was brought forward, the strict rule was not rigidly adhered to. I was not in the House on that occasion, having left it, after a previous long debate, at one o'clock; but I understand the case, as described by the petition, to be this: — that a Mr. Proctor, whose name had been given as one of the sureties in the Pontefract petition, as been described as "of South Bank, Regent's Park, and not carrying on any trade or business whatever there."

Several Honourable Members on the Opposition benches. — No, no!

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Yes: the words of the petition say so; and the prayer of the petition is, that further time may be given to amend the description of the party in question. This was the case on Friday night, and the House granted the application. What is the case now? A person gave, as one of his sureties, the name of his brother, who, by royal licence, had taken the name of Turner, which he adopts, as he is obliged to do, in all legal proceedings, but who usually goes by the name of Meryweather in the ordinary intercourse of life, and who has three times been gazetted to the commission of the peace under that name. Now, I believe that it is no unusal thing, though certainly not quite regular, for persons who have changed their names by royal licence, for particular objects, to retain in many cases their original name. An instance of this kind just occurs to me: it is that of Lord Howard, who, when Mr. Howard, got the royal licence to adopt the name of Molyneux, and yet, I believe, that he never went or was known by that name in society. What I think, however, that the House should give its attention to in matters of this kind is this, that it should not enforce, as a rigid rule, one night, what another day it has relaxed; that it should not, on Friday, indulge in what all considered an equitable relaxation of the letter of the law, and, on Monday, repent of what it has done, and say, now is the time to be rigid.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — Being one of those who voted, on Friday night, in favour of the indulgence granted in the Pontefract case, I will state to the House the grounds on which I did so; because, not only was the solvency of the surety undisputed, but the Noble Lord the Member for North Devon bore his testimony in favour of Mr. Proctor's respectability. The opinion of the Noble Lord induced me to believe that there was an accidental omission in the description of the surety, and that the justice of the case demanded some relaxation of the rule. I certainly should not have voted as I did, but for the explanation of the Noble Lord; I am, however, of opinion, that the rule now laid down by the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair, is that which we ought to adopt; and so convinced am I that the general convenience of the House will be best consulted by following that, that if a motion be made for rescinding the decision of Friday night, and the House is prepared to adopt the advice of the Chair in this and all future cases, I shall think it my duty to support it with my vote.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I am inclined to agree with what has fallen from the Right Honourable and Gallant General (Sir H. Hardinge). I think that the advice that has been given from the chair is the best that can be adopted in such cases; I thought so on Friday night, but it was not then the opinion of the other side of the House. I wish to have the opinion of the Chair, whether the House has the power to rescind its vote of Friday evening?

The SPEAKER. — I see no reason why the House may not rescind its own vote; the effect on both parties would be the same. The ground upon which I have stated my opinion with regard to the propriety of adhering with strictness to the rule, I was anxious to take, because the number of appeals from the decisions of the examiners has been so many, during the present Session, that it really interposes great difficulty to the proper discharge of their duty. If they are to have their decisions made the subject of discussion and revision by the House, great inconvenience will be occasioned, and we shall detract from the authority of the examiners, appointed by the House, as well as render their labours nugatory.

SIR T. FREMANTLE.—If the House is to make compromises of this sort, we ought to retrace our steps, not only in the Pontefract case, but also in the Bodmin case; the laxity there was much greater than in either of the others, and I cannot consent to reverse the decision in one, without pursuing the same course with regard to the other.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I think nothing can be more unjust than to make compromises with parties. If we make this compromise,—if we go back to reverse our decisions in the Pontefract and the Bodmin cases,—we must go back to all other cases from the commencement of the Session, and undo all that we have hitherto done. With respect to the Pontefract and Dudley cases, I repudiate all idea of compromise; I do not know the parties, but I think it is due to them that the whole merits should come before the House. If the statements which have been made to me be correct, the two cases stand upon very different grounds: the one is a bonâ fide mistake; the other, as I hope to show, when the motion of which I have given notice comes before the House, as complete a case of fraud and oppression as has ever been heard of. I think that every case of this nature should stand entirely upon its own merits.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — The House should recollect that, in all these cases, we are bound to act in a judicial capacity. I am prepared to extend relief where it ought to be given; but, in the present case, I think there is an objection which must be deemed fatal to the present motion. In my opinion, the present case differs much from the Pontefract and Bodmin cases.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Sir, although I fully concur in the opinion that you have expressed, that if we were to alter the existing law in all cases, much inconvenience would be created; I think the House should look at what was the intention of the Act in giving it the discretionary power to relax the rule of law in such cases; and that object I apprehend to be, that the cases of election petitions should not be thrown out upon mere formal or technical grounds. I, for one, should think it objectionable, if the House were deprived of the power of granting indulgences in bonâ fide cases. I hope, when the Honourable Member for Liskeard's Bill is brought forward, that some regulation will be adopted which will supersede the necessity of discussions of this kind. The rule that ought to govern us is, that care should be taken that the object of the law be fufilled, and that no election petition be proceeded with, unless bonâ fide security be given to the sitting Member, that responsible parties are ready to pay the costs, provided such petitions should be declared "frivolous and vexatious." But, on the other hand, where the intention of the parties is to prosecute the petitions, and their grounds of opposition are well founded, I think the House should reserve to itself the power to extend indulgence where all that is sought is the correction of mere accidental errors. I will not enter into the merits of the Pontefract case, but I must say that, in my opinion, the case now before us appears to be totally free from any implication of deceit or fraud, and therefore I think that it is a fit occasion for the indulgence of the House.

The House then divided: —

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

PONTEFRACT ELECTION RECOGNISANCES.

On the motion of Mr. AGLIONBY, order for considering petition of James Coppock (presented 16th of December), read.

Petition of Henry Gompertz, Esquire, stating that Richard Bartholomew Moss was employed by him as his agent, to superintend his petition. — To lie on the Table.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Sir, in presenting my motion to the House to rescind the Order made on Friday for enlarging the time for putting in the recognisances in this case, it is not my intention to impugn the decision of the House, or to give any pledge as to how I shall ultimately vote, because until the circumstances connected with this subject are proved, I can arrive at no final determination respecting it. I feel bound, however, considering the serious nature of the motion which I am about to submit, affecting as it does individuals out of this House, as well as what has passed within it, to make a short statement of the facts bearing upon the present question. The House will recollect that the notice they received of this subject was through a petition presented from Mr. Gompertz,—in consequence of some doubts having been raised as to the description of Mr. Proctor, one of the sureties. Now, Sir, on the occasion of the discussion upon that petition, a Mr. Moss was the only witness called, —neither Mr. Proctor nor Mr. Florence was examined. The only evidence before the House was that of Moss, and on that evidence, such as it was, the House unanimously rose and said, "We have heard enough; we will agree to the proposition for allowing time to make the correction required." Now, was not this unanimous decision come to because it was considered by the House that the party seeking the indulgence stood in a fair situation to claim their consideration, and to appeal to their equitable jurisdiction? I ask whether the House did not come to that decision because they believed that Mr. Moss acted as parliamentary agent to Mr. Gompertz, though it was not clear from his testimony whether he did so in conjunction with Mr. Florence, or whether Mr. Gompertz was his client, or, as he expressed it, "might be" his client, according to the proceedings, at a future stage? The statement of the Noble Lord the Member for North Devon, that he knew the surety to be a respectable man, did not weigh with me on that occasion, so much as did the evidence of Mr. Moss, that he was the parliamentary agent in this case. Now, my present object is to show, and I will do this on the evidence of the gentleman who is engaged as parliamentary agent for the sitting Member, and who has made inquiries, that Mr. Moss is not the parliamentary agent, the sureties having been handed in by Mr. Florence, as agent for the petitioner, and signed in his handwriting. I will, now, briefly lay before the House the circumstances under which the election took place. It appears from the accounts which I have seen in the newspapers, that at the late Pontefract election there were two candidates on one side and two on the other. One of these was Mr. H. Gompertz, who has petitioned the House as an aggrieved candidate. Now, it is important that it should be ascertained whether he is entitled to appear in that character, and stand in the position of a person who, rectus in curiâ, seeks the indulgence of Parliament to correct an error as to one of his sureties. I understand — my authority being no other than the statement in the public prints — that Mr. Gompertz was, at the time of the election, and has been, up to the present time, imprisoned in the Queen's Bench prison, for a debt of 16,000*l.* It has been further asserted, that he was proposed by a non-elector and seconded by a non-elector. In the first instance, I was informed that there was no poll demanded on the part of Mr. Gompertz, but I have since understood that he polled one voter. Now, who will the House suppose was the non-elector who proposed Mr. Gompertz? Why, the very Mr. Moss who, on Friday last, at the bar his House, represented himself to be mentary agent for the petitioner. turday, in consequence of what d on Friday, Mr. Coppock wrote to Mr. Florence, who acted as agent in handing in the sureties to the examiners, a note to this effect: —

> DEAR SIR, — Your name appears as agent in the Pontefract election for the petitioner. You acted as such before the examiners into the sureties; and yet a Mr. Moss states that he is agent. It has been suggested, that Mr. Moss is in partnership with you. Is this the case? And will you have the goodness to inform me, what Mr. Moss has really to do with the matter?
> (Signed) JAS. COPPOCK.

To this note Mr. Florence returned the following answer: —

> DEAR SIR, — In answer to your note, I have no hesitation in saying, that I became agent at the request of Mr. Moss, with the understanding that he was unable himself to be agent, on account of being a candidate at the election. You are quite in error in supposing that Mr. Moss is in partnership with me. I am sole agent to this petition, and in that character signed the sureties. Yours, &c.
> JAS. FLORENCE.

Now it becomes a question, are the parties, against whom a competent tribunal has decided that one of their sureties, Mr. Proctor, is wrongly described, entitled to relief through the equitable jurisdiction of the House, before it is proved that the person petitioning stood in the bonâ fide situation of candidate, not a mere stray candidate, picked up in the streets, or in the Queen's Bench, and proposed for the mere purpose of committing a fraud on the electors, and with the view of abusing the indulgence of this House? I trust that Mr. Moss will be here to answer the imputations urged against him. I want to hear Mr. Moss explain this contradiction to the evidence he gave on Friday. Certainly he did not say that he was the sole agent in this case, but that he acted in conjunction with Mr. Florence; and here we have a letter from Mr. Florence denying that Mr. Moss has in any way the agency, and that he himself is the sole agent for the petitioner. No one who heard Mr. Moss give his evidence at the bar but must have been struck with the extreme reluctance with which he stated the name of the party who employed him. I think this is a case of strong suspicion. If, however, it should appear the relief which has been extended was no more than the justice of the case demanded, I should say, "Do not depart from the resolution which you have taken respecting it;" but if the grounds on which it was so given were fallacious and untenable, — if this indulgence was sought for as a means of acting unjustly and oppressively towards the sitting Member and the electors, — I am sure the House will never consent to bolster up a case to gratify any individual. I have one other remark to make before I conclude, with respect to the error one of the sureties, it appears, committed as to the description of Mr. Proctor. That individual has described himself in the present petition as a gentleman residing in Regent's Park, whereas in the case of another petition, where he is also a surely, he states that he is a bootmaker. This circumstance has also an air of suspicion, and, with the other facts which I have stated, calls, I think, for investigation. I will now move that Mr. Coppock be called in and examined.

Mr. James Coppock called in, and examined upon oath by

The SPEAKER. — I am a solicitor, residing in Cleveland Row, Westminster.

By Mr. AGLIONBY. — I have acted as agent for Mr. Stanley, the sitting Member for Pontefract, since the petition was presented against his return. There is only one petition, which is from Henry Gompertz, who states himself to have been a candidate; on Saturday morning last, having heard that the time for entering into the recognisances had been enlarged, I went to the usual office, and saw that Mr. James Florence had signed his name as the agent of Mr. Gompertz. The notice of sureties was signed by him. I then wrote to Mr. Florence on the subject, requesting to know whether Mr. Moss was concerned in the business, and received an answer from him, stating that he (Mr. Florence) was the sole agent, and had become so at the request of Mr. Moss. In another case, Mr. Proctor, one of the sureties for prosecuting this petition, has described himself as a bootmaker; that is in the case of the Canterbury petition; whereas in the Pontefract case he describes himself as a gentleman.

By Mr. MACLEAN. — Are you retained as agent in other election petition cases besides the one for Pontefract? — I am.

In how many are you retained? — In several.

In a large number? — I am retained in several cases, and should be happy to be retained in many more.

In how many are you retained?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I object to that question.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — If the Honourable Member is prepared to say that his question has reference to the case immediately under the consideration of the House, I am not aware that any legal objection can be urged against it. But I think the House ought not to call on the witness to expose the extent or poverty of his professional business for the mere purpose of shaking his testimony, by causing him, in the hurry of the moment, to answer five or six, when it may be that he is engaged in fifteen or sixteen. This is a matter with reference to which all courts and tribunals exercise their right of interference with the greatest possible delicacy and caution.

Mr. MACLEAN. — My reason for asking the question was because I thought the witness went out of his way in stating what occurred in connection with another petition in which he had no interest as agent. I have a reason for asking the question, but I am not aware that I am bound to state it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — If the Honourable Member persists in putting the question, it must be supposed that he has bonâ fide grounds for thinking it applicable to the case.

Mr. SHEIL. — It strikes me that the question is not relevant. It appears that the witness was employed as agent in the Pontefract case, and that the two sureties for the petition, Messrs. Bevan and Proctor, are also sureties in the Canterbury case. The witness found a discrepancy in the description of the surety Proctor, as given in both cases, and thus the Pontefract case and the Canterbury case became connected. But that is no reason why the witness should be called on to answer questions as to his connection with other cases in which he may be engaged.

Mr. JERVIS. — I think nothing was more natural than that Mr. Coppock should have thought it necessary to be present while the recognisance was taken in the Canterbury petition. He found that in that case the same sureties were offered as in the Pontefract case, and it was most proper that he should know whether the property which was made responsible in the one case, was also sufficient for the security in the other. The case is analogous to the taking of bail in the Court of Queen's Bench. An attorney served with notice to attend in court to receive bail, would ill discharge his duty to his client, if, hearing that the same bail had been offered in another case, he did not attend in order to ascertain whether the same property was made liable in the two cases. The question which has been put to the witness appears to me wholly inadmissible.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I am of opinion that the Learned Member for Oxford has a right to try the credit of the witness, and for that reason I think the question proposed to be put a perfectly proper one. If it should turn out that the witness is employed as agent in many cases, his statement with regard to any particular one might be considered as liable to inaccuracy.

Mr. BERNAL. — It appears to me to be a most extraordinary mode of testing the credit of the witness by the accuracy of his recollection with regard to the particular number of cases in which he may be engaged. Suppose the witness should say he is retained in eight cases, and it should turn out that he is engaged in seven or nine cases, would the Honourable Member say that on that account the witness should not be considered credible?

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I wish to say, in explanation, that the Honourable Gentleman has entirely mistaken my meaning. What I said was, that the witness, having a great amount of business to attend to at the same moment, might naturally be the less accurate in his statement with regard to any one particular case.

Mr. GODSON.—It appears to me that if the question was framed solely with a view to ascertain the amount and nature of Mr. Coppock's business, it ought not to be pressed; but I can imagine that the Honourable Member had in view a more extended and proper intention. It struck me that the Honourable Member sought to elicit whether this agent was not a person employed, generally, by some society or association to carry on election petitions. I can suppose a course of examination starting from such a question, which might lead to such a discovery. Suppose the witness should answer that he was engaged in fourteen or fifteen cases; and then, in reply to further questions, to state that he knew nothing whatever of the petitioners whose cases he was employed professionally to conduct, and that he was the retained and paid parliamentary agent of some society or other association, with the object of carrying on election petitions, without any expense to, and perhaps without any authority from, the nominal petitioners. Now, the importance of such a disclosure is so obvious, that I think an Honourable Member might be allowed even to travel a little out of his way to get at that information.

Mr. MACLEAN. — The Honourable and Learned Member has correctly stated my intention. I think it right, when a person comes here to petition this House, and addresses himself to us as the agent for the petition, when in fact he is not employed by the petitioner, and stands here to speak against a man who is so employed, that this House should exercise its power of examination in testing its veracity. I therefore shall persevere in my question; and for that purpose I move that the witness be recalled.

Mr. Coppock was then recalled, and examined by Mr. MACLEAN. — Are you engaged as agent in a number of election petition cases? — I am.

Will you state the number?

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, I shall take the sense of the House on the propriety of putting that question.

Strangers were then ordered to withdraw, but no division took place.

The motion, "That the witness be called in, and asked, In how many petitions are you engaged?" put, and negatived.

SIR R. PEEL. — I think, if the witness Moss was examined between one and two o'clock in the morning, when very few Honourable Members were present, that I and those Honourable Members who were not then present ought to have an opportunity of hearing his evidence. If, therefore, Mr. Moss is in attendance, I would propose that he be called in.

Mr. Richard Bartholomew Moss was then called in, and examined by SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I am agent for the Pontefract election petition. I account for having allowed James Florence to put in his name as agent, because I requested him to do so; he having superintended a portion of my business. I entertained an objection to my name appearing as the agent, because I had taken a prominent part at the Pontefract election. I am, to all intents and purposes, the agent in this case; and Mr. Florence has no interest in the matter, pro or con.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—You, then, are the sole agent, and Florence is only the apparent agent?—Yes.

Do you not consider that a fraud?—No; I was present when the sureties were put in.

Did you not state, on Friday, that you yourself put in the sureties?—I was present when the sureties were put in.

Have you taken any part in these proceedings as the agent, beyond attending at the office with Mr. Florence when the names of the sureties were given in?—Yes, I assisted in drawing up the petition, and in arranging the various matters connected with it.

If your object was only, as you have stated, that your name should not appear as the agent, how was it that you applied to Mr. Florence to draw up or assist in drawing up the petition?—I do so in all cases.

Are you aware of the note that has been read to the House, in which Mr. Florence denies that you have any thing to do with this petition as the agent; and in which he says that you are not in partnership with him?—I am not his partner; I merely employed him to assist me in this case, as I do in others.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—I move that the letter addressed by Mr. Coppock to Mr. Florence, and the answer of Mr. Florence, be read.

The letter and the reply were then read.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—Now you hear that Mr. Florence distinctly denies that you are the agent in the case of the Pontefract petition; or that you are his partner. Do you still maintain that you are the agent?—I do; Mr. Florence put in his name because he is employed by me to superintend a part of my business.

When and by whom were you employed?—I was employed by Mr. Gompertz about a week before the Pontefract election.

Where was Mr. Gompertz then?—Where he now is.

In the rules of the Queen's Bench?—Yes.

Are you aware that Mr. Gompertz is in confinement for debts amounting to 16,000*l.*?—I do not know the amount.

Who requested you to go to Mr. Gompertz?—Dr. Boyton.

What for?—To be allowed to act as agent for his election.

What election?—No mention was made of any election.

Then any election was meant that might serve his purpose?—Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN.—I object to the question.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—Unless the House is assured that the petitioner, Gompertz, has acted in an open and fair way, the House cannot grant him the relief. If it can be proved that the petitioner was ready to be a candidate for any place, whatever, that might be fixed on for him, the first link in the chain of fraud will thus, I think, be shown. If the House object to the question, I will not put it.

SIR T. FREMANTLE.—The question for the House to consider is,—whether the time for entering into recognisances ought to be enlarged, on the ground of a misdescription having been given of one of the sureties. With that question the fact of the witness having acted as agent at any particular election has, I submit, nothing to do; and I am unwilling to see the time of the House wasted by irrelevant questions.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—I thought the question I put was one of some importance, but I will not press it.

The witness was then recalled, and examined by

Mr. AGLIONBY.—Were you yourself a candidate for the borough of Pontefract at the late election?—I was not; but when I arrived there, I found that a canvass had been going on in my favour.

Then, when you arrived at Pontefract, you appeared there as the agent of Mr. Gompertz?—Yes.

You proposed Mr. Gompertz on the hustings, I believe?—I did.

Are you an elector of the borough of Pontefract?—I am not.

How came you, not being an elector, to propose Mr. Gompertz at the hustings?—I was told, at first, that I could not propose him: but the nomination was ultimately accepted.

Had you any communication, in your is strongly tainted with fraud; and if we are not to inquire into the question of fraud, then there is nothing for the House to decide. In law, if fraud can be proved, the parties applying are not entitled to relief; and if not in law, certainly they have no such title in equity. The House has granted a certain indulgence, supposing this to be a bonâ fide proceeding, and I can see no injustice in requiring the parties to show that no fraud has been practised.

Mr. C. BULLER.—When I went to dinner, I left the Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir R. Peel) arguing in favour of a strict application of the rule laid down by the House in regard to sureties, and now that I have come back from dinner, I find the same Right Honourable Gentleman arguing for a lenient application of the rule. I do not understand this change. The only difference I can see is, that the question in the former case related to Dudley, and the present has reference to Pontefract; and the Right Honourable Baronet may be more inclined to favour a Tory candidate than another.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. C. BULLER.—In my opinion, there do appear sufficient grounds for believing this to be a case of wilful mistake, for the purpose of deceiving parties, and investigation ought therefore to take place. I wish to have it fully explained why Mr. Proctor was one day designated as a bootmaker, and on another as a gentleman. I have no desire to bind men down to the strict letter of the law, but the present case certainly calls for examination.

SIR R. PEEL.—In this instance, I think the judgment of Philip sober better than that of Philip after dinner. (Laughter.) What I stated was, that the examination ought to be limited to the question, whether Mr. Proctor's designation was stated in two different ways with a fraudulent intention, or not? And I also stated, that I did not think it fair or proper to inquire, whether Gompertz had been, and was, in the Queen's Bench, or whether Moss was, or was not, an elector of Pontefract, and had a right to nominate one of the candidates. It does appear somewhat strange that, after Honourable Gentlemen opposite have got their vote in the Dudley case, they should now wish to apply a different rule in the Pontefract case.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER.—I rise to order. The Right Honourable Baronet is transgressing the usual limits of explanation.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I do not think it a safe course for the House to enter into questions relating to the character of, and the proceedings at, elections. In considering a motion, such as the one now before it, these are not proper questions for the House to entertain. In the present case I put my opinion upon this issue. If I am persuaded that the names were given in to the examiners in full faith by the parties, and that, objection having been made, their only object is to amend the description,—then, I say, the House, having already granted indulgence in another case, ought to grant it in this. But if, on the other hand, it can be shown that the different description of the same party was given with the view to mislead, and that it was intended as a fraud on the House,—then I think that would be a sufficient reason for rescinding the Order of the other night. But unless it can be proved that the intention was to mislead, I, for one, am not prepared to go to the extent that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's motion proposes.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—It was my intention to show that there were circumstances of fraud existing in this case, but I have been prevented from doing so by constant interruptions. If it is the wish of the House, I will give the matter up for a night; and as such seems to be the desire of Honourable Gentlemen in my vicinity, I will beg leave to move that this debate be adjourned till to-morrow, in order that Benbow and Proctor may be brought before the House.

On the question being put,—

Mr. MACLEAN said:—There has not been the slightest evidence adduced that Moss has any connection with the Canterbury petition, or that he suggested the names of the sureties in that case. The Honourable and Learned Member must surely be aware that the petitions from this side of the House are not the only ones to which objections similar to the present might be urged. I find, for instance, the name of Mr. Bernal, a surveyor, as one of the sureties in two different petitions from the other side; and in one he is designated a surveyor, while in the other he is very differently described. The questions which have been urged by the Honourable and Learned Member for Cockermouth are questions for the consideration of the Election Committee, and it would be most improper for the House, by a side wind, to come to a premature decision upon the merits of the election.

Mr. BORTHWICK.—I think there is not a Member in this House against whose return a petition has been presented who would not, however strong might be his case, wish to avoid the trouble and expense of an election committee, if the merits of his election were to be gone into and decided beforehand by the House, in this indirect manner. The only question for the House to consider is,—whether the mere difference of description is sufficient to justify them in saying that fraud was intended?

SIR R. PEEL.—As there is now a new question before the House, perhaps I may be permitted to observe, that I act upon the same principle in this, as in the Dudley case; that is, to get the best evidence possible as to any special circumstances which may entitle the parties to the relief they require; but I conceive it to be a perfectly distinct question, whether we shall go into the merits of the election, and inquire who was the canvasser, and who was the nominator of the petitioning candidate. Any charge of fraud is a proper subject for investigation by this House; and if the Honourable Gentleman opposite intends, at a fit time, to bring Benbow and Proctor before the House, I will willingly consent to the adjournment of the debate. I hope, however, if there is to be any further examination, the case will be investigated and decided on its own merits, without any reference to the proceedings at the election.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—I will take such means as are in my power to obtain the attendance of Benbow, Florence, and Proctor, in order to their being examined to-morrow before the House.

The further proceeding was then adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. AGLIONBY, it was ordered that —— Benbow, James Florence, William Proctor, John Phillips Beavan, Richard Bartholomew Moss, and James Coppock, do attend this House to-morrow.

Ordered, also, that the Marshal of the Queen's Bench prison do bring Henry Gompertz, Esquire, in safe custody, to-morrow, in order to his being examined as a witness at the bar of this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly.

IPSWICH ELECTION RECOGNISANCES.

Mr. CHARLES BULLER.—I rise, Sir, for the purpose of presenting a petition from Samuel Hardman, of Chancery Lane, solicitor, praying the House to extend its indulgence so far as to allow the petitioner to name another surety in the case of the Ipswich election petiton. The ground upon which the indulgence is asked is, —that when the sureties previously offered appeared before the examiners, the partner of one of them attended and produced the deed of partnership, by one of the clauses of which either partner was debarred from becoming surety for another. This was altogether unexpected; and, before the petition could be prosecuted, it became necessary that another surety should be named. The present petitioner is one to whom the utmost indulgence of the House may very properly be granted, because he is not attached to either party, and comes forward merely to defend the purity of election; and I do not expect any objection from Honourable Members on either side, as the petition equally impugns the return of both the Members, on the ground of bribery. I very much regret that I have not been able, in this instance, to comply with the order of the House, which requires that petitions of this description should be printed, and placed in the hands of the Members interested before they are presented; but the fact is, the petition was not placed in my hands until after the House adjourned on Saturday; and as this is the last day allowed for entering into recognisances, it is of course impossible for me to delay the presentation till to-morrow. Under all the circumstances, I hope the House will see that this is a case in which the prayer of the petition should be granted.

Upon the question being put, That this petition do lie on the Table,—

Mr. GIBSON said:—As one of the sitting Members whose interest is affected by this petition, I rise to oppose it. I think I have a right to complain that no notice has been given of the intention of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to present this petition. I will appeal to the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair, whether it is in accordance with the conventional usages of this House, for one Member to bring charges against another without having given ample no-seize with avidity to save themselves from this inquiry. The Right Honourable Gentleman seems to have entirely forgotten the discussion, the other night, with respect to notices of motions for Tuesdays and Thursdays. The Right Honourable Gentleman has talked a great deal about inconvenience, by way of an answer to the Honourable Baronet. Why, the Honourable Baronet is incapable of asking whether a period be inconvenient or not: what he wishes to know is, whether the question is to be brought forward at a correct and proper time? As regards myself, remembering my declaration of the other evening, — a declaration which subsequent reflection induces me to repeat,— I relieve the Right Honourable Gentleman from any oppression as to placing me upon the committee. After the treatment to which I have been exposed, I repeat, that nothing under heaven shall induce me to serve upon a committee appointed by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, at the same time, if the House, upon consideration, shall think, as I do, that the course proposed by the Goverment is a most censurable course — if the House, echoing the opinions and sentiments of the country, shall think that I ought to be placed upon the committee, I shall cheerfully bow to its decision. I say that it is unworthy of the Government to allow time to be frittered away, and to attempt to put off the matter until to-morrow night, and to what hour we do not know, while the Civil List and the Duchess of Kent's Bills are to be thrust down our throats. But, suppose this question does come on to-morrow, then it is to be discussed on Wednesday. By a parity of reasoning, if another Gentleman should have another list of names to propose, he will be expected to give notice on Thursday, in order that his proposition may be discussed on Friday, when nearly all the Members will be gone out of town, and none will be left but the officials and the dependents of the Government. And is this, I ask, the way in which her Majesty's Ministers ought to treat a question like this? I will not describe my opinion of the conduct that has been pursued in this matter, because it is not the first time that I have been treated in a similar manner. Some years ago I brought forward a motion, connected with the Woods and Forests revenues, to which I devoted weeks and months of my time. No sooner had I brought it to a state of maturity, when it was likely to be useful, than the Government took it out of my hands, and made it a perfect abortion. Whether that is the course which it is proposed now to pursue I will not say, though past experience may suggest the apprehension of it; but this I will say, that I think the conduct of the Government towards me extremely ungenerous and unmanly.

The SPEAKER. — Does the Honourable Member for Caithness propose any amendment.

SIR G. SINCLAIR. — I shall certainly move the Order of the Day for going to the nomination of the select committee on the Pension List. With regard to the Honourable Member for Southwark, I understand that he does not expect to be nominated.

Mr. HARVEY. — Certainly not.

SIR. G. SINCLAIR. — I have not taken the Government or the House by surprise, because I entered a notice on the book, which must have prepared them for the course I am about to take. I will now move, as an amendment to the motion of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the words "Civil List Bill" be omitted, in order to insert the words "nomination of the committee on the Pension List:" and on this amendment I shall certainly take the sense of the House.

Upon the question being put, —

Mr. WARBURTON said: — I cannot understand why her Majesty's Ministers should object to state the names they propose to place on the Pension List Committee, at once. They must have been fully considered by this time; and they must be in the hands of the Government at this moment. Why, then, not at once relieve the anxiety which is felt on this subject, not only by Honourable Members of this House, but by the public? Why not say, at once, whether it be the intention to propose the Honourable Member for Southwark on this committee? I think the Government are bound, in common justice to the Honourable Member for Southwark, to allow the question to remain in suspense no longer, leaving his name to be bandied about by the public, as it will naturally be, so long as it remains a matter of doubt whether he is to sit upon that committee, or not. I fully concur with the Honourable Member for Caithness, that, if the Honourable Member for Southwark be not a member of the committee, the inquiry will fail in being satisfactory to the country. I must say, that the Government have not acted fairly, in this case, either to the Honourable Member for Southwark, or to the House, or to the country.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I admit that the Honourable Member for Southwark is placed in a situation that cannot but be disagreeable to him, in consequence of the questions that have been raised. But that is no fault of ours; the fault, if any, is owing to others, not to us. But, at the same time, I will say that, owing, as it is, to other parties, I am still ready, if it be the opinion of the House that the matter has been involved in an obscurity and doubt from which it ought to be cleared, — I am ready, I say, as far as the Government is concerned, to call upon my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to request him (a request with which I know he will not hesitate to comply) to place upon the notice-book, this evening, the names of the Members, whom he proposes to put upon the committee. Is that what the Honourable Baronet wishes?

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no!

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR. — That will not correspond with my views upon the subject; I shall certainly take the sense of the House upon the amendment I have moved.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Then, Sir, I must proceed at once to state the grounds upon which we propose to act with regard to the Honourable Member for Southwark. It will be recollected that, in the last Session of Parliament, that Honourable Member was placed upon the committee which sat upon the Report of the poor laws. The committee found that all their proceedings were reported in the daily newspapers; generally fully reported, sometimes only in portions, consisting of extracts and selected passages; but in one shape or the other, whether at full length or only in part, the publication of their proceedings was continued from day to day. This, as the House will perceive, was in direct contravention of the directions placed upon all the papers delivered to members of committees, — "that it is particularly requested that these papers may not be communicated to any other persons, being intended solely for the use of the committee." The subject of the publication of their proceedings was brought under the notice of the committee, and your authority, Sir, was mentioned as conclusive, that no member of the committee ought to disregard or to commit a breach of the order attached to the papers placed in his hand. The Honourable Member for Southwark, as I understand, did not deny that the publication complained of originated with him. I then thought it necessary, in order that the Honourable Member might have no room for doubt, to bring forward a question in this House as to the right of members of committees to make publications of the proceedings that took place before them; and the resolution which I then proposed was agreed to, after a division upon the question of adjournment, but without any division upon the question itself. I have that resolution now before me; it was agreed to by the House on the 21st of April last, and is in the following terms: —

> That, according to the undoubted privileges of this House, and for the due protection of the public interest, the evidence taken by any select committee of this House, and documents presented to such committee, and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any member of such committee, or by any other person.

I had hoped that such a resolution, on the part of the House, would have removed all doubt or hesitation that any member of the committee could have entertained, as to the propriety of the right of publishing what transpired before a select committee prior to the Report of that committee having been made to the House. But such was not the result. The publication continued, and the members of the committee were placed in the very great difficulty, — a difficulty which all felt to be very great and very painful, — that of being either obliged to report from day to day, contrary to the opinion of a large majority of them, or to connive at a daily infringement of the orders of the House, or else to bring the proceedings before the House, and ask the House to proceed to the vindication of its own rights and privileges; — and thus to have produced a feeling in the public mind that an Honourable Member, who took a strong part against the Poor Law Amendment Act, was to be visited with punishment in consequence of his opposition to that measure. As the least of these evils, we took the course of reporting from day to day the proceedings of the committee. I am afraid, Sir, that that course must have met with your disapprobation. I know that many members of the committee, and many Members of the House, — I believe, amongst others, my Honourable seize with avidity to save themselves from this inquiry. The Right Honourable Gentleman seems to have entirely forgotten the discussion, the other night, with respect to notices of motions for Tuesdays and Thursdays. The Right Honourable Gentleman has talked a great deal about inconvenience, by way of an answer to the Honourable Baronet. Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no!

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR. — That will not correspond with my views upon the subject; I shall certainly take the sense of the House upon the amendment I have moved.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Then, Sir, I must proceed at once to state the grounds upon which we propose to act with regard to the Honourable Member for Southwark. It will be recollected that, in the last Session of Parliament, that Honourable Member was placed upon the committee which sat upon the Report of the poor laws. The committee found that all their proceedings were reported in the daily newspapers; generally fully reported, sometimes only in portions, consisting of extracts and selected passages; but in one shape or the other, whether at full length or only in part, the publication of their proceedings was continued from day to day. I had hoped that such a resolution, on the part of the House, would have removed all doubt or hesitation that any member of the committee could have entertained, as to the propriety of the right of publishing what transpired before a select committee prior to the Report of that committee having been made to the House. But such was not the result. The publication continued, and the members of the committee were placed in the very great difficulty, — a difficulty which all felt to be very great and very painful, — that of being either obliged to report from day to day, contrary to the opinion of a large majority of them, or to connive at a daily infringement of the orders of the House, or else to bring the proceedings before the House, and ask the House to proceed to the vindication of its own rights and privileges; — and thus to have produced a feeling in the public mind that an Honourable Member, who took a strong part against the Poor Law Amendment Act, was to be visited with punishment in consequence of his opposition to that measure. As the least of these evils, we took the course of reporting from day to day the proceedings of the committee. I am afraid, Sir, that that course must have met with your disapprobation. I know that many members of the committee, and many Members of the House, — I believe, amongst others, my Honourable Friend the chairman of the committee, — disapproved of that course, — a course which was taken at my suggestion, and supported by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Thomas Fremantle). Such, however, was the course which we ultimately adopted; but, previously to our doing so, the Honourable Member for Southwark, opposing himself to the resolution of the House, continued his publication; and the rest of the committee, not willing to take any strong course, allowed the resolution to remain, during that time, in suspense. Though armed with the resolution of the House to protect its proceedings, and though the Honourable Member continued his daring defiance of that resolution, the committee did not proceed to act upon it; but adopted the milder course, attended as it was with a hundred inconveniences, of reporting its own proceedings from day to day. But although, in the instance of the Poor Law Committee, we took the course which we thought the most expedient, yet I must say that I am not prepared again to place upon a select committee of this House, nominated by any member of the Government, an Honourable Member who so defied the resolution of the House, — who stated that he would be guided solely by his own opinion, contrary to the decision of this House, — and between whom and the House, if he were again placed upon a select committee, a question must arise, — (one of the questions which are the most injurious to the reputation of the House, — namely,) — a question in which the dissentient Member is made apparently a martyr to the resolutions and proceedings of this House, in the vindication of its own privileges.

We have known, in former days, how much popular excitement has been caused by sending members of committees to places of confinement; and we all know that some Members of the House have owed much of their popular reputation to that very resistance to the orders and privileges of the House, of which the Honourable Member for Southwark gave an instance upon the Poor Law Committee. I think, then, that the safest course — much as it may be disapproved of — much as it may be made the subject of popular misrepresentation, — I still think that the safest course for us to pursue, will be, to name as fair and just a committee as we can, but not to place upon it the name of the Honourable Member for Southwark. If the House chooses to say, " Let our privileges be in abeyance, let all our orders be disobeyed, —any Member who pleases shall have his own will and pleasure upon committees, uncontradicted by the House," — if the House choose to say so, let it be so; but let it not come from us; let it not be said that it was the Government who proposed to invade and trample upon the privileges of the House. I should be forgetful of the privileges of the House, and unmindful of those serious difficulties in which we were involved in the last Session, and which I am sure no Gentleman who sat upon the Poor Law Committee can ever forget, if I were to propose the nomination of the Honourable Member for Southwark upon another select committee. I will only, in conclusion, add, that should the Civil List Act be proceeded with to-night, my Right Honourable Friend will be ready to give notice of the names he proposes to place upon the committee.

Mr. HALL. — I am glad that this question is now brought fairly to issue. Day after day it has been discussed in the public prints, and the opinions of the people have been very strongly expressed with regard to it. Sir, it was with considerable regret that I heard the determination at which the Noble Lord has arrived. I consider that, as this is a question which must be disposed of before the recess, it ought to be decided at once. I regret the course which the Government have thought it proper to take on this occasion, because I had conceived that it was natural for the Government, when proposing a committee of inquiry into pensions, to place on it the name of a gentleman who has devoted his time and his talents to the consideration of this subject, and Session after Session has brought it before the House. The name of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark is so much identified with the consideration of this question, that unless his name be attached to that committee, those who feel the deepest interest in the progress and results of the inquiry will not be satisfied that it is fairly gone into. There are two parties interested in this inquiry — the public, and those who are in the receipt of pensions. I will deal, first, with this latter class. I am sure that those persons will not be satisfied unless the name of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark be added to the list; for a friend of mine has told me, that a noble relative, who is in the receipt of a large pension, has expressed himself strongly as to the necessity of the Honourable and Learned Member being on the committee, stating that he was most anxious that every opportunity should be afforded for investigating his claims. And it is my decided opinion, that if that Honourable and Learned Gentleman be not nominated, the object of my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be entirely defeated. In taking the appointment of the committee out of the hands of the Honourable and Learned Member, my Right Honourable Friend stated, that he was anxious to take the whole responsibility of it upon himself; and I, myself, consider it to be most desirable that the Government should stand in that responsible situation; but I also think that, at the time my Right Honourable Friend took upon himself that responsibility, he ought not to have stated that it was not the intention of the Government to place the name of the Honourable and Learned Member on the List.

I may be excused, as the documents have been published in the public papers, if I allude to the correspondence which has passed between the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, with reference to this question. This correspondence consists of a letter addressed by my Right Honourable Friend to the Honourable and Learned Member, and of that Honourable and Learned Member's reply. Now, I must say that, for my own part, I should have answered any such proposition as that made by my Right Honourable Friend in his letter in the same manner as did the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, and as I should conceive it would have been replied to, had it been made to any other Honourable Member of this House. If any proposition had been made to me to be on the committee, but coupled with the condition that it must be a sine quâ non that I should forego any right or privilege that I, as a Member of Parliament, considered I possessed; I would not have consented to be placed on that committee on such a condition. I use the words "right or privilege," because it is a fact, that what the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark did, on a former occasion, received the approbation and sanction of the House of Commons. I do not mean to say that the course pursued by the Honourable and Learned Member, on the occasion alluded to, was that course which I myself should have adopted: — still it was a course which was afterwards sanctioned by the House itself. All that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman did was, to publish, from day to day, the evidence taken before the Poor Law Committee, of which he was a member. Now, I would ask, is there anything which can prevent that Honourable and Learned Gentleman from pursuing the same course with respect to the present committee, whether he be a member of it, or not? Whether a member, or no member, he will have the same means of information, unless, indeed, it is intended to make it a secret committee. He will have equal access to the committee room; and what power does the House possess by which to prevent him from making public that which he may there hear?

But this is a point of very minor consideration. The main question is, whether the House will give finality to the inquiry into the Pension List? If any question ought to be final — considered with a view of satisfying the public — it is this question, which involves the ascertaining of facts as they really are, and which, as they are supposed to be at present, and without inquiry, are odious in the eyes of the public. But no satisfactory inquiry can take place, not only unless the fullest investigation be allowed, but unless also the name of the Honourable and Learned Member, whose name is associated in the minds of the people with the subject of the Pension List, and whose determination to enter into every abuse, and whose capability to direct such an investigation, are so well known, be included in the list of the committee. I believe it is the invariable practice of Parliament, when any person has so devoted his time and talent to the consideration of a subject as to lead to the appointment of a committee, that such person should be placed on the list of such committee. This is a practice not merely founded on courtesy, but is grounded on wisdom. It is grounded upon wisdom. because it is natural to conclude that any person possessing the information which the devotion of time and attention to any subject must acquire, will be able to afford very essential assistance in carrying out the object of the inquiry. If ever there was an instance in which this rule of the House should be more strictly adhered to than in another, this is the one. It will be perfectly useless — I might almost say faithless — if the name of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman be not placed on this committee. If, therefore, it be the Honourable Baronet's intention to divide upon his amendment, that this question shall take precedence of the other Orders of the Day, I shall feel it my duty to vote with him.

Mr. HUME. — I rise merely to confirm the opinion of the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, that the proposed inquiry will be perfectly useless and unsatisfactory if the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark be not a member of the committee; and I yet hope, notwithstanding the declaration of the Noble Lord, that the Government will reconsider their determination, and place the name of my Honourable and Learned Friend on the list.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I have a choice between two difficulties:—one is, the interruption of the progress of the Civil List Bill, by the motion introduced by the Honourable Member for Caithness to suspend the third reading of that Bill, when undoubtedly at the present period of the year it could not be suspended but with very considerable inconvenience. If, indeed, we were now on the motion for the third reading of that Bill, simply, there might be some reason for taking this question of pensions first; but my Honourable Friend the Member for the city of London has given a notice on the third reading of the Civil List Bill, which will give rise to a debate; therefore, to postpone that third reading beyond to-morrow night may amount to an undefined and inconvenient postponement. I have said that I am perfectly ready to abide the pleasure of the House upon the decision of to-morrow night. Nobody can expect that this committee should sit before the holidays. If the House should decide that the names to be proposed should be printed before voted upon, I shall be perfectly ready to give in the names — nay, I shall be perfectly ready to give in those names to-night.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Name, name!

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I understood from Gentlemen on all sides, that what they were desirous of was, the being in possession of the names twenty-four hours before I moved.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

That certainly was the suggestion.

[Renewed cries of "No!"]

Gentlemen may change their minds now, but the request I had to encounter, originally, was, that the House might know the names beforehand. But I have no difficulty in saying that I am ready to give the names now, and let us have the discussion.

[Cries of "Name!"]

I wish to know, in the outset, what Honourable Gentlemen would have? I understand they wish to have notice of the names on the one hand ——

[Cries of "No, no!"]

And to have a discussion on the other; but if it be the pleasure of the House to come to a discussion now, and to throw overboard the question of giving information as to the names — if that be the case, unquestionably I shall lose more time with respect to the Civil List Act by a fruitless discussion now, than by proceeding at once to that which the House desires; therefore, I have no objection to the Order of the Day for appointing the committee being read; but do not let it be said that I have taken Honourable Gentlemen by surprise.

The amendment and motion were then, by leave, withdrawn.

PENSIONS.

On the Order of the Day for nominating the committee being read, —

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said: — Now, Sir, that the Order of the Day has been read, I will proceed to the duty of naming the committee.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Hear, hear!

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I hope that the Gentlemen who cheer are not among the Gentlemen who are prepared to support the Honourable Member for Kilkenny to-morrow; because if that motion, namely, that every Member intending to propose the names of Members to serve in a select committee, shall, on the day next before such nomination of Members, place among the notices for the day the names of the Members intended to be proposed as members of the said committee, — if, I say, that motion be founded in reason, nothing can be so unjust as for me to be compelled to take the House, now, by surprise, when I have proposed to give the House full information of the names, that they may be compared with those of a former committee, in order that Honourable Members may ascertain whether they are the names that ought to be put on this committee, or not. The notice given by the Honourable Member for Caithness (Sir George Sinclair) embraces two objects — one, the insertion of the name of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Southwark; and the other, the insertion of a majority of names, on the committee, of Gentlemen who have on former occasions voted for an inquiry into the Pension List. I shall divide my observations in respect to these two propositions. Upon the second proposition I am happy to announce that the majority of the names on the proposed committee consists of Gentlemen who voted against the Government on former occasions, and in favour of inquiry. So far the object of the Honourable Baronet is answered, and as far as that goes every pledge is given of the sincerity of the Crown in carrying on the inquiry. With respect to the second, or rather the other object,—as, from the statement of my Noble Friend, it will be anticipated by the House, — the answer must be of a contrary description. It will be for the House to determine whether that answer is or is not founded on just grounds. Sir, I shall appeal upon this subject to the good feeling of all the Members of the House, be their party whot it may. I will not attribute to Gentlemen opposite who oppose this inquiry, any intention so disingenuous as to endeavour to make this inquiry in its progress odious, distasteful, and hateful to the best feelings of the great mass of the community, by supporting a proposition that may tend to deprive the country of any advantage that otherwise might accrue from this inquiry. I should be very reluctant, indeed, to have it imagined that I considered the insertion of the name of any Honourable Gentleman on this committee would have any such a tendency. On the contrary, from the observations I am about, nay, am called upon, to make, by what has fallen from my Honourable Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Hall), it will be shown that I have no such personal objection whatsoever. On the contrary, I say, boldly and unreservedly, it was my desire, my anxious desire, that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman should be a member of this committee; and I felt, as my Honourable Friend has stated, that unquestionably one who has paid attention to the subject as he has done, and brought the subject under the deliberation of Parliament, was a person whose name must naturally suggest itself as one to be proposed for this inquiry; and the omission of his name would be the very circumstance which would deprive the inquiry and the recommendations of the committee of their force and weight.

But, Sir, what are the regulations of this House, and what are the orders of this House? In the first place, any individual moving to appoint a committee, is required to communicate with the Members whose names he wishes to suggest to the House. It was, consequently, my duty to communicate with the Members whose names I wished to propose. It occurred to me, that the best course I could adopt was to select the identical committee which had been already appointed on the Civil List. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Harvey) having originally proposed to refer, by way of instruction to that committee, this very subject of the Pension List, it certainly did appear to me that my most obvious course would be the re-appointment of that select committee. I accordingly communicated with the Gentlemen who served on that committee. On the part of several Honourable Gentlemen sitting opposite, who had been members of that former committee, I found objections to become members of the proposed committee. They said they objected to it upon principle. I was then driven to appoint a new committee; and I believe the first name which occurred to me was the name of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Harvey), and I took the liberty of addressing to him a letter, which I will now read to the House.

> Mr. Spring Rice presents his compliments to Mr. Harvey, and is led to trouble him with the present communication in consequence of the motion for appointing a committee on pensions, which Mr. Spring Rice intends to bring on.
> From the interest which Mr. Harvey has taken in this subject, and the attention which he has paid to it, Mr. Harvey's name would naturally occur to any person selecting the members of that committee. But Mr. Spring Rice trusts Mr. Harvey will excuse him if, before he makes such a proposition to the House, he solicits information from Mr. Harvey on a question most essential to the future proceedings of that committee, if it shall be named by the House.
> In the committee on the poor laws, appointed last Session, Mr. Harvey communicated to the public, from day to day, the evidence and the proceedings of the committee, even before they were reported to the House. Mr. Spring Rice does not raise the question whether such a course was, in that instance, parliamentary or convenient; but it is evident that, where the private affairs, character, and service of individuals may be made matters of deliberation and inquiry, the publication of such evidence in any way but in the authentic form of a Report, and of communication to the House itself, would be unjust and inconvenient.
> Mr. Spring Rice fully anticipates that Mr.

Harvey will concur in these opinions, from his observations respecting the duty of such a committee, and the mode and spirit in which its inquiries should be directed. But, to avoid any difference of opinion or mistake hereafter, Mr. Spring Rice will be much indebted to Mr. Harvey if he will do him the favour of letting him know whether, if appointed a member of the committee, he adopts, and will assist the committee in adhering to, the principles laid down in this note?

Downing Street, Thursday evening.

I put it to the House whether there is any word in this note that betokens any want of courtesy or respect to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman? I put it to any Gentleman, on either side of the House, whether, if he had received this note from me, he would have considered that it indicated either a want of courtesy or of respect on my part? On the contrary, it will be seen that I endeavoured anxiously to save paining any self-love or affection for by-gone opinions, which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman might have entertained. I said, I did not raise the question whether the course which had been adopted by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman was parliamentary or convenient; but I said to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman that, from the peculiarity of this case, and in the particular circumstances under which the committee was moved, — (and under the circumstances, I must say, that I could not properly take any other course than that which I thus adopted;)—I said to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, in reference to the declarations which this House itself had made on the subject of proceedings of committees, "You can have no hesitation in giving me the assurance which I have taken the liberty of asking." I did not call on the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to give up or withdraw any opinions which he might advocate, with respect to the question of the Poor Law Amendment Act. I merely desired to stipulate for the assurance in question; and had it been given, I should have been satisfied to move at once for the insertion of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's name.

Now, what was that assurance? Let this be distinctly understood; for I know it has been said, out of doors, that it was presumption on my part to ask any Honourable Member for such an assurance. What, then, did I ask? Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons, what was it, then, that I did stipulate for? Why, I asked additional security that the orders of the House of Commons should be strictly adhered to. I did not seek anything from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman other than that which I might, either in the House or in committee, require of him. If I undertook the responsibility of suggesting the names of this committee, I was bound also to take upon me the accompanying responsibility of seeing that the orders of the House should be carried into full and efficient operation. I will now read the answer of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, just premising this, that I must say that answer surprised me. I thought, from the declarations of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, when he had said that this was an inquiry of a particular character, and one that ought to be carried on with faithfulness, as well to the parties interested as to the public,—I really did think that there could not be a doubt as to the sort of answer the Honourable and Learned Gentleman would give. But, you who are now about to vote in this matter, will you do me the favour of listening to the answer I have received, remembering that the only request or condition I made was simply this, — that, in the event of his being appointed a member of the committee, he would adhere to the resolution which had been unanimously adopted by the House. This was the answer: —

Strand, Friday morning.

SIR, — Regarding, as I do, the right of publishing the proceedings before parliamentary committees to be of the greatest public importance, I cannot consent to place its exercise in abeyance, as the condition of being placed upon a committee. I readily acknowledge that circumstances may arise which would render such publication not only undesirable, but extremely unjust towards individuals; but I must claim the unfettered exercise of my own judgment in all cases, and which, I may be allowed to remark, is not likely, I trust, to be in a direction less just or considerate than that of persons equally disinterested as myself.

D. W. HARVEY.

Now, let me bring the House to a comparison of this letter with their own resolution. The resolution that was entered into on the 22d of April was this, — and I beg the attention of all Gentlemen who are about to vote: —

That, according to the undoubted privileges of this House, and for the due protection of the public interests, the evidence taken by any select committee of this House, and the documents presented to such committee, and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any member of such committee, or by any other person.

Here is your resolution, which says that a certain thing ought not to be done; and here is an Honourable Member of the House, who declares that he will do that thing, and who claims it as his right and privilege to do it. I have to ask, that this may be decided between the House and the assumed privilege of a Member. Let the House step in. I have no favour to solicit. I am told, indeed, of the majority on the other side of the House. I care not. I know that this is an inconvenient question for me. I do know that there is a fire on my flank, — I am told to expect another in my front. But, I say, here is a Gentleman avowing his intention to violate the rules of the House.

[Cries of "No, no!" and "Hear!"]

The Honourable and Learned Gentleman is claiming, as a right and privilege, that which the House has decided to be a breach of privilege. If I am guilty in giving a preference to the orders of the House over the claim of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, let the House so decide. If the House prefer his letter to my letter, — his opinions to mine, — be it so. It is still not a question between him and me. Do not let that be supposed. It is a question between their own resolution and a single Member of Parliament, who, rising in his place, says, "I claim that as a privilege, which you (the House) say is not a privilege." But I wish again to tell the House, that if the Honourable Gentleman will, at the present moment, get up and say that he will abide by the orders of the House, I have no kind of objection; on the contrary, I am bound to move, myself, the insertion of his name. Let every Gentleman who is about to vote take that as his guide. If you are resolved to abide by your resolution, then enforce it. If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman—(I crave the attention of the House) — will abide by the resolution, I will, myself, insert his name. If he refuse, why, although I know of no such question having arisen before, yet I think the House of Commons will not consent to place a Member on a committee who refuses to declare his determination to abide by the resolutions of the House. Where, I ask, will this practice end, if it once begins? It will not be limited to committees, but will run through the whole of your proceedings.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Hear, hear, hear!

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Does the Honourable Member for Bridport mean to make mere waste paper of all the orders of this House? He, perhaps, may have such high and fanciful notions as to devising new regulations for the conduct of the business and proceedings of the House of Commons, that, probably, he would allow any Honourable Member, on the smallest imaginable difference of opinion, on the minutest point — the point of a needle — to exercise the right of private judgment, and set at nought the most solemn resolutions of this House. But, Sir, this were to establish principles which even that Honourable Gentleman cannot gravely propose to us to sanction. I say, again, if the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will only conform to the decision already recorded by this House, on the subject of publishing the proceedings in committees, I will put his name on the list as one of the committee. But if — the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, on the contrary, still refusing to abide by the decisions of this House — it should still be the pleasure of this House to put him upon that committee, I would say, let the responsibility rest, not upon the Government, but upon the House itself.

One word more. I have argued this question upon general principles. If this were a committee on the combination laws, or on the state of the factories, or on the condition of the London Docks, these principles would equally apply. The principles I have laid down are the right principles upon which it behoves this House to act; because it becomes this House, on all occasions, to uphold its own regulations.

And now, as I before intimated, there remain but two or three points to which I would address myself; and, first, as to the peculiarity of this inquiry, I will not be induced, by any taunts of the Honourable Gentleman opposite, with respect to the course I have now taken, as compared with the course I have previously taken, to go one point beyond the single subject matter now under discussion. But every Gentleman, whether he argue in favour of inquiry or against inquiry, must be aware, — and I cannot appeal to an authority whose words were more strong or more powerful on this point than those of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman himself, — that this inquiry is of a peculiar character; that it may involve private character, private fortune, services rendered, and all manner of disclosures, — disclosures, however, that I hold to be necessary, under the exigency of the present case.

["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I give the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Maclean) full credit for that cheer. I ask him, are there not circumstances that may make it necessary to inquire into such matters as I have described? Then what becomes of his cheer? It does not tell against my argument. On the contrary, it supports my argument. Now, I put it to the House, if the proceedings of this committee, before they report, are made known through the daily journals, de die in diem, — if a charge is brought against an individual of having received a pension unjustly, and under circumstances which would not justify its continuance, — if such evidence as this be made known to the world on a Monday, and is to remain without contradiction until the following Saturday, are you prepared, — above all, are you, who oppose all inquiry, prepared to inflict upon that individual the additional pain of publicity, — to the pain which an uncontradicted rumour, an unfounded charge, perhaps, may have already fixed upon him? I say, it is not just. If such a publication were right with respect to every other description of inquiry, it would not be right with respect to one of this peculiar character. While I am desirous of giving full and entire effect to the intentions of the House of Commons, by obtaining the fullest investigation of all facts connected with the Pension List, I am equally desirous, and you ought to be equally determined, to prevent such an investigation being made the means of harassing and disturbing the private peace and happiness of individuals; and I am resolved, as far as I can go, that the committee shall not be perverted to any such purpose.

It is on these grounds, looking, first, to the general grounds upon which a question of this nature should be entertained; next, to the laws and usages of Parliament; and lastly, looking at the particular case which is before me, — that, without obtaining the pledge of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, I do not feel warranted in putting his name upon the committee. Let him give that pledge now, and I shall be ready to vote for him. Or let him say he will not give that pledge, and then vote for him if you will; I cannot. This is the alternative. Vote against your own resolution, and confirm the Honourable and Learned Gentleman in his violation of it; but let us know what it is that you will do. Let him say that he considers he was called upon by my letter in too categorical a manner, and that it required him to condemn himself, but that now he is ready to adhere to the decisions of this House. I have already read to the House that letter; and I appeal to everybody who hears me, whether it can really bear any construction of that kind?

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.]

Well, I do not so understand the letter. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says himself, in his answer to my letter, that "circumstances may arise," which would render such a publication inexpedient and unjust to individuals, but he reserves to himself the full power of exercising his own judgment in all cases. Here it is clear that he reserves to himself the full power of suggesting his own commentary on these two subjunctive words; but I do not wish to leave to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the power thus to comment upon the resolutions of the House of Commons. All I ask is, that he will engage to adhere to them. I do not ask the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to give any engagement for any object of my own whatever, but to engage to observe the rules of the House. If you are disposed to depart from those rules, then strike them out of your journals. If you approve of them, give me your support and authority to enforce them,—to ask for an engagement that they will be observed by those whose names I propose for a committee.

I shall now take the liberty to read the names, which, of course, do not include the name of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Harvey). They are—Lord John Russell, Mr. Grote (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Bannerman (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Plumtre (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Hume (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Sanford, Mr. Hawes (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Alderman Copeland (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. William Evans (who is no longer in Parliament), Mr. Pendarves (who voted for a previous inquiry), Sir Eardley Wilmot (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Handley (who voted for a previous inquiry), Lord Ebrington, Mr. Rickford (who voted for a previous inquiry), Mr. Strutt, Mr. M'Leod, Mr. Goddard, Mr. Phillpotts, Mr. George Evans, Mr. Villiers Stuart (all of whom voted for a previous inquiry), and if the House choose to nominate me, myself.

[Hear, hear, hear!]

The majority of the Gentlemen, therefore, whom I have named, have, on former occasions, voted for the inquiry and against the then Government, and it cannot now be said that I have not fairly adopted a material part of one of the suggestions which have been made.

Mr. HUME. — I think the House will allow me to observe, before the proposed names are read from the chair, that, as the full number of twenty-one is proposed, the House cannot, consistently with its Standing Order, add the name of the Honourable Member for Southwark, which would make twenty-two, without proceeding to the invidious task of rejecting one of the names mentioned by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — It will be open to the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, or any other Honourable Member, to move that the complement of the committee be increased beyond the usual number.

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR. — I have listened with great attention to the exordium of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and I must say that the arguments which have been advanced by him for the exclusion of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark appeared to me to be very like those which would be urged by the Government, supposing it to be its desire that there should be no inquiry into this subject, at all. After listening, however, with the utmost care to the speeches of the Right Honourable Gentleman and the Honourable and Learned Member, I must say, that I cannot bring myself to the belief that great injustice will not be done if the Honourable and Learned Gentleman be omitted. I gave notice of a specific motion on this subject, from the opinion which I entertained that the knowledge of this question possessed by that Honourable and Learned Gentleman was very valuable, that his talent was great, and his sincerity most unquestionable; and because I thought the public would never be satisfied with the appointment of this committee, if the name of one who, for so many years, had devoted those qualifications to the inquiry, were to be omitted. I think that, in the correspondence which has been read, the Honourable and Learned Member was perfectly right. I conceive that the proper course to be pursued would be to appoint the Honourable Member; and if he should publish any of the evidence, and should thereby infringe the just privileges of the House, that such infringement should be brought distinctly before the House. Let it be stated by the chairman of the committee to this House that there has been an infraction of the law of Parliament, by publishing the evidence, and I myself would be one of the first Members to vote that the offence should be visited by condign punishment. But I think it a very hard case that a condition or a stipulation should be required of the Honourable and Learned Member, which is not exacted of any other Gentleman; and I am of opinion that the Honourable Gentleman owes it to himself, to his own character, and to the situation which he fills as a Member of Parliament, not to accept an appointment upon the committee under the proposed condition. There are, moreover, other circumstances connected with the previous situation of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, which must render it peculiarly painful to his feelings to be thus excluded on the present occasion. I was a member of that committee which, on a former occasion, investigated the case of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and I think that, in that committee, he was very ill treated. I thus briefly allude to these circumstances, in standing forth on the present occasion, because I think they may serve to show that it is peculiarly incumbent upon us to treat the Honourable and Learned Member with all fairness and courtesy. Upon a consideration of the whole history of this question, and remembering, especially, how ably and repeatedly the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has brought it forward in this House, and how completely he is master of its merits, I must say, — when the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us that he has reappointed the whole of the former committee, with the exception of the Honourable and Learned Gentlemen, — that, if the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's name is to be omitted, it might as well not sit at all. If it be true that the same Learned Gentleman's name was omitted from the last committee of this nature, that is, in itself, a powerful reason why it should be inserted in the list of this. It is worthy of observation, that the Honourable and Learned Member has not been appointed a member of the Civil List Committee, either. As to the names of the Gentlemen whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes, to form the committee which is at present under our consideration, I have only to observe, that so far as I have yet been able to form an opinion, it appears to me to be a very fair one. But I am quite satisfied that, if the name of the Learned Member for Southwark does not appear upon it, the public at large will not be satisfied with your proceeding. I have no wish to detain the House further, at this late hour; but I really thought that, in a matter of this sort, I had no alternative but to deliver my opinions in the case. I will now, therefore, conclude by moving that the committee do consist of twenty-two members, the name of Mr. Harvey being added.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I shall offer but a very few words to the House, because I feel the necessity of proceeding with the business of the House relative to the Civil List; but I do think that it is equally important to come to a decision upon the present question, in which the dignity and character of this House are so deeply involved. The Noble Lord, who spoke in the early part of the evening upon this question, stated that his reason for objecting to the insertion of the Honourable and Learned Member's name was, that on a former occasion the Learned Gentleman had transgressed the orders and specific resolutions of the House; but if the Honourable Member had committed such a violation, why was he not brought to the bar of the House, or charged with the infringement in his place in Parliament, instead of being allowed to go on publishing the proceedings in question day by day? Why did not the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer come down to the House and ask us to rescind that resolution, if he did not approve of it; or, if he did, to enforce it? The reason assigned is, that the Noble Lord has known many persons become almost political martyrs in virtue of their opposing the privileges of Parliament; and that it was not, therefore, prudent to bring this matter forward. If this be a good reason, of what use is the order of the House? If it may be put at defiance with impunity, why does the House not repeal it? If the Honourable and Learned Member should infringe any privilege of this House, the House is perfectly able to protect itself. Why demand this species of preliminary pledge? The course taken by the Government is not consistent with the usage hitherto pursued. If I rightly understood the statement of the Honourable and Learned Member, it amounts to this: "I will not enter into an agreement to preserve intact the privileges of the House, and which, I contend, may not prove to be privileges. If I violate any privilege of the House, you may proceed against me, as you may against any other individual. If, in defying your orders, I commit any offence, you have the remedy in your own hands; you may bring me to the bar, or you may tax me in my place, and you may then take the opinion of the House whether your order be founded in justice or not." Another argument which was used by the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer against the appointment of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman was, that, during the investigation, a great deal of delicate evidence must be called for, and if, day by day, the inquiries were published to the world, and the facts, where they could — as they might, eventually — be refuted, were left uncontradicted, much injustice would be committed. But, even if this were so, on the first occasion that a breach was committed, the chairman of the committee would come down to the House with redoubled force to carry the resolution into effect, because the publication would have taken place in direct defiance of their authority. If the Honourable and Learned Member's name be not inserted, it has been said that this inquiry will be a mere mockery. But if the House be not prepared to vindicate its authority, is it not making a mockery of all parliamentary law — is it not tantamount to saying, that we have not the courage to vindicate our own resolution — to propose such a course as that which has been recommended by the Right Honourable Gentleman? May we not as well burn at once our Order Book? Why, we should be laughed at out of doors; and if we ever bring any one to our bar for infringement of our orders, shall we not be answered, "You were afraid to touch Mr. Harvey; you could not justify your own opinion, and you dared not arraign him, though you are willing to punish me."

LORD VISCOUNT EBRINGTON. — There was one part of the observations of the Honourable and Learned Member for Oxford in which I fully concur, namely, that, considering the particular views which have been announced and expounded upon this subject by the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, it is right that that Learned Gentleman should be admitted by my Right Honourable Friend into the committee which he is about to nominate. But, I must say, whilst concurring with the Learned Member for Oxford, and other

Honourable Gentlemen who have spoken, to this extent, that they do seem to me, by the general effect of their argument, to have afforded the best justification to my Right Honourable Friend for not putting the Learned Member for Southwark on the list of that Committee. What say the Honourable Member for Oxford and his Honourable Friends? "Put the Learned Member for Southwark on the committee, and if he presume to violate the rules or resolutions of this House, bring him to your bar, and visit him with condign punishment." Why, what would be the answer in the event of my Right Honourable Friend pursuing such a course? What would have been said supposing that he had actually done so? Would not the Honourable and Learned Gentleman himself, if brought to the bar, reply, "You put me on this committee, knowing, from past experience, what course I should be likely to pursue, under the influence of those opinions — opinions which you were aware that I still retained — upon which you must have been sensible that I should continue to act, and be, in some degree, justified in acting, from the circumstance of your not having previously visited them with any punishment." Might not the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark have justly attributed to my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the other Members of her Majesty's Government, the treachery of having placed him on the committee for the purpose of inducing him to commit the offence, and subsequently bringing him to the bar of this House, in order to render him amenable for that offence? If my Right Honourable Friend had indeed done anything of this sort, I, for one, should have considered it a proceeding utterly unworthy of him, and one which would have justly exposed him to the severest imputations of acting upon mean and mistaken counsels. Then we have been told, that in this case the House has a public duty to perform towards itself and towards the country. I must be allowed to add, that, in my judgment, we have a duty to perform also towards individuals. I have voted for this inquiry with a desire that it should be as full, searching, and complete as possible. But, at the same time, I have voted for it with an anxious desire that no unnecessary aggravation should be occasioned to the feelings of the persons whose pensions and allowances are to be inquired into by any ex parte disclosures and statements, from day to day, by which injurious and mistaken impressions may be produced, and personal feelings wantonly distressed. I have no sort of wish to speak in any way disrespectfully of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, and I have no right to impeach the exercise of his discretion in this or in any other case; but this I will say, that after the experience which we have had of the course which that Honourable and Learned Gentleman thought fit to pursue in the case of the committee on the poor laws, I, for one, should feel hardly satisfied, if I were a member of the Civil List or Pensions committee, were it open for any other member to publish ex parte reports of the evidence taken before it. For these reasons I shall vote for the motion of my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

LORD VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH. — I never did, and never will, give a factious vote in this House. I have never considered it to be within my province to do so; I hope I shall never be guilty of such a proceeding, and was never less disposed to be so than in the present instance. But I cannot conceive that when her Majesty's Ministers have appealed to the country, and have proposed to institute an inquiry into this Pension List, on the ground that there exist serious abuses in it — I cannot conceive that they have sufficient reason for refusing to insert upon the list of that committee the name of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, who can contribute more information, perhaps, than any other Member upon the subjects of its investigation. For my own part, I have no wish to inquire at all into the pensions of any of those individuals whose names are on the Pension List.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I tell those Gentlemen who cheer, that this disinclination on my part is founded upon principle, for I am unwilling to rip up old sores. Speaking of old sores, I must say, that I think the Learned Gentleman put a very strong case to the Noble Lord the other night, when the Noble Lord stated that he could not refuse to express his conviction that very many hardships must occur under the proceedings of the committee, whenever that committee was instituted. That principle, however, being once conceded, I am quite as willing to allow the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to be on this committee as I should be to permit any other Honourable Member to be a member of it. If the country is to understand that the Pension List is to be held up to a rigid scrutiny, then let the country understand what species of inquiry it is proposed to institute. But do not let this House stultify itself by permitting the country to infer that there is one Member in this House whose influence they are afraid of, and whose searching eye they shrink from encountering. Let not Her Majesty's Ministers say, that "there is one Member of this House whose support we occasionally receive and avail ourselves of, but let it not be imagined that that support can be accepted on the present occasion." I would, therefore, entreat her Majesty's Government to make use of the acute and searching eye of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, and I am sure they will do themselves much more credit than by leaving him out of the committee. It is perfectly immaterial to me what names are put on this list, or who shall sit most constantly on the committee; but of this I am perfectly certain, that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will bring as large a supply of facts, and contribute as much valuable information, as any other of the Honourable Gentlemen whom I see opposite to me.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I must say, of the several arguments which have been adduced by her Majesty's Government against the admission of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark on this committee, that they are arguments which, if Members of this House were to act upon them generally, would amount to a positive proscription against the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark's sitting, not on this committee alone, but on any select committee whatever, which the House may hereafter appoint. Any Honourable Member might put a similar question to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman in respect of any other inquiry which such Honourable Gentleman may think proper to institute, and which the House, on his proposition, may be pleased to direct. He may put this question to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and to him alone:—"Do you intend, if you are placed on this committee, — do you intend to abstain from taking advantage of the opportunity which such appointment may give you of publishing the evidence to be taken before this committee, in a newspaper?" If any Honourable Gentleman may challenge, under such circumstances, the answer of the Honourable and rned Member to an application of this sort in the same manner as her Majesty's Government have done on the present occasion, — and if the answer of the Honourable and Learned Member should be to the same effect as it has been in this instance,— then the result, namely, the refusal to nominate the Learned Member on any such committee, may become quite a general rule. I must say, that to such a question my Honourable and Learned Friend, without violating an important principle, could never reply, except by declining to answer at all. I must also declare, that the course which has been pursued by her Majesty's Government, on the present occasion, is precisely that course which I would have pursued if I had wanted to exclude the same Honourable Member from sitting on any given committee. The effect of the course which has been taken is, most decidedly, to exclude him from sitting on this committee; but, at the same time, to save appearances, by putting the alternative of that exclusion upon my Honourable and Learned Friend. I contend that the Learned Member for Southwark, as a man of honour, ought to give no other answer than he has given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That Right Honourable Gentleman has taunted me with the cheer which I gave at one portion of his speech, and said, — "What! will you not require that the orders and resolutions of this House be enforced and obeyed? Are you prepared to put your argument on the precedent of an individual who has said that he will not conform to the resolutions of this House, or used some such expressions as those? Will you disobey the orders of the House, as the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark says he is prepared to do, with regard to the orders of the Committee?" I will say, upon this point, that I never knew a case, yet, in which this House has run a race with the newspapers, upon a point of publication, in which it has not been beaten.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear! Hear, hear!"]

I repeat, advisedly, that I never knew a single instance in which such a result has not certainly followed — not a single one. Point out to me one, if you can. The history of the publication of our debates is strictly in point. This began by an infringement of the orders of this House. The whole principle upon which the newspaper reports of our proceedings are published is nothing but an infringement of the orders of this House from beginning to end. To the present day it remains such. We have gradually, year after year, been letting more daylight into our proceedings. I have never seen any good result from concealment in in these matters. I have sat, myself, on secret committees, but I have never known one in which anything has occurred that might not have been heard and published at Charing Cross.

Now, in the next place, let me advert to what sometimes takes place when we are debating with closed doors. I well remember a debate of this sort, upon which occasion my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. O'Connell) and myself made, very much in haste, and very much, to be sure, against the rules of this House, the best report that we could manage to prepare of the discussion, and, strange to say, it appeared next morning in the London newspapers. We were called to account, upon the next meeting of the House, for our share in this transaction; and we thought proper to confess ourselves to be the reporters on that occasion, and the very individuals who had communicated the report to the newspapers. By the very same rule that this extraordinary question has been addressed by the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, you ought to put a similar question to any Member before he is put on a committee, as to whether or not he has been a party to the publication of our debates in a newspaper; and, carrying out the same principle, some Honourable Gentleman should have got up and advised the exclusion of my Honourable Friend, the Member for Kilkenny, and myself, from all committees of this House, unless we should, each of us, be ready to promise that we would never again report any debate that may take place here with closed doors, and religiously bind ourselves by a vow to abstain from all such publications in future. I say that we violated the rules of the House on the occasion I have mentioned. Whether we did judiciously or not, I will not now pretend to argue, — but we did violate the rule, just as the gentlemen who sit in that gallery are at this moment preparing to violate your orders, by apprising the public, to-morrow, of what is transpiring among us, to-night.

[Much laughter.]

Well, is it not so? If my Honourable and Learned Friend has violated the regulations of this House, he must be prepared to take the consequences of such violation, just as I and my Honourable and Learned Friend the then Member for Kilkenny were prepared to abide by the consequences of fairly reporting a debate which took place here with closed doors, had we been called up for judgment at that time. With regard, then, to the present proceeding, I look upon it, clearly, as an idle and foolish attempt to shut out daylight from that which, notwithstanding, will be just as well known within a very few hours after the publication of the proceedings and debates of each day's sitting in this committee, as if those debates and proceedings had been of a public nature. I have never known, in short, any good to result from attempts of this description. As I said before, that the name of my Honourable and Learned Friend should be on this committee is what the public will undoubtedly expect, and have a right to expect; and I cannot conceive what mischief can arise from this being done. I forewarn her Majesty's Government that, unless this legitimate expectation be satisfied, instead of the labours of this committee leading to any satisfactory settlement of the Civil List and the Pensions questions, they will only create serious dissatisfaction in the public mind, and originate a strong impression that its interests have not been fairly represented.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I will state, very shortly, the grounds upon which I shall give my vote upon the present occasion; and I feel that, if I cannot do this shortly, I shall have little chance of expounding those grounds at all. I need not now repeat what I have before stated, that I entirely dissent from the course taken by her Majesty's Government with respect to the nomination of this committee. I object to the inquiry, upon principle, — I still think it an unjust one. I am of opinion that, if it was necessary that it should be instituted at all, — if the Queen's Government were prepared, as the responsible advisers of the Crown, to advise the Crown, on a new accession and the consequent termination of arrangements theretofore existing, with regard to such pensions, by the demise of his late Majesty, — if her Majesty's Government were prepared to sanction the institution of such an investigation, and to cause it to be fully entered upon,—it ought to have been undertaken by the Crown itself; because I am convinced that the Government ought, in a matter of this sort, to take all the responsibility which fairly devolves upon it. I confess, therefore, that I think it would have been infinitely better for the Government to have performed this duty, if duty they deemed it to be. But if, on the principle which was advanced by the Noble Lord (J. Russell) at the commencement of the Session, that the King's Government are not responsible — nor bound to take on themselves the responsibility — for whatever measures their supporters may originate, — if that was their view on the present occasion, and if, as they stated in the beginning of the Session, they did not feel themselves disposed, as the responsible advisers of the Crown, to originate this inquiry, — then, I say, it was their bounden duty to have resisted it. I think that either of these courses would have been infinitely better, for the sake of the Crown itself, for the dignity of the Crown, for the prerogative of the Crown. It would have been infinitely better, even if they had not been able, or had deemed it impossible to offer any effectual resistance to inquiry by a committee, to have allowed the appointment of such committee to have been the act of the House of Commons itself, so that it might not have been adopted by this House as the act of her Majesty's Ministers.

I entertain such strong objections, upon principle, to the course which has been adopted, that I have, myself, declined to act upon the committee; and though, on other occasions, even after I have entertained merely doubts upon the propriety of the appointment of any committee, if the sense of the House appeared to be in favour of it, and if a mere matter of policy have been involved in the inquiry, I have never declined to serve; yet where, as in this case, a point of justice intervenes, I have felt it imperative upon me to decline taking any part in the labours of the committee. I have declined, in my own case, to take upon myself any responsibility in this matter, and the question now is, whether I should transfer this responsibility by suggesting the nomination of any other members of the committee, — whether I should vote for the insertion of any other Honourable Member's name? This is a question on which I should have been very much inclined, if I thought it consistent with my character of a representative to adopt such a course, not to give a vote at all; but I hold that that is a most shabby sort of proceeding, and there are but few cases which justify a retirement from the House without voting. I cannot reconcile it with my duty to evade the responsibility of saying ay or no on the present question; and I declare, without hesitation, that I shall vote against the amendment moved by my Honourable Friend the Member for Caithness (Sir George Sinclair). I would place on no other Member the responsibility which I have myself declined — I would suggest the name of no Honourable Member attached to the party with whom I have the honour to act, to be a party to any act of that committee. I do not exactly attach that weight which the Chancellor of the Exchequer attaches to the mere fact of publication. I find, that of the twenty-one suggested Members, fifteen are from that (the Ministerial) side of the House, and only six from my own supporters. Of this I make no complaint. I care not for the proportion of Members from one side or the other; but I adopt the broad principle of avoiding the suggestion of any name. I do not attach so much weight as some Honourable Members seem to do to the reason assigned by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his refusal to insert the Honourable Gentleman's name because he misunderstands the privileges of the House, as is inferred from the mere fact of publication; but I think there is another ground which will induce me to refuse to concur in the insertion of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's name. At the same time, when I consider the nature of the inquiries to be conducted before the present committee, — when I recollect the course which the Honourable Gentleman has taken in the Poor Law Committee, — when I understand that he claims for himself to pursue the same course, and to be exempt from the operation of those resolutions which are held by us to be binding upon all others, — when he refuses to be bound by the usual regulations of this House, — when he repudiates the authority of those general regulations which form a portion of the orders of this House, — when he declares his intention of altering the object of a select committee, — when he asserts the privilege, which I presume he will not deny, to select some individual newspaper, and publish in that, from day to day, the evidence which he may have heard in a committee of this House; — I say, adverting to these particular circumstances, that I do think that there are other grounds besides those which have been stated by the Right Honourable Gentleman why the name of the Honourable and Learned Member (which grounds, however, I do not throw altogether out of consideration, though not attributing to them the same weight which the Right Honourable Gentleman appears to do) ought not to be added to the committee. The Honourable Member for Marylebone has, indeed, stated that the House cannot prevent the evasion by the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, of their resolutions; and I agree with him that it is true that any Member of Parliament, if the committee be not a secret one, may claim the privilege, as a Member, of attending the committee room, and, though he may not vote, yet, in defiance of their regulations, he may subsequently publish the evidence he may hear in the committee room. This may possibly be so, and I am afraid there would be a difficulty in preventing it; but, then, there is a great difference between my tolerating what I cannot prevent, and my being a party to the sanction of that act which I disapprove of. I must take my chance of that, and I must enforce, by the best means available to me of upholding them, the orders and regulations of this House;—but here the proposition is, that I must be a party to the nomination of an Honourable Gentleman who claims, beforehand, the privilege of violating the rules. If he tells me, beforehand, that he claims to himself this privilege, and, after I have consented to his nomination, he exercises it, and by reason of its exercise injustice is done to any,—then, it is evident that I become a party to that injustice; and thus my position would be very different from what it will be now, when I take away from the same Gentleman the chance of doing that which I believe to be unjust and contrary to the regulations of the House. The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Southwark, I am sure, will acquit me of any intention to say any thing disrespectful towards him, in the whole course which I have taken. He will see that I am to look for the best manner of administering impartial justice, and enforcing the regulations of this House; and if I fail in accomplishing these objects, I shall at least have the satisfaction of knowing that I have endeavoured to do my best.

I find it really very painful for me to be called on to express an opinion upon this point; but, as the proposition is forced on me, I tell the Honourable Gentleman, fairly, what is the ground on which I must refuse to concur in his appointment upon such a committee; it is simply for this reason: that I have heard him express such opinions with respect to the principles upon which such an inquiry ought to be conducted,—I have heard that Honourable Gentleman throw such suspicions upon the motives which influenced the grants of pensions in these cases,—I have heard him indulge in such sarcasms upon the persons to whom these pensions are paid, that it is actually impossible for me to concur in his nomination upon any such committee. Now, that is the ground on which I distinctly refuse to incur the responsibility of acquiescing in the proposition of my Honourable Friend. I say so particularly after the two speeches which, in the course of the present Session, I have heard that Honourable Gentleman deliver with respect to the Pension List. And when I have heard him speak of females of high birth and great amiability, and perhaps of advanced years, and have observed the suspicions and insinuations which he has endeavoured to cast upon them,—and when I recollect that these parties are liable to be brought before that committee,—I must at once declare that after those speeches, and those insinuations, I will not be a party to concur in the nomination of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman; and therefore, on this occasion, I shall vote with the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite.

MR. HUME.—The Right Honourable Gentleman has taken a sort of novel line of argument, which makes me regret that it did not give us an opportunity of hearing what is really the principle on which he objects to the appointment of the Honourable and Learned Member. The Right Honourable Gentleman objects to that appointment on account of the two speeches he has made with regard to the Pension List. Now, I might be objected to, also, on the same ground, for the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has not stated a single opinion upon this subject in which I do not most fully concur. I have had the honour to serve on many committees with some Members from whom I have essentially differed; but I hope that no Gentleman will say that they have found me factiously pertinacious in my opposition to them. I have always freely stated my own views on every question, but have been always ready to be bound by the opinion of the majority. The Right Honourable Baronet has, however, not offered any objection to the possibility of my name being on this committee; and yet I fully concur with the Learned Member for Southwark in this case.

SIR R. PEEL.—I know not whether it is the wish of the House that I should answer the appeal which has just been made to me. But if it had been proposed to place the name of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny on the same committee, I should have resisted it. In some respects, my objections are not of a merely personal nature to the Honourable Gentleman. I object to take any share in the responsibility of appointing the committee; and when I speak of the principles on which the inquiries of that committee are to be conducted, I allude, particularly, to the strong opinion which has been expressed by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that the same principles which are applied to the poor law inquiry ought to be applied to the inquiries of the committee on Pensions. That was an opinion in which I could not at all concur, and which I considered to be wholly untenable. But I did also hear from that Honourable Gentleman (the Member for Southwark) certain sentiments, certain reflections and insinuations, I should rather say, which, without referring to them more particularly, I am sure must make them fresh in the recollection of Honourable Gentlemen. I will only say, that there was something in his tone and manner quite as significant as the expressions he made use of on the occasion. When I consider this, and recollect the position, as I said before, and the circumstances of the parties, respectively, who may be called before the committee, I certainly will not give my vote for the nomination of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman on this committee.

Mr. M. ATTWOOD. — I will certainly give my vote for placing the name of the Honourable and Learned Member on the committee. I cannot think that the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel) has given any sufficient reasons to justify the course he intends to pursue in voting against the appointment of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark On the other hand, I think that the conduct which has been manifested on the part of her Majesty's Ministers on this occasion has exhibited a mass of inconsistency. It rather infers a disposition not to do what they mean to do with good faith; and a design to inflict, by an indirect course, a censure upon a particular individual, which they will not venture openly to suggest. When they propose, in this way, to omit the name of an Honourable Member, to whom, and to whose exertions, it is principally owing that this committee has been appointed at all, and who possesses, beyond all other Members of this House, that degree of knowledge and preparation on the subject which is necessary to give effect to the proceedings of such a committee,—I must say that the Government can scarcely complain, if they labour under such an imputation. I must also repeat, with all submission to my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth, that I do not think he has made out a case, at all sufficient to justify his concurrence in this refusal to nominate the Honourable and Learned Gentleman on the committee. The Right Honourable Baronet has relied very much on certain expressions which dropped from the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, on a former occasion. I think the feelings which my Right Honourable Friend has expressed are only such as do honour to his nature; and I desire to be understood as cherishing those feelings as warmly and as sincerely as he does; but he must forgive me if I say that I think, on this occasion, he has allowed them to influence his judgment somewhat too much.

[Cries of "hear, hear!"]

Yes, I say, again, that it is claiming rather too much for feelings of humanity, however excellent in the abstract, to say that, out of regard for them, the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, whose name has been so much called in question, should, on account of certain peculiarities of tone and manner, which my Right Honourable Friend observed in his mode of treating the subject of these pensions, on former occasions, be excluded from this committee. On the other hand, I am bound to say, that I concur very much in the ground which was taken up against the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's nomination by the Noble Lord (J. Russell), and the strength of which was so much reinforced by the argument of the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer. "Do you mean," asked my Right Honourable Friend, "to support the rules, the resolutions, and authority of this House; if you do, you must vote against the appointment of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark on this committee. All you who are content to abandon the authority and to repudiate the orders and resolutions of this House, and to have recourse to others of a more liberal and modern character, may do well to vote for the appointment of this Gentleman. You, on the contrary, who are for upholding those orders and that authority, cannot — without violating your consciences, and your own individual impressions of the necessity of maintaining these regulations — support his nomination." Sir, I am for the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's nomination; yet I feel no such difficulty, — no 'such' compunction on that account, as the Right Honourable Gentleman seems to infer must visit those who concur with me on this occasion. I say, I am for enforcing the authority of this House, — for enforcing, in the fullest manner, all its rules and regulations, and proper privileges. But I will not condescend to resort to the enforcement of them, upon any such footing as my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought proper to put it; namely, that the appointments of Members to serve on a committee of this nature should depend upon the result of a private correspondence and negotiation which has been carried on between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and a certain Honourable and Learned Member of the House, but to which I do not choose to attach any greater degree of importance than I should assign to any private epistolary correspondence. Sir, this House has recognised and constitutional means, — means of enforcing its own authority and regulations. I am for employing those means only, in any case in which its rules and regulations are infringed upon. But I say, let this House rather abandon its rules, its regulations, its privileges, its authority, than sanction a course such as that now suggested by his Majesty's Ministers; which, in my judgment, would amount to an usurpation of the rights of this House, and an infringement on the privileges of the people. "On a former occasion," says the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer, "the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark openly and confessedly violated a specific direction of a committee of which he was a member. What, then, ought to have been the course adopted with regard to that Honourable and Learned Gentleman? Why, that that committee ought to have enforced its own direction or resolution; and that, in the event of its violation, they ought to have brought the matter before the House of Commons. The committee had the means of doing so; this House had the means of responding to such an appeal from the committee. What is the duty of the committee about to be appointed, but to make certain regulations and orders, — abstractedly considered, perhaps of an unimportant character; but in a parliamentary and even constitutional sense, probably of the most vital importance; — and to insist upon their being carried into effect. Let the committee call upon the House to enforce them. There can be no doubt that this House would at once proceed to the discharge of its duty. But my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "That is not what we rely upon." He says, "If we find an Honourable Member who will not observe the rules which we, in our committees, lay down, it is in vain to attempt the observance of those rules by any other means but proscription. We will accordingly adopt a course to put a ban upon such an individual of a nature that shall operate to exclude him from being appointed on any committee whatever."

Now, I desire the House to consider how monstrous an assumption this is; — to what enormous encroachments on the privileges of the subject such a course of dealing on the part of the Government amounts to. The people, or certain classes of them, qualified for that purpose, according to the law which we have enacted, return a certain number of persons to represent them here. Every Member, as I understand the Constitution, enters this House as a representative of the people, upon a perfect footing of equality with any other representative of the people. Now, if this be so, is it competent for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that because, on some former occasion, some Honourable Member happens to have broken through some regulation, which, in a previous Session, was imposed upon him by a particular committee, therefore it shall be incompetent to such Member to exercise one of the most important functions which can devolve upon a Member of Parliament, or to participate in one of the most useful, and, probably, efficient investigations, which Members of Parliament can be called upon to undertake? If, from the non-observance of these rules or directions, which your committees have so laid down, the public business has, in any respect, not been conducted in a proper manner, give me leave to tell you that the fault was with yourselves. You should have looked after your own regulations. Let it be remembered, that the fact of this very imputed violation of your orders occurred in a former Parliament; and yet it is for that by-gone case that her Majesty's Government propose to exclude the Honourable and Learned Gentleman from the exercise of a duty, which he has at once the most undoubted right to discharge, and the most unquestionable ability to perform. I say that the House, in acceding to the proposition of the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer, assumes a right altogether inconsistent with the privileges of this House, — involving a direct infraction of the privileges of the people, and unwarranted by anything which has occurred in the conduct of the Honourable and Learned Member. I therefore shall give my vote against a course of proceeding which, if it shall be affirmed, I am prepared to contend is altogether unworthy of those constitutional opinions which should actuate a majority of this House.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—It has been remarked by the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, that the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing to exclude the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, has been guilty of an usurpation of power and an infringement of the privileges of the people, by proposing to omit him from the list of a committee for exercising one of the most important duties which his constituents sent him into this House to discharge. It rests with the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, and with him only, to say whether he is or is not a proper person to be placed upon a committee in such a special case as this? I say, in answer to such a charge, that we have no right to deprive a Member, who is a representative of the people, of the power of exercising one of the most important functions they have confided to him. We do not wish to wrong him out of one of the most essential privileges which attach to him in that capacity. What are the circumstances under which we are called upon to make a decision in a case of this sort? The House has determined,—and in my opinion they have determined most properly,—that evidence, until reported to this House by the select committee appointed to receive it, shall not be published by any member of that committee, or by any other person. It is not, as the Honourable and Learned Member for Oxford supposes, a mere question as to the time at which the publication is to take place, but it is a question whether evidence not reported to the House shall be published by any member of that committee? I appeal to every Gentleman who is in the habit of sitting on committees, whether one of the questions most frequently discussed by them is not this, whether particular evidence is or is not fit for publication? I see, now, an Honourable Baronet (Sir W. Molesworth) sitting next to the Honourable Member for Southwark. That Honourable Baronet, I am sure, cannot have forgotten that, last year, when he was chairman of the select committee on transportation, a great deal of evidence was given which it was the unanimous opinion of that committee was not fit for publication; and before we agreed on the evidence to be reported to the House, we struck out those portions I refer to from the minutes of the committee.

What, then, is the pretension which is now assumed or set up by the Honourable Gentleman? It is this. That the question which, according to the practice of Parliament, it rests with the committee to decide upon, is as to the publication of evidence taken before it. That is a very nice and a very delicate question to determine: namely, as to the fitness or unfitness of particular evidence to come before the public; and upon this question it is always for the majority of a committee to determine; but the Honourable Member for Southwark being on such a committee as this, he, of his own sole will and pleasure, has the power of overruling the decision of that committee; and whereas the twenty-one Members proposed by my Right Honourable Friend might say, "This or that evidence it is not, on the whole, desirable to publish;" yet, the Honourable Member for Southwark could reply, "You may decide as you please—you twenty-one Members may so determine, and your judgment may be very good; but in spite of the resolution you have unanimously come to, and in defiance of the rules of the House (that evidence is not to be published which you do not sanction), in spite of all that, I think the evidence ought to be published, and it shall appear in the newspapers to-morrow, in the teeth of your opposition." The Honourable and Learned Member perhaps may not use that which he seems to consider is his legal privilege, to this extent; but neither to that Honourable Member, nor any other Member, could he think of intrusting the discretionary power of overruling the decision of the majority of every committee of which he chances to be a member. The decision of the majority, on a point of this sort, in my opinion, ought to be binding.

I must add, with the Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir R. Peel), this much with respect to the speeches of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, that, without wishing to say anything disrespectful of him, they proved that he, at least, is not a fit person with whom to leave such a discretionary power. I say that the Honourable Member, in the exercise of that which he believes to be his conscientious judgment, may come to a different conclusion from that of other members of the committee, as to what evidence ought to be published, and what not. Because there is, too, a farther consideration to be borne in mind beyond the decision of what evidence ought and ought not to be published: namely, that that decision has reference not only to the question, what evidence shall be published, and what shall not be? but to the condition, that if it be published at all, it shall be published in a complete and authentic form. That evidence is taken down by short-hand writers, whom we employ under the supervision of the chairman, and they are responsible to the House for the fulness and accuracy of these reports. I say, therefore, that I will not, for one, admit the right of volunteer reporters to give their reports of evidence in such a form, and published in such a manner, as may suit their own opinions or their wishes. I say, that to permit such proceedings to such parties, would be a course full of danger to the privileges of this House, and full of injury to the rights of individuals. The House, too, must not forget that there are many circumstances which make this question, at the present moment, of peculiar importance. Honourable Gentlemen can hardly have forgotten the proceedings which have taken place with respect to our right to protect the publications printed under our authority. In all the discussions upon that point, it was declared to be of the utmost importance that the members of our committees should exercise a sound discretion as to what questions should be proposed, and what part of the evidence received by them should be allowed to appear on their minutes, in order to avoid as much as possible the infliction of unnecessary injury to private individuals. If, then, we put this responsibility on committees, are we to allow a single individual to act on his own private judgment in opposition to the deliberate resolution of such committees, and, in spite of their rules or determination, to publish any part, or all of that evidence, in such form as he may think ought to be adopted? I have only further to say, entertaining these opinions as to the importance of our maintaining the rule which was unanimously affirmed by the resolution of this House, last year, that I entirely concur with the Right Honourable Baronet as to the great distinction which he says exists between our placing the Honourable Member upon the committee, and our tolerating his violation of its rules; if we find we cannot avoid tolerating, and if the question should be raised, I think we should find means to prevent it. I agree that there is a great difference between placing the Honourable Member on the committee, and allowing him to take advantage of his privilege as a member to publish the evidence. We shall, no doubt, find means to prevent such publication; but when the Honourable Member distinctly affirms, in the letter which has been read to the House, that he will not consent to put in abeyance what he calls a valuable privilege, but what the House deems to be a breach of its privileges, — I conceive we shall not be acting respectfully towards the House if we place that Honourable Member's name on the committee. But then, the Honourable Member for Bridport says, "Oh! we always get the worst of these discussions upon the question of publication," and it is true that great difficulties do inevitably attend upon all such cases.

With respect to the debates of this House, I agree with the Honourable Member that all attempts to prevent their publication have been and ought to be defeated; but I will say that with proceedings before select committees the case is very different. Having, in the course of my duties, served upon many committees of considerable importance, it has happened within my own experience to have seen the discretion of those committees exercised on several occasions, in withholding evidence from publication; a matter, this, of very considerable importance. On the Slavery and Transportation Committees, and many others, discretion has been exercised in this way. I cannot sit down without remarking that the Noble Lord, who says that he would not give a factious vote on this occasion, has been very unfortunate in coming down to the House prepared with a speech which does not quite correspond with the subject under our consideration. It was, indeed, prepared for his case, which he was aware of, namely, our unwillingness to place the Honourable Member for Southwark on the committee; but which was not at all suited to meet the reason we have assigned for that unwillingness. Our bonâ fide reason for objecting to it is, that the Honourable Member will not admit himself to be bound by the resolutions of this House regarding the publication of evidence. If he will distinctly state that he feels himself so bound ——

["Hear," and, "No, no!"]

I do not think it will be the slighest imputation on the honour or character of any Member of this House, if he will say that he is bound by the resolutions of this House. If the Honourable Member for Southwark will distinctly make this declaration, then my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that he himself will move that the name of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark shall be put on the list of this committee.

LORD VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH. — I was not aware that I should have to congratulate the Noble Lord on the conclusion of his speech, in which he has made an allusion to me, which I must take leave to tell him, was rather unwarrantable; because my speech, to which he alluded, I desire to state, was not a prepared one, as he says, nor did I come down to the House to-night at all prepared with any speech to deliver to the House. Perhaps the Noble Lord cannot say precisely the same thing. Though not so old, I believe, as the Noble Lord himself, I must further tell him, that he was incorrect in another particular; for it does so happen, that I was perfectly aware of the subject of the debate, and of the intention of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, to publish whatever evidence might be adduced before this committee. But although I have not had so much experience as the Noble Lord, I did venture to think, in my simplicity, that this House of Commons might correct that error in the Honourable Member for Southwark, by allowing so much only of the evidence to be published as might safely, from time to time, go before the world; whilst at the tame time it was my wish to expose to the public the plan adopted by her Majesty's Government, who, whilst pretending to court every inquiry into the Pension List, are, in reality, adopting the very best means they can think of, for interposing such a plan of proceeding, as may cover over the inquiry, and screen it from public observation.

[Loud cheers from the Opposition, and cries of, "Spoke, spoke!" from the Ministerial benches.]

Oh, I have done; I rose only to explain, and I cannot sit down without once more congratulating the Noble Lord on having entirely misapprehended, or misinterpreted, my sentiments. I hope he will take my explanation in good part.

LORD HOWICK. — I thank the Noble Lord for his explanation, which has, however, left the matter considerably more obscure than it previously was.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I have but one observation to offer, in consequence of what fell from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth. He said that he was anxious not to take any share in the responsibility of this question; having had no share previously in the original suggestion, or in the nomination of the committee. In that view of the question, I, for one, entirely concur, and though, on that very account, I must agree with him, other gentlemen, who think with me on the merits of this question, are placed, with me in a very painful situation. I am convinced that from the omission of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's name on this committee, it will go forth to the country that a desire prevails here to prevent a strict and searching inquiry into the whole of this subject. On the other hand, if we vote for the insertion of Mr. Harvey's name in this list, we, to a certain extent, make ourselves parties to any injurious consequences which may consequently ensue. Regretting, as I unquestionably do, to differ from the Right Honourable Baronet, under whose banner it has always been most gratifying to me to find myself arrayed, I must, I fear, on this occasion, come under the lash of his censure, and take that part which he has designated, in adverting to it, by the epithet "shabby." There are occasions, however, on which I think that it is justifiable not to vote on a question, even when it has been submitted, in this distinct form; and as I consider the present to be one of those occasions, I shall leave the House without giving a vote on this occasion.

MR. WAKLEY. — I have listened with very great attention to what has been said by her Majesty's Government on this occasion, and confess that I am not a little puzzled to get at the real meaning of what has fallen from them. The Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the name of the Learned Member for Southwark suggested itself, at the very outset of his proposition for the committee, as the very first that ought to be placed upon the list of it. Then, he went on to state, that he had heard certain observations from the Honourable and Learned Member which did make it very unadvisable to place his name on the committee. After all this, the Noble Lord (Howick) the Secretary at War told us, as his Right Honourable Friend had done, that if the Honourable and Learned Member had been excluded from the committee, it was his (Mr. Harvey's) own fault; that her Majesty's Ministers were, actually, most desirous of placing him upon it: "but still," continued the Noble Lord, "some expressions have escaped from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, in the course of the preliminary discussions on this question, which render it, in the highest degree, inexpedient that we should give our consent to any such appointment." In the next place, the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth has avowed,—and most frankly,—that the mode of examination which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has intimated it to be his intention to institute in the committee does make it impossible for him to give his consent to the nomination of my Honourable and Learned Friend upon this committee of inquiry. And for my part, if I could, for one moment, believe that such an inquiry as that in question would be conducted on the grinding, cruel principles of the New Poor Law Act, I would give my vote against the institution of this inquiry into the Pension List altogether. But I will not commit a double injustice. I think the principles of the inquiries entered into under the new poor law are both unjust and cold-blooded. I will never consent to subject to the application of a similar mode of investigation those who have been for many years in the receipt of pensions, and who, themselves, are not, after all, in fault; for if there be blame attaching on this account to any parties, it must attach, not to them who have committed no offence, but to those who granted them their pensions. The imputed offence of my Honourable and Learned Friend, it should be recollected, is a mere point to conceal the real ground of objection to him, which is, that he is deemed an inconvenient person. He is too shrewd and discriminating for Honourable Members who would have to act with him on the committee. Yet, surely, that cannot avail as a sufficient objection in this House. Reference has been made to the Honourable Member's conduct in the Poor Law Committee. Now, I myself had the honour to serve on that committee, and I can say that I never witnessed more fair, manly, honest, or intrepid conduct on the part of any one, on any committee, than the whole deportment of the Honourable Member on that occasion. He did not attempt to shield himself from any responsibility. He said, at once, that he was the author of the publication of the evidence of that committee: and I do most distinctly assert, that the Honourable Gentleman did not pledge himself to act in violation of the rules of the House, as it is now stated he did, but that he did say, "If you think I am violating the rules and privileges of the House, bring forward the question, and take the sense of the House on it. Let the sense of the House, I say, be taken; but, in the mean while, I will not even tell you what I shall do after it shall have been so taken." This was the conduct, this the language, of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. And what, let me ask, could be more fair? For one, I feel extremely grateful to the Honourable and Learned Member for what he has done in giving these publications. He has made the poor of the kingdom, and the friends of the poor, acquainted with what is passing in the committee, and he says to them, "If you have complaints to make, let them be made now, for here is a committee sitting." Is it not, I would ask of you, a farce to be so nice about a breach of your privileges, when within a few yards of you you behold your privileges violated daily? Is it not a violation of your privileges to publish your debates? and yet are they not published daily; and would the people of England submit to it if they were not so published? And yet this publication takes place in the teeth of your standing order for the exclusion of strangers. I am glad, however, that this discussion has taken place, for by it the people of England will be enabled to see how a man is treated in this House who stands up for popular rights — a man whose talents are an honour and a dignity to this assembly, as they are the pride of his English countrymen, and who sheds a lustre upon every subject that he discusses. It is a disgrace to this House to have permitted him to be so long and so violently persecuted as he has been. As to the inquiry respecting the Woods and Forests, the Honourable Member has been excluded from it; neither was he permitted to be on the inquiry into charities, when twenty unknown persons were placed on that commission. The people of England, I can assure you, are not unmindful of these things; and, instead of inflicting an injury upon the Honourable Member, the attempt to stamp degradation upon him, by presenting him to the world as an individual with whom the members of her Majesty's Government will not associate in a committee, will reflect honour upon him throughout the nation. I have seen enough of this House to know, that if a man, here, stands up for popular rights, he must always calculate upon violent ministerial persecution.

MR. EDWARD L. BULWER. — I

quite agree with the Honourable Gentleman who spoke last, that the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark is certainly gifted with talents, if not unequalled, certainly not surpassed by those of any other Honourable Member in this House. Having, myself, served on committees of this House with the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, I can state that I have always known the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to have sincerely and conscientiously discharged his duty. I have always said that the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark was an ill-used and injured man. Before, however, I approach the subject before the House, I must state that the Honourable Member for Finsbury (Mr. Wakley) began his speech with the most extraordinary misstatement possible. That Honourable Member has put into the mouth of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of my Noble Friend (Lord Howick), the sentiments which fell from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and "No, no!"]

I beg pardon. My Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not utter a single sentence respecting the opinions of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Southwark upon the analogy he had drawn between the principles of examination applicable under the new poor law and an inquiry into pensions. The Honourable Member for Finsbury has also misstated the sentiments of the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland. That Noble Lord (Lord Howick) did not say that there was anything in the sentiments of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark which ought to preclude him from serving on this committee; but he did say that there was something in his (Mr. Harvey's) sentiments which ought to make the House feel doubly the responsibility of intrusting the Honourable and Learned Member with discretionary power. I certainly approach this question with great reluctance. I still must think that the committee will not be satisfactory if the name of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark be omitted from it. But I have to consider this, whether it is not the greater evil of the two, that we should suffer one man, however able and influential, openly to disregard and disdain an express resolution of this House. The Honourable Member for Oxford (Mr. Maclean), and other Honourable Members who have spoken on this question, appeared to think that punishment is better than prevention. Instead of endeavouring to prevent the consequences that would occur to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman if he should persist in committing a breach of privilege, those Honourable Members seem to exult in the prospect of the Honourable and Learned Member being brought to the bar of this House. But what are you to do in such a case, supposing the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Southwark to persist in his publication? Will you send for the publisher or printer of the True Sun, and send him to Newgate? or will you call before you, and vote for the expulsion of the Honourable and Learned Member? There may be resolutions of the House of which it is very desirable that the infringement should be punished; but some of those resolutions may be strained too tightly. I have seen enough of discussions on cases of breach of privilege; and I think the House will be perfectly right to do all in its power to prevent being dragged into one, if possible. The real question before the House is this, — that we have to do justice to the public, to satisfy the public mind, and to remove misrepresentation. If the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark is to have the power of ex parte publication, instead of satisfying the public mind, he will only inflame and irritate it the more. Besides, we have a duty to perform towards the pensioners. But they cannot hope for justice from the committee if they see one member intrusted with a power which none of the other twenty-one members have, and that man, too, the most eloquent, the most inveterate, and the most consistent of their enemies.

Under all the circumstances, what have her Majesty's Ministers done? They have acted, I contend, like men of honour. They never said — and let it go forth to the people, and be rightly understood — they never said, or proposed to say, that the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark ought not to be placed on the committee. They made no such compromise. I clearly understand them to have done no such thing. On the contrary, they came forward and said, "We do full justice to your talents and your services, and we invite you to become a member of the committee. We fully appreciate the services you have rendered, but we shall, if compelled to form a choice, prefer even to your assistance, valuable though it might be, the certainty of fair play towards all parties. If you determine to persist in breaking through the rules and orders of the House, we, at least, are determined to vindicate them. We prefer, also, as men standing up for the dignity of the House, the declared resolution of this House to the opinion of an individual Member; and, finally, we prefer the prevention of a breach of privilege, to punishing it after it has been committed." I have to add only this, — that, having invariably voted with the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark on all his motions for inquiry, I think it but fair and manly in the present instance to state that is with a feeling of regret I am compelled to vote against him on the present occasion; and I would yet trust that the Honourable and Learned Member will get up in his place and save further discussion, by saying that which no man need be ashamed to say, — "Though I could not succumb in a correspondence with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I do not hesitate to say in the presence of the representatives of the people, that I will be bound by their opinion." This statement, in my judgment, the House has a right to expect from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — I cannot conceive any course more unbecoming the dignity of the proceedings of this House, than that which has been adopted by her Majesty's Government on the present occasion. Neither can I remember to have heard speeches more extraordinary than those in which they have endeavoured to enforce that course. If the Noble Secretary at War, with equal courtesy and justice, thought fit to accuse the Noble Lord near me (Lord Castlereagh) of coming down to this House with a ready prepared speech, the Noble Lord near me could not retort upon the Noble Secretary at War, for the speech of the latter was unquestionably innocent of the slightest appearance of "preparation." If, indeed, there was any preparation in it, it resembled some of those combinations which chemists occasionally prepare, one ingredient or element of which neutralises another; so that the residuum is exactly represented by — nil. The Noble Secretary says, that to place the Learned Member for Southwark on this committee, would be to destroy the privileges of this House as asserted by a specific resolution. How do they seek to make good this case against him? They seem to reason thus: — "The Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark sat on a former committee: he gave the proceedings, and the evidence taken before that committee, to the public, in daily promulgations. Now, this House did not at that time, or since, call the Learned Gentleman to account for doing so; and, therefore, we, the Government, will" —— do what? Call him to account, now? Take some course, now, which shall make it at once improper and penal in any Gentleman, being a Member of Parliament, to venture on a similar proceeding hereafter? No. That is not the course which the Queen's Government propôse to take; but to administer a preliminary question to the Learned Member for Southwark, as to whether or not he will hereafter violate a given resolution of this House? Now, if the Honourable and Learned Member had answered that question in the affirmative, and had said, "I certainly will, if you place me on this committee, publish the evidence and proceedings, and thereby violate the resolution and vote, in virtue of which you propose to exclude me;" — then his exclusion would become a matter of necessity, as well as of right, and would carry the assent of the House with it. But what do they do in respect of the remaining twenty-one Members who are to sit on that committee? Do they make the round of these one and twenty gentlemen, and say to each and all of them, "Will you publish, or not, the proceedings of this committee?" What right had the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer to assume that the Learned Member for Southwark would fly in the face of a resolution of the House of Commons? Was it that that Honourable and Learned Gentleman had actually done so before? Why, if he had, it was the duty of the Noble Lord, who is the leader of this House, and who leads it so efficiently, to visit the infraction of its orders with signal punishment, and so to vindicate its authority in the face of the country. But the forbearance of the Government on the former occasion, contrasted with its present proceeding, does proclaim aloud, that there is one individual, a Member of the House of Commons, who beards its authority with impunity, and that this House of Commons has not the courage to bring him to its bar. If there be any triumph attaching to the privilege which the Learned Member for Southwark has sought to establish, he must certainly find it on the event of this night's discussion. Is it, then, that I concur with that Honourable and Learned Member in his eloquent denunciations against pensions, — is it that

I approve of the step which her Majesty's Ministers have now taken as to those pensions, in violation of their repeated declarations and disclaimers on that subject? No. For reasons the very contrary of these, do I stand here to support the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark's claim to be put on this committee, — and, by so doing, in my judgment, to vindicate the privileges of Members of this House. The Honourable Member for the city of Lincoln (Mr. E. L. Bulwer) has told us that he prefers prevention to punishment. But you cannot, it is admitted, prevent the offence of which he spoke, — and if you could, a pretty course, truly, you take for that purpose! You say, that the Honourable and Learned Member has already violated the rule and resolution of the House; and then you say, you have never visited that violation with censure or with punishment, — that you will prevent him from offending in the same manner again, by excluding him from the discharge of those duties as a member of the committee in question, on which it seems to be agreed on all hands that he is, of all men in the country, the most fitted and best qualified. Why, Sir, I maintain that you have no right to deprive the country of the eminent services of such an individual. Let it be recollected, as a testimony to his honour, that a Noble Lord, the Member for North Devon (Lord Ebrington), told the House on a former occasion, that he had been convinced by some of the arguments which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, in the course of that debate had brought forward (arguments with which, I own, I, for one, did not concur), that his previous appreciation of the new poor law was an erroneous one. The arguments of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman were, that the new poor law operated most unfairly upon, and dealt most harshly with, the poor; that under that Act your inquiries dealt out one measure to the poor, that under the proposed enquiry as to pensions, you would deal out another measure to the rich. Surely these arguments, if the Honourable and Learned Gentleman can demonstrate their solidity, and we have heard how successfully he has urged them, ought to give him a place on the proposed committee.

[Loud cries of "Question, question!"]

I feel deep regret at being driven to adopt the course which I am now about to take; and that regret is the greater because I am compelled to differ from a Right Honourable Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) whose conduct in relation to this question, has been, as usual, distinguished by its manly openness, and the absence of all mere popularity-hunting professions. I feel no ordinary pain in differing from him, as, in this instance, I do; but I am bound by the conviction of my own mind upon the question, to support the motion of the Honourable Baronet the Member for Caithness, in favour of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I am extremely anxious to say one word on the present occasion; and the more so, because I find, not without much pain, that I must vote against her Majesty's Ministers. On general occasions, it is my pride and my satisfaction to vote with her Majesty's Government; but on this occasion, I must sever myself from them, because I believe that the course which they are about to take will render them unpopular, and deservedly unpopular, in the country. There are two grounds — the one of a personal, and the other of a general nature — on which the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark has been excluded from the committee. The personal ground of objection has been entirely confined to a publication, in a former Parliament, of evidence taken before a committee. A pledge is now required of the Honourable and Learned Member that he will not, if he should be appointed a member of this committee on pensions, publish, or cause to be published, any evidence which may be taken before it, as in the previous instance, without permission of the committee, from day to day. On this last point I cannot help thinking that the House has the entire control in its own hands. If the Honourable and Learned Member should, in this or in any future instance, act wrongfully, by infringing the orders of the House, it is a matter which ought to be, by some other Honourable Gentleman, brought substantially before the House, as a question of a violation of its own resolutions. I am not prepared to say how I should vote on such a question; but, upon general principles, I think it probable that I should support the standing orders of the House. On general principle, it might be very convenient to uphold and vindicate them. But I can imagine some cases in which it might be much otherwise. On the second or general principle, the Noble Secretary at War has objected that, though you might prevent the Learned Member for Southwark from publishing, day by day, yet the time might come at which the Learned Member might feel himself justified in publishing the evidence taken before this committee. I think that is one of the most singular reasons I ever heard assigned for excluding any Honourable Gentleman from a committee. The Noble Lord has told us what is the usual course with regard to evidence taken before committees; but I contend that the Noble Lord raised, on this head, an argument fraught with the most dangerous consequences. I am clear that you act quite unfairly in calling on the Honourable and Learned Member for a pledge as to the future, in consequence of an alleged former offence. You have no right to do this. The Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark has challenged inquiry and trial; why was it refused? On general grounds, I think that this committee should not be of one side; I am anxious that there should be an appearance of fairness and of a fair investigation. I do not believe that there has been anything in the conduct of the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark which would preclude fair inquiry.

I consider that many of the remarks that have been made on the Learned Member for Southwark were most irrelevant. Of the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, on this occasion, I will say, that, if I was not decided before — or had wanted any argument to determine me — as to the course which I ought to pursue with reference to the appointment of the Learned Member on this committee, or his exclusion from it; the speech of the Right Honourable Gentleman would have settled my opinion on the matter. It amounted neither to more nor to less than this; — that, because my Honourable and Learned Friend spoke of the individuals on the Pension List in a tone and manner which did not happen to accord with the Right Honourable Baronet's feelings on the subject, therefore he ought not to be named of this committee. Sir, I support the nomination of that Honourable and Learned Gentleman. I say that, if you reject him, the country, — after the number of years during which that Honourable and Learned Member has called for an investigation into the Pension List, — after recently seeing that call at length attended to, — the Honourable and Learned Member having delivered upon the subject some of the most splendid speeches ever heard within these walls, — the country, when it finds the question taken out of the Honourable and Learned Member's hands, — the country, I repeat, will not place much confidence in the report of a committee on the Pension List, on the list of which the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark shall appear to have been omitted.

SIR ADOLPHUS DALRYMPLE. — The course which has been taken by the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to me to put the orders of the House altogether out of the question, because the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark will not comply with the request to give a certain pledge required of him in relation to a prospective possible violation of those orders. The Right Honourable Gentleman, however, — as one of the originators of this committee, — having taken upon himself the responsibility of naming the Members to serve on it; I do not feel disposed to relieve him from any portion of that responsibility; but I shall, following the course chalked out by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, vote against the appointment of the Learned Member for Southwark on this Committee.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY. — Before I proceed to make a few remarks on the subject matter of discussion, I cannot forego the pleasure of offering the thanks of a grateful and generous heart to my Honourable Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. E. L. Bulwer), and also to the Honourable Baronet the Member for Caithness, for their noble, manly, and kind-hearted expressions of opinion, arising from a long and disinterested attention to the investigation in which I have been so deeply concerned. They have sat upon that inquiry without ceasing for many weeks, from giving to it the most patient investigation; and they have now the manliness to own, what, indeed, they have never concealed, their full and deep conviction that I have been most cruelly persecuted. I cannot help also stating my firm belief, as one whose mind is constantly sustained by the cheering conviction, that the wrongs of man cannot be unceasing, but that the stern decrees of higher justice will eventually be awarded to him: — that, however men may be led away by the grovelling influences of party, there will yet be a disposition to protect him from the effects of the most severe, the most unjust, and the most tyrannical persecution that was ever inflicted by an irresponsible despotism. Having said thus much, I will briefly notice the subject before the House. I cannot concede to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the truth of his anxiety to place me on this committee. The pretension is falsified on three distinct palpable grounds. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he originally proposed that the Civil List Committee, upon which my name did not appear, should be the only committee to which the inquiry into pensions should be confided. What, then, did the Chancellor of the Exchequer mean by telling the House, and through it the country, that from the beginning he thought me one of the first who ought to be appointed? This is the first specimen of cajolery. I will next come to the letter which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has written. I will not stop to inquire whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by virtue of his office, has a right to inquire of Members that which would be tolerated in no other quarter; but I should like to know by what right the Chancellor of the Exchequer summons a Member of this House into Downing Street, to ask him what he will do, or what he will not do? But, having received my reply, the Chancellor of the Exchequer attempts to fix an interpretation upon it, which no person who reads it dispassionately will for a moment apply to it. What was my reply? While, on the one hand, I spurned the indignity that was attempted to be put upon me, by leading me into an unworthy contract, —(for I felt I should be disqualified for holding a seat in this House, or to associate in any way with gentlemen, if I had consented to any agreement of the kind, or had I consented that a great public right should, in my person, be prejudiced by making contemptible conditions, in order to get placed on a hard working committee:)—yet I did say, and I unfeignedly repeat it, that there may be circumstances in which it would be not only undesirable, but highly unjust, to publish evidence in the way alluded to. I am not now a new Member; I am of twenty years' standing in this House; and I appeal to those who have known me during that period, to attest in justification of my statement, that my course implied not only an upright judgment, but a generous and kindly feeling.

Although the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his letter, disclaims giving an opinion upon my conduct on the Poor Law Committee, the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell), his colleague, has not done so. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer disclaimed, that Noble Lord took up as a most prominent ground of objection. The Noble Lord, in referring to my conduct on the Poor Law Committee, has made a great mistake as to the facts. First of all, I may be allowed to call the attention of the Noble Lord to what passed in the committee; and my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume), an indefatigable member of that committee, will bear testimony to the truth of my statements. The paper with which I am connected was not the first to publish the proceedings of that committee; another newspaper was produced before the committee, to which their attention was called, from which it appeared that partial and garbled statements of the evidence were given; and I am the first to contend that such conduct was highly unjust, and ought to be visited, if repeated, by the sternest displeasure of the committee, — indeed, not only of the committee, but of the House. In the progress of the inquiry, peculiar circumstances arose which rendered the course I took indispensable. Out of the twenty-four gentlemen composing the committee, twenty were avowedly opposed to the course which the minority deemed it their duty to pursue. But what was it which led to the course which I took, and which I am proud of having taken? I saw seated, at the bar of the committee, two or three of the commissioners connected with the poor law inquiry; I saw their intelligent secretary — I saw their short-hand writer— I saw all the appliances of office,—I found them not only taking down what was passing in the committee, but writing directly into the country to make inquiries into the truth of the statements given in evidence, — crowding the committee with witnesses to control, counteract, and contradict the testimony which was previously adduced; and I immediately pointed it out to the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell), and said that it was not a candid or honourable inquiry, if, on the one hand, you see this great institution, — the poor law commission, with all their agents and appliances, with the aid of the committee, making inquiries throughout the country against a class of people who, poor of themselves, had no means whatever of summoning witnesses at their own expense, or obtaining the necessary communications. I pointed out, also, that there was scarcely any sympathy between them and the committee, and that, unless the evidence were published from day to day, and the evidence proclaimed, I said, distinctly, that the inquiry would become a matter, not only of hypocrisy, but of the grossest insult and injustice towards those whom it was nominally intended to protect, but in reality to insult.

That course I took, and when the subject was brought forward whether the conduct of my paper should be brought under the consideration of the House, did I not say that I would scorn to shelter myself behind the printer, or any other servant who was earning a few shillings a week? Did I not take upon myself the whole responsibility, and say that if you went to Somerset House you would find my name registered as sole proprietor of the True Sun? Did I not state that I was prepared to encounter whatever penalty the law might direct? and did I not add that it was absurd to have a law without the power of causing its infringment to be punished? And what did the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell) do, to vindicate the integrity of the orders and regulations of the House? The Noble Lord came down to the committee, and after communications with the committee and myself as to the course which ought to be pursued, proposed an express motion that the evidence which was received from day to day should be published. But, said the Noble Lord, the Member for Northumberland, "Was any body at liberty to publish the evidence in whatever shape he pleased — would the House sanction garbled statements and evidence given in such a way?" I defy the Noble Lord to produce any portion of the evidence I have published that is not verbatim the evidence which was given before the committee, and which, with the consent of the committee, and the support of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, was allowed, from day to day, to be published. I will now come to the third point, as my object is to show to the House the hollowness of the pretexts on which the Government have objected to me. In the former part of the evening I alluded to the eagerness with which they seized godsends, their everlasting dabbling in mischief, and the readiness with which they catch at every straw floating upon the muddy stream in which they are unceasingly floundering. With what eagerness did they seize on the ungenerous suggestion of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth! That Right Honourable Baronet said that certainly he had his sentiments with respect to the publication of evidence, but that it was not his intention to oppose the motion upon that ground. Oh, no! — the Right Honourable Baronet said that his reason for supporting the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, that I am a gentleman much given to indulge in sarcasms, — that I am in the habit of coming forward and making contrasts between the poor and the rich, — that I ventured to say that all persons who received the public money ought to be open to inquiry, and treated as mendicants, and that I would subject them to the same sort of test as the poor old widow I am so fond of alluding to, — that he remembered very well that allusion, and the other allusions of the Honourable Member for Southwark to the bastardy clauses of the Poor Law Bill, — that I draw distinctions between the unfortunate poor and the illegitimate offspring of courtly connections, — that such sarcastic remarks were indecent, and had rendered the author of them unfit to be a Member of the committee! If dulness be the qualification that is to fit Honourable Gentlemen for committees, I congratulate the Treasury bench that they will have their hands full.

I will say, then, on these three grounds, that I discredit the assertion which has been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he was solicitous that I should be on the committee. I beg to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman whence he infers that, after receiving my reply, with respect to which he wished the House to come to the same conclusion as himself, it is impossible to read it without perceiving that the writer intended to set the rules of the House at defiance — if that be so, whence is it, — and does it not appear most extraordinary, — that he did not make some communication to me, informing me that such was his impression? Surely I might have expected to have heard from the Right Honourable Gentleman somewhat to this effect: — "The Chancellor of the Exchequer presents his compliments to Mr. Harvey, and begs to acknowledge the receipt of his letter, which, however, he regrets to say is so far unsatisfactory that until he hears further from him, he cannot consent to place him on the committee." Did the Right Honourable Gentleman pursue that course? No. He reserved his reply, and I heard nothing from him on the subject till to-night, except, indeed, a communication made to me by an Honourable Friend of mine, the nature of which I will state to the House; but I will not give my Honourable Friend's name, because he is not now present. That Honourable Gentleman came to me and said, "I am authorised to inform you that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is satisfied with your letter, and your name will be on the committee; but do not be surprised if somebody, not connected with the Government, asks you whether you mean to publish the evidence or not. So far as the Chancellor of the Exchequer is concerned, he will raise no objection.

[Much laughter, and loud cries of "Hear!"]

If I am challenged as to the truth of the statement, when the Honourable Member appears in this House, I will bring him face to face with the Right Honourable Gentleman. My Honourable Friend inquired of me whether I would give that assurance, and my answer was, "No;" for no earthly consideration would I consent to be placed in such a degraded position.

Having thus answered the personal part of the matter, there is one other remark that I wish to make, to show how irrelevant is this attack on me, as it applies to me, personally. It will be in the recollection of this House that, in the spirit which I believe engenders the present opposition, some four or five years back, a resolution was passed, which was aimed directly at me as a Member of this House, concerned with its private business. Have you found me — can any man get up in his place and say — can any professional man, in or out of this House, say, that he has found me, by any means, directly or indirectly, endeavouring to controvert or evade that resolution, which was a harsh and cruel resolution, as regards its effect on my private fortune? I bowed obedient to that resolution, as I would to any other deliberately passed by the House. Did I allow my interests, as a private individual, to govern me? No; I was superior to all selfish considerations. What I esteem as the rightful rules of Parliament, while I am a Member of this Assembly, I will observe; and I will take care well to weigh the solidity of my opinions before I presume, in any case, to disregard its rules. If I had been on this committee, — and I will not swerve a syllable, I will not breathe a word, to induce any Gentleman to suppose that I am in the least relenting, with a view to conciliating one vote, or to calm a single apprehension, — but I will say that, if I had been on this committee, — (and my conduct would be the same on any other committee), — I never would violate a rule of this House, if, in so doing, I should find myself in a situation of individual opposition. But, many of my Honourable Friends on the Poor Law Committee, — to which so much reference has been made, — thought that the evidence ought to be published; and finding my views so supported, I stepped forward and did that which I considered it my duty to do, hazarding all the personal consequences. I shrank not from encountering the difficulties which presented themselves, my express purpose being that of vindicating what I considered the rights of the community.

As to the appeal that has been made to me, I ask the Honourable Gentleman whom I have the honour of addressing not to regard this as a personal question. What appertains to myself can be of no moment — a fleeting shadow the House should pass over. But I do ask them to look at this question as regards themselves. I ask them to reflect well, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whoever he may be, for the time being, be allowed to call on any Gentleman to forego his judgment as to the course he would pursue on a committee, which, in all probability, would be the next step: would it not be, that your committees, instead of being composed of independent men, would be made up of the mere slaves of the Government, the degraded hacks of office? I have heard it asserted, and can fancy it to be true, that some Gentlemen on the Civil List Committee received an intimation before they were put there, — before they had the honour of being placed on a committee, which has no power to send for "papers, persons, or records," — and with respect to which it has been said that the intention was, that it should be a powerless committee, one that could do no mischief.

[Laughter, and cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I repeat, I can fancy it to be true, that some Honourable Gentlemen, before they were placed on this hopeless, powerless committee, were asked, though they might conscientiously differ from the Ministerial proposition, to say nothing about the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster. I can fancy the Government addressing Gentlemen before they are placed on the committee: — "Your intentions may be honest; but they may be at variance with our views, and we wish to know what you intend to do?" A more slavish practice it would, surely, be impossible to conceive. Surely, no one who valued his reputation as a man of judgment, or as a man of integrity, and who wished to stand well with the people, would, for any consideration, allow himself to be employed in such an ignominious service.

I am not aware that there is anything left for me to say. The Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair claims for us, at the foot of the throne, at the commencement of every Parliament, that we shall have liberty of speech. It appears, now, that we are not to have liberty of speech. It has been said that the liberties of this country can never be overthrown but by the corruption of Parliament. I will say, that the liberty of speaking cannot be narrowed but by our own degenerate conduct. If, according to the Right Honourable Baronet, because an Honourable Member may have ventured on the utterance of a sarcasm, or indulged in a little playfulness of fancy, and thus enlivened the dulness which has, of late, so remarkably characterised our debates, he is to be marked down as a person unfit to serve on committees, we shall soon be fit for nothing else but committees of which dulness is to be the principal qualification. I wish to say, further, that of all things I should like not to be on a committee such as the present, as it must, necessarily, occupy a great deal of my time, which would put me to much inconvenience by its interference with my personal, though unprofitable, engagements; but, if the House think that I can be of any service, — if it be believed that I possess any peculiar knowledge or information which may be advantageously brought to bear on this question, — I shall place my time and my exertions at their disposal. I would ask the independent portion of the House, by their vote this night, to show that they are not participators in the sentiments of the Government. I would call on them to vindicate their independence, and not to allow it to be supposed that, in acting on committees, they consent to act entirely under the direction of the authority which selects them, or that the condition of being placed on a committee is, that they are to sit in fetters, without liberty to exercise their judgment as to the course they ought to pursue. In conclusion, I would add, that I would not accede to the requisition of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for any advantage which it might be in the power of his official station to bestow; for I beg to remind the Right Honourable Gentleman that a man may be poor in circumstances, and yet rich in feelings of personal independence.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has intimated to the House that there is no great danger of my entering into any competition with him on the score of sarcasm. Unfortunately there is none. But still less is there any danger, either, of my entering into competition with him on the score of misrepresentation; because misrepresentation was never more complete than was that which he has endeavoured to palm on the House in reference to what has fallen from me. Many Honourable Gentlemen who have heard his speech would imagine that I had presumed, by reason of my official situation, to put him in fetters, or to curtail the free exercise of his parliamentary privileges. I deny that such is the fact. As I have already stated to him, the very reverse is the fact. My application to him was not to be considered an official application at all; but in moving the committee I addressed him in precisely the same way as I should have addressed him had I been a private Member of Parliament. For, what was it that I did? Did I ask him to comply with any fancy of mine, or to give up any fancy of his own? What I asked him to give up simply was, the claim to exercise a right which had been declared by a resolution of the House to be no right at all. Was the House right, or was the Honourable and Learned Gentleman right? If the House take a just view of the matter, — that which was claimed by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, it must be allowed, was not his, but a violation of the privileges of Parliament. I beg to take the earliest opportunity of contradicting, in the most distinct manner in which it can be contradicted, the assertion, that I ever gave authority to any Member of the House to make a proposition to the Honourable and Learned Member. I gave no such authority to any Member of this House, nor to anybody out of the House. Many Honourable Gentlemen had appealed to me — it is now a matter of common notoriety that many Honourable Gentlemen had appealed to me — on the subject of the Honourable and Learned Member's name being put on the committee; and in reply I stated frankly and unreservedly to them that which I state now, namely, that my objection was not to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, personally. I contend that I have now offered the best test I could give of my sincerity, the test I offer to-night, when I tell that Learned Gentleman that if he will state that he will conform to the orders of the House, I myself will be the first person to move that his name be added to the committee. Is there, then, the shadow of a pretence for charging me with insincerity? I beg Honourable Gentlemen also to bear in mind that I asked him to give the pledge I required, not to me, but to the House itself. With respect to the Civil List Committee, my first anxiety was to confide the present inquiry to their care, because I said that I felt great difficulty in having a special committee for a special purpose of inquiry; and therefore I named another committee already in existence to inquire into the subject; but when I found that that committee did not attend, I was obliged to name a new one, and the very first name that suggested itself to me was that of the Honourable Member for Southwark. The Honourable Member for Southwark states that he will not be a party to the publication of garbled reports. Now I find in a copy of the True Sun, which I hold in my hand, the following observations, introductory to one of that paper's reports of the Poor Law Committee's inquiry: —

> The great length to which the evidence extends precludes us from giving it entire; but we give such portions of it as appear to us to bear on the practical question of the operation of the poor laws.

Here is a promise to publish, not the whole evidence, but such portions of it as might seem to the Honourable Gentleman important; and yet the Honourable Member declares that he has never garbled the evidence. If the Honourable Gentleman should appear to the House a fit person to be on the committee, I will not be responsible for the consequences. If the Honourable Gentleman persist in a publication of evidence painful to the feelings of individuals, adverse to the maxims of courts of justice, and contrary to the soundest principles of equity, blame cannot be imputed to me. It may suit the purpose of Honourable Gentlemen opposite to render the committee at once distasteful to the public, and ineffective for the attainment of its object; and such, assuredly, will be the result, if they pervert it into an engine of private malice.

I have now discharged a very painful duty. I have entered into a painful conflict with many Honourable Members who have hitherto given us their friendly and consistent support. I have not done so upon anything like slight or personal grounds; but this was a question of principle, and at any sacrifice, even at that of provoking the keenest sarcasms of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, or the invectives of Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side, I will oppose the proposition of the Honourable Baronet (Sir G. Sinclair). Whatever be the result of that proposition, the responsibility rests with others, — not with me.

The House then divided on the amendment proposed, to leave out the words "twenty-one," in order to insert the words "twenty-two" instead thereof.

Question proposed, that the words "twenty-one" stand part of the question, —

Noes . . .	71

Main question put, and Committee agreed to. — Committee nominated, viz.: — Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord John Russell, Mr. Grote, Mr. Bannerman, Mr. Plumtre, Mr. Hume, Mr. Sanford, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Alderman Copeland, Mr. William Evans, Mr. Pendarves, Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Handley, Lord Viscount Ebrington, Mr. Rickford, Mr. Strutt, Mr. Macleod, Mr. Goddard, Mr. Phillpotts, Mr. Villiers Stuart, and Mr. George Evans. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

LIMERICK COUNTY ELECTION.

Petition of Patrick Boyle and John Humphrys, praying to be admitted parties with the sitting Members to defend their return. Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 22. sec. 10.) read.

Ordered, that the petitioners be admitted parties to defend the return, according to the prayer of the said petition.

SLIGO ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I have two Irish election petitions to present. The same agent, who is an Irishman, made the same mistake in both cases. If the House will allow me, I will very briefly explain the nature of this application. The name of a surety was put for that of a petitioner in the case of the Sligo election, by a clerical error; so that, on the face of the petition, it is sheer nonsense. The surety, who has nothing to do with the merits of the petition, is made to petition this House to pronounce against the election. Some of the best lawyers have been consulted, I understand, on the subject; and upon the result of their legal opinions, it really seems to be a great question whether, where the error is so merely clerical and so obviously accidental, the recognisances will not still be good; so that, upon a mere accident arising on a point of your practice, if these sureties are to be declared not good ones, you may be establishing a precedent of great inconvenience and injustice. It has been held, in a court of law, that, where an error occurs in setting out the names and descriptions of sureties, which is in itself so evident and palpable that it may be rectified in the particular case without danger to those principles which should regulate such questions generally,—an alteration of that kind may be permitted to be made. As I believe that this is the last night allowed under the Act to put in the recognisances for these petitions, I must move that further time be allowed for extending the recognisances in this case.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — Before this question be taken into consideration, there is a point of order upon which I should be glad to be instructed. It is now past one o'clock in the morning, and I am entitled to contend that the duration of the day, in intendment of law, is from twelve o'clock to twelve o'clock, midnight to midnight, four-and-twenty hours. Seeing that the 18th day of December is the last day upon which these recognisances can be entered, it becomes a very important question whether, at this hour, the legal day is ended, or not?

The SPEAKER. — I believe it has heretofore been the rule of this House, that it is competent for the House to continue on the day which it may have sat over, if the delay has been occasioned by its discussions.

The Clerk then read, at the Table, the petition of Robert Potter, agent for the petitioners, stating a mistake in each of the recognisances entered into by each of the respective sureties, and praying for an extension of time, to have the recognisances re-acknowledged.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I feel it my duty to appeal to the justice of this House, under the circumstances of the present application. It is now considerably past one o'clock, and Tuesday morning. Twelve o'clock, Monday, under the limitations expressly set out by the Grenville Act for these purposes, was the extreme time at which any applications of this nature could be entertained. It is for me, as a party undoubtedly interested, to make this appeal; and I do not think it necessary to say any more.

Mr. S. COOPER. — I submit that, if there be a flaw in the case of this petitioner, it is for the Chair to declare it. With all submission, I think that it is for us to crave that the law in the question be laid down by that high authority. I think it very hard that the Honourable and Gallant Member for Sligo should have to appeal to the justice of the House in this case against entertaining the application of the Honourable Member for Liskeard. In an earlier part of the evening, but in respect of another petition, the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard himself appealed to the justice of this House, and we might have expected that he would not have rendered it necessary for others to prefer a similar appeal.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Now is the time, Mr. Speaker, or never, that this question must be determined, if the prayer of the petitioners is to be affirmed. Because, when the Parliament shall have met to-morrow to transact its business,—when that true parliamentary to-morrow shall have arrived, — it will be too late to say anything about these recognisances being extended. But, independently of the question in hand, it does appear to me that this application is a very fair one. The question arises on a case of mere clerical error. There cannot be much dispute as to the facts, or as to the principle, so far as regards the matter of principle; namely, that these recognisances have not been entered into according to the requisitions of the Act of Parliament. The name of the surety is inserted instead of that of the party. The absurdity of this blunder is obvious. A. B. undertakes that he, A. B., the surety, will prosecute the petition as to which he is not the petitioner, but the surety. Now, this is precisely that sort of case in which the Act of Parliament does give a power of enlarging the time of entering into recognisances, where a mistake is made, and there is no probability of its having been the result of fraud or collusion. As to the objection which has been taken on behalf of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Sligo, I apprehend that the fact is, that yonder clock never passes, in construction of law, the hour of twelve. You will go on to call the other Orders of the Day; and, according to that clock, it will still be the same day on which the discussions of this evening began.

Gentlemen may laugh, but the fact is, that there is one law for corporations as to time, and another for the general purposes of society. Thus, it has been said, that if a man moves from a residence which he has occupied under a year, he gains a settlement; reckoning from the period of the one moving, to the periods of any other movings, which go conjointly to make up the year. The term of one moving, it is said, is not necessarily to be taken apart from the other movings. Suppose this House had met at ten o'clock in the morning, and that this petition was then ready to be presented, but that a debate on some subject preceding it on the paper of the day had sprung up, and gone on until this hour, — shall it be said that, under circumstances of that description, there should be no possibility of presenting a petition of this kind? In the instance before us, the object of the petition is, to give to the petitioner, on the last day of the period assigned for receiving recognisances, this opportunity; that two certain persons shall be permitted to rectify an error that no one imputes to them as an intentional error, which has been committed in describing the sureties. I contend that this proposition is proper, fair, and reasonable.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I appear, once again, as the advocate for the strict observance of the general rule laid down by the Grenville Act. It may be perfectly true, as her Majesty's Attorney General has asserted, that the clock of this House, in all presumption of law, does not go beyond twelve o'clock at night in any matters touching its own privileges and regular course of proceedings. But the Act of Parliament is absolute as to the period of fourteen days, to which the time for entering into these election recognisances may be extended. We have already, in our Votes, which, in the usual course, will in a few hours be printed, considered this day as to-morrow; that is to say, the language of the House of Commons has already treated this day as Tuesday. Now, I ask, why the petitioner and his sureties did not come here until this unseemly hour? In a much earlier part of this evening, we saw the House dismiss parties who were also petitioners for an extension of time, on the ground that they might have presented their petitions before; and so it was held that they had lost their claim as petitioners for further time. This was the case with the Ipswich petition. It appears in the present instance, that this petition came from Ireland, and after encountering the chance of being too late, by the Speaker leaving the chair at half-past ten, these other cases are brought forward at half-past one in the morning. In consistency with the course which I have always observed on these occasions, I shall feel it my duty to oppose the prayer of these petitioners.

MR. POULETT THOMSON. — My Honourable Friend may have been, as he says, consistent in these matters; but if so, the Honourable Baronet has at least been inconsistent by proxy; for, in the case of Mr. Gompertz, a petition was presented after one o'clock, and the argument against the adjourning the debate on that occasion, as the Honourable Baronet must well recollect, was, that the last day for receiving such petitions had arrived, and that if the parties were not allowed, then, to obtain the indulgence, there was no opportunity of providing the remedy for which they sought. It was, therefore, resolved, among other things, that relief should be afforded; and consequently, it follows, that some equal measure of justice should be extended to petitioners in all similar cases.

MR. H. HINDE. — In the cases both of to-night and of Friday night last, the House has been called upon to relax the application of the Grenville Act. We might be right or wrong in the course which we adopted on Friday night last; but it seems to me, that the case brought forward to-night, is strongly distinguished from that of a former evening. I cannot perceive how we can extend beyond the strictly defined limitations of the Grenville Act the term for entering into these recognisances. The Attorney General must be mistaken in his construction of the conclusion of the parliamentary day, for he says nothing about the very entries upon our printed Votes showing that all proceedings for the "Friday" which occur after twelve o'clock at night, are recorded under the date of "Saturday."

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — The case of Mr. Gompertz was introduced and noticed long ago; but these cases would have been equally in time with that, had they been also presented before twelve o'clock last night.

MR. R. STEUART. — A case occurred in the year 1831 that I, myself, was concerned in, in which I was allowed to withdraw a letter that had been given in; and on the last day for these matters, a discussion intervened. I was petitioned against, and yet I was allowed to present my substituted letter after three o'clock of the morning, following the expiration of the last day on which descriptions of sureties could be amended.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — I apprehend that it is not competent for us to alter the specific enactments of an Act of Parliament. If ever there was a case, probably, which, under lest stringent legislation, could deserve indulgence, this is one, for it is the case only of a clerical error. But I do not consider that we have any such powers.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — It is very essential to consider what this case really is. There are three individuals concerned here. The petitioners C. D., and the two sureties E. F. and G. H. Each of these parties enter into a bond, the condition of which is, that if the petitioner C. D. shall pay all the costs attaching to the prosecution of the petition, then the recognisances of E. F. and G. H. shall be avoided and released; but since C. D., E. F., and G. H., are each and all of them equally interested, by being equally bound for the payment of all the expenses of the petition, it does not much prejudice E. F. or G. H., that by a mere clerical error he is put in the place of C. D. In point of fact, these recognisances can only be bad inasmuch as they are not correctly given in under that part of the Grenville Act which says, "that these sureties shall be given in in the form hereinafter mentioned."

Mr. GODSON. — I apprehend that this is one of the most important questions connected with the proceedings of this House, in election cases, which can come before us. Will any one of my Honourable and Learned Friends — will her Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor General venture to say, in Westminster Hall, to-morrow, of the limitation, under the Grenville Act, of fourteen days, for putting in these sureties, that it is to be thus construed: — that when you are at one end of the hall, a day may consist of twenty-four hours, and three, or four, or seven hours over; but that if you sit at the other side of Westminster Hall, the construction is to be different; that is to say, the common sense and every day interpretation? Such, however, is the extraordinary opinion of the Attorney and the Solicitor General, which is to go forth, to-morrow, to the public. As to the hypothesis of her Majesty's Attorney General, that this is not to be reckoned for another day when it is past 2 o'clock in the morning; every record of every proceeding which takes place within these walls after 12 o'clock at night demonstrates the utter fallacy of such a notion. The printed Votes show that all such proceedings are carefully distinguished and separated from those of the preceding day. But suppose this petition to be presented, and that — afterwards — the opposition to the return for Sligo, which it suggests, should be pronounced by a committee frivolous and vexatious. Why, the very moment you should attempt to proceed upon the recognisances thus given in, decidedly, as I contend, out of time, — the very men who have been given in for sureties, will snap their fingers at you, and tell you, you cannot recover from them or proceed against them. With respect to what the Attorney General has told us, about this House sitting till 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning; I maintain, that the House knows nothing about the fraction of a day; that the fourteen days limited by the Grenville Act have expired so far as this case is concerned; and that you cannot pretend to enlarge or alter the specific provision of that statute, except by a new Act of Parliament which shall have received, in the usual course, the sanction of both Houses of the Legislature.

Mr. COURTENAY.—I have had some little experience of courts of law, and I must say, that I have never heard so much, or such bad law, crowded into one speech, as I have heard in the speech of her Majesty's Solicitor General. It is my misfortune to be connected a great deal with the business of quarter sessions; and it has passed into a proverb that professional gentlemen sometimes take tolerable liberties in expounding the law to the magistrates whom they address there. But I should really think, that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman must have supposed that he was talking in the presence of those who knew absolutely nothing about law. His speech reminded me of what used to take place when I attended the circuits about thirty years ago, and we used, certainly, now and then, by way of experiment, to draw pretty largely on the legal faith of country gentleman. My Learned Friend near me has truly stated, that the law recognises no fraction of a day; and to be sure the Honourable and Learned Gentlemen opposite cannot be serious in contending for the licence which their construction of the Grenville Act assumes in that particular. But these are points of a trivial — nay, of a contemptible — degree of importance, compared with the constitutional consideration involved in their argument. That argument is an absolute attempt to dispense with an Act of Parliament, —

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I insist upon it, that it is neither more nor less. Now, what is the greatest constitutional imputation on the proceedings of the Long Parliament, and on the character of all the monarchs of the house of Stuart? Confessedly this, that they dispensed, by strained constructions, as well as in other manners, with Acts of Parliament.

Mr. CHARLES BULLER. — The fact is, that these petitions only came up by post to-day; and this is the first opportunity which we have had — owing to the intervening business of the House — to present them. Gentlemen opposite seem disposed to be very strict and unyielding as to the law. Sir, I will grant, for the sake of argument, that the fourteen days, under the Grenville Act, have expired at twelve o'clock last night, if Gentlemen so please. But, I shall contend that, even in that case, the Act itself does not contemplate it as a necessary and inevitable result that, upon sufficient cause being shown, no further indulgence, as to the extension of the time, shall be afforded by this House. For what are the words of the Act, in the clause which I hold in my hand? — "And if, at the expiration of the said fourteen days, such recognisances shall not have been entered into, or shall not have been received by the Speaker of the House of Commons, then the Speaker shall report the same to the House." So that, supposing the time limited by the Act to have expired, and the recognisances not to have been received in the mean time, the power to grant further time does not ipso facto cease, but the Act goes on to declare, that "the order for taking the same into consideration shall be thereupon discharged." But, in the mean time, surely it is open to the House, if it shall so think fit, to enlarge the time for entering into the recognisances; and for what purpose, I would ask, could such a power have been reserved to the House, if it was never intended to be acted upon? I now move, Sir, that "the time for entering into these recognisances be enlarged."

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I cannot think, as at present advised, that the House has any power to enlarge these recognisances, and I must observe that my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Liskeard, in the argument which he founded upon the Act, omitted to refer to some preceding words which were very important against the conclusions that he came to. They are these: — "And if, at the expiration of the said fourteen days, such recognisances shall not have been entered into or received by the Speaker of the House of Commons, or the time for entering into such recognisances shall not have been previously enlarged;" then "the Speaker shall report the same to the House," &c. Now, there is a statement of all the several cases in which it seems to have been contemplated that it would be still open to the House to afford relief. But the case here suggested not coming within that recapitulation, I do not see how the petitioner can be relieved though I am willing to admit that, if ev there was a case in which such relief should be afforded, if it can be given, this is it.

Mr. MAULE. — There are other words which the Honourable Member for Cockermouth (Mr. Aglionby) has not alluded to, that seem to bear in favour of the prayer of the petitioner, — "or unless upon matter verified on oath before the House." This, therefore, is one of the alternatives which still applies to the petitioners before us. Probably the House might, upon such a course being adopted, still be disposed to enlarge the time for entering into these recognisances.

Mr. C. BULLER. — As the House appears to be of opinion that the Speaker should inform us of the circumstances attending the giving in of these recognisances, I will, for the sake of convenience, alter the form of my motion, by which means, the matter may, at some future time, again be brought under consideration. I will move, now, that the petition be taken into consideration this day, and that it be printed in the Votes of the House.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — With reference to the legal construction of the Grenville Act, as bearing on this case, I may point out that the error in this case is the error of the party himself, and therefore there can be no reason why he should not be made to suffer the consequences of his own neglect.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I would direct the attention of the House to one subject. By the statute, three days' notice of justification of bail is required; but here, it is impossible that that notice can be given, for these papers have arrived in town, it is stated, only on this day.

It was then agreed that the petitions should be severally considered this day. On the motion that they be printed with the Votes,—

SIR R. PEEL said: — It is clearly understood, then, that the case will now stand precisely in the same situation as it did before this vote was carried; and therefore it will be for Mr. Speaker, to-morrow, to report whether the time for entering these recognisances shall be extended, or not,—in conformity with the provisions of the Act of Parliament.

Petitions severally ordered to be printed.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITIES.

On the Order of the Day being read for bringing up the Report on the Resolutions on this subject, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP gave notice that, on Wednesday next, on the motion for Mr. Speaker's leaving the chair, on the Order of the Day for considering the Duchess of Kent's Annuities Bill, he would move certain resolutions to the following effect; viz. —

That it shall be lawful for her Majesty to give and grant, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Great Britain, to her Royal Highness Maria Louisa Victoria Duchess of Kent, for the term of her natural life, for the adequate provision for her said Royal Highness, a certain annual payment or annuity of 22,000*l.* of lawful monies of Great Britain, in lieu of proposed grant of 30,000*l.*

Provided always, and be it enacted, that in case her Royal Highness Maria Louisa Victoria Duchess of Kent shall, after passing any grant by Act of Parliament for the sole and separate use of her said Royal Highness, marry with any person without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, or shall cease to reside in, or shall absent herself from, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, without such aforesaid consent, for more than twelve months at any one period, or without the intervening period of six months residence in Great Britain shall afterwards return abroad, a portion not exceeding one half of such grant as may be given by way of annuity to her said Royal Highness, shall, in either such cases, absolutely and entirely cease, that is to say, immediately after such marriage, or such period of absence, or at any rate from and after the payment of the quarterly portion that may be first due; and such portion of annuity shall be hereafter wholly void of any claim whatever on the part of her Royal Highness Maria Louisa Victoria.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER reported the resolution respecting the Duchess of Kent's annuities, namely: —

Resolved, That the several annuities granted to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, in pursuance of several Acts of the 58th year of King George III., the 6th year of King George IV., and the 1st and 2d year of his late Majesty King William IV., shall cease and determine, at such time as may be fixed by any Act to be passed in the present Session of Parliament; and that, in lieu thereof, her Majesty be empowered to grant, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, a clear yearly sum of 22,000*l* to her said Royal Highness, for her life, which sum, in addition to the yearly sum of 8000*l.*, already agreed to be granted in the present Session, amounts to the clear yearly sum of 30,000*l.*, for the life of her said Royal Highness.

Resolution agreed to. — Instruction to committee on the Bill that they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said resolution.

PRISONERS (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in committee; reported, without amendments; and ordered to be read a third time this day.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT BILL.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg leave to present a petition from a person of the name of Benjamin Barton, a resident of Glasgow, complaining of the injury which he has suffered in consequence of the existing state of the law with respect to imprisonment for debt, and praying for its improvement. The petitioner states, that the person who is the great cause of his misfortunes was, at one time, an errand-boy at a tavern, and eloped with his employer's wife. He then proceeded to Glasgow, and set up an hotel himself. Deceived by the handsome appearance of the tavern, many persons gave him credit, and the petitioner was induced to discount bills for him to the amount of 2300*l.* The person whom he thus trusted soon afterwards absconded from Glasgow, and came up to town, where he set up in business as a stable keeper. The petitioner followed him, and arrested him for the small sum of 60*l.* The latter, however, immediately, swore a debt against his creditor of 45*l.*, and caused him to be arrested on this false demand. The petitioner not being able, in the first instance, to procure bail, was carried to a sponging house. With great difficulty he succeeded in finding bail, when he was discharged. He was, however, a second time arrested by the same party, and he was obliged a second time to provide bail. He then indicted the party who thus proceeded against him, for perjury, and a true bill was found; but no person could say where the defendant, who was not worth a farthing, was to be met with. I have felt it necessary to state these points, because I believe that cases of a similar character are of frequent occurrence under the law as it now stands. If the petitioner, being a respectable man, had not happened to be acquainted with individuals in London who became security for him, he would have been placed in a very different situation. He might still have remained in prison, on account of a debt which has been falsely sworn to.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

VOTE BY BALLOT.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I have to present a petition from a very respectable body, namely, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Hereford, who complain of the difficult situation in which electors are now placed, in consequence of the present mode adopted at elections.

The petitioners state, that the excessive practice of intimidation, of bribery, and of corruption, which prevailed at the last general election, has convinced many of those who were previously of a different opinion, that the right of the elector can only be secured by the adoption of some mode of secret voting; and they pray that, to put an end to the prevailing, increasing, and most pernicious practices of bribery and intimidation, the plan of voting by ballot may be tried.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

SLAVE PROPRIETORS' COMPENSATION.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Seeing my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonial Department in his place, I trust that he will not consider me too pertinacious in calling his attention again to the non-production of those returns relative to the award of money voted by Parliament as compensation to West India proprietors, which I moved for nearly a month ago, as it certainly is a subject of great importance, and excites considerable interest. I wish to know when an official statement of the distribution of the sum voted will be laid on the Table. I take it for granted that everything is done regularly by the very able and diligent persons who conduct the colonial department, and I certainly retain my original opinion that there can be no difficulty whatever in making the returns.

LORD GLENELG. — Being aware that my Noble and Learned Friend intended to mention this subject again to-night, I addressed a letter to the commissioners, requesting them to inform me what progress they have made with the returns, and I received for answer, that the lists of the accounts made of the uncontested claims in all the colonies are nearly finished, and that a large proportion of the first class will be ready to be presented on Thursday next, and the remainder as soon after as possible. With respect to the contested claims, they are still unprepared, but every exertion will be used in making them out.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I am extremely happy to find that, at all events, some of the returns are nearly ready, and will be laid on the Table the day after to-morrow. This only shows how useful it may be to touch up certain departments a little, occasionally; because the last intimation I received was, that it would be impossible that the returns could be got ready before the end of the recess, the time then considered necessary for preparing them being six or seven weeks; now I am informed that the bulk of the returns, and those which chiefly interest the public, will be presented within a fortnight.

LORD GLENELG. — I beg to remind my Noble and Learned Friend that what the letter refers to is a large proportion of the first draft on the list.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I do not precisely understand what is meant by the word "draft."

LORD GLENELG. — I presume that what is meant is that a large proportion of the returns will be ready by Thursday.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

Leave to sit this day during the sitting of the House.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, this Bill was read a third time.

Mr. HUME. — I have now an amendment to propose to the third clause, in press 8. line 18. and 19. My object is to place on the votes of the House the same amendment which I proposed in the committee on this Bill; because such is the manner in which our proceedings in committees are conducted, that the public are ignorant of a great deal which passes. I propose, Sir, to leave out the words "Three hundred and eighty-five thousand pounds," in order to insert the words, "Three hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds." I wish to put on record my wish to reduce the amount by 50,000*l.* When the other amendments to be proposed by my Honourable Friend the Member for London (Mr. Grote) shall have been decided, I shall, on the question that the Bill do pass, avail myself of that opportunity of offering some general remarks. I now merely move this amendment.

Question put, "That the words three hundred and eighty-five thousand pounds stand part of the Bill."

Agreed to.

Mr. GROTE. — Sir, I propose to move the entire removal of the sum allotted to pensions from the Civil List. There are several reasons which lead me to think that the House ought not to suffer any such item to continue. My first reason is, that it is not proper or convenient to fix any amount to be granted in new pensions pending the inquiry into the Pension List. The House has now appointed a committee for the express purpose of investigating the names on the existing Pension List. It has recognised the principle that all names which appear on that list wrongfully, improperly, or without legitimate grounds, shall no longer be continued upon it. This inquiry is about to be immediately commenced, and I need not remind the House that it is of a nature which permits no delay or postponement: it must be prosecuted continuously until its termination, and until some result is arrived at. What that result may be is as yet, of course, unknown; nor do I at all presume to anticipate it.

But in reasoning on the present posture of affairs, it is impossible to avoid looking at it hypothetically; it is impossible to avoid contemplating the various results which may perhaps ensue. Perhaps it may happen that the committee will recommend nearly the whole list to be maintained; but perhaps they may recommend that two thirds or three fourths of the list shall be struck out — they may pronounce a large and unequivocal condemnation on the purposes to which the Pension List has been turned — they may find reason to believe that it has been made a means of systematic and extensive corruption. Remember, again, that I do not at all presume to anticipate that such will be the judgment of the committee; I only say that it may be: the case is possible, and that is sufficient for my argument.

Now, Sir, I think it cannot be denied that the judgment of the House, as to the sum which it is right to allot in future for the Civil List pensions, may be materially influenced by the use which has been made of the Pension List in times past. Suppose it turns out that the Pension List, in times past, has been distributed upon the very worst principles — that abuse has been the rule, and propriety the exception — that most of the pensioners are persons who ought never to have been there at all, and ought not now to be continued there — may not the House, when informed of these facts by the Report of its committee, very reasonably say, — "We were not before aware of the extent to which abuse had been carried in this list; we see that in future the minister cannot be trusted with the disposal of so large a fund; we will not run the risk of having such glaring prodigalities in future years; we will lessen the possibility of wrong doing by curtailing the pension fund at the disposal of the minister?" I maintain, Sir, that in the view which the House may take of the sum proper to be allotted for a pension fund, the consideration of the use to which it has been turned during the past, is a very material item — a fact tending to affect our conclusions on the subject in the most powerful manner. And to call upon the House to fix, at this moment, what the sum allotted for pensions shall be for the future, is to call for a decision in the absence of most important evidence — in the absence of evidence which you are now beginning to collect, and which the lapse of a short time will certainly furnish.

On this ground, Sir, I contend that we should do wrong in fixing the aggregate amount of the Pension List for the future, while the inquiry into the Pension List for the past has yet to be undertaken. To do this is to anticipate in part the result of that inquiry — it is to assume, beforehand, that no possible disclosures which that committee can elicit can make any difference in regard to the amount fit to be awarded in future. I contend that we have no right to make such an assumption — it is an assumption not at all just or reasonable in itself; and it is, moreover, calculated to impress the public with a belief that our inquiry is not intended to be searching and decisive. Those Gentlemen who have looked at the minutes of the committee on the Civil List, will see that the question which I am now starting was mooted in that committee. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer originally proposed to continue the sum of 75,000*l.* on the Civil List to be devoted to pensions, as it had stood in the preceding reign. On this matter the committee decided against him, but they acceded to a proposition afterwards made by the Honourable Member for Aberdeen, that the sum proper to be allotted henceforward in pensions should be fixed, not in the shape of principal money, but in the shape of annuity — that a sum of 1200*l.* should be recommended to the House to be placed annually in the power of the Sovereign to be given away in new pensions.

I confess, Sir, I cannot see any greater reason for determining the amount fit to be granted under the one shape than for determining it under the other. For how is it that you arrive at the result of 1200*l.* per annum as the just amount assignable for distribution by the Crown in new pensions? It is by examining the annual vacancies likely to occur in a given principal sum; and, in point of fact, to fix a certain principal sum, and to fix a certain annual amount to be distributed in new pensions, is to do one and the same thing under a different name; and if the former be unwise or improper, I do not see upon what grounds you can defend the latter. Both the one and the other are alike open to the objection which I have been urging. Indeed, if the House do resolve to name, at this moment, the exact amount of the pension fund, I question whether it be not preferable to name the principal amount rather than the annual sum capable of being so applied. Because, by naming the principal amount, you know more accurately the charge upon the public in each year; by naming the sum annually disposable, you know the amount of charge only upon the average of years. The sum of 1200*l.* annually given in new pensions will correspond to a greater or less amount of principal charge, according as the lives selected are young or old, of greater or less duration. I may be told, perhaps, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that unless the amount annually disposable for pensions is now fixed, he will not be able to settle the Civil List at present. But it is plain that, whether the Right Honourable Gentleman carries the present clause or omits it, still the old pensions will remain unsettled till the conclusion of the inquiry about to be undertaken by the committee; and if he settles the Civil List now, he will be obliged to call upon Parliament, at the end of that inquiry, to make a separate provision for those pensions which are adjudged to have a right to continue. If the provision for the old pensions is postponed, I do not see why the provision for new pensions should not be postponed until the same time, and why it should not form part of the same measure.

My next reason for thinking that these clauses ought not to be allowed to stand is, that a fund for pensions seems to me to have no proper place in the Civil List. Assuming that a certain sum ought to be allotted to pensions — that it is right to name that sum now;—admitting both these positions, still I contend that the charge ought not to be considered as forming a portion of the Civil List. Gentlemen will recollect that the provisions of the Civil List cannot be in any way altered during the reign of her present Majesty, which promises to be long, and which I sincerely hope will prove long. It may be right that those arrangements which are connected with her Majesty's household and establishment, and which conduce to personal dignity and comfort, should be thus defined once for all, and that her Majesty should not be disturbed by the inconveniences attending upon any change in those matters after they have once been fixed upon a precise scale. The necessity of thus determining the amount of the Civil List generally, for the entire duration of the reign of the Sovereign, is founded upon reasons connected with the personal comfort of the Sovereign herself. But what necessity of a similar kind exists for irrevocably determining the amount of the Pension List, not to be again altered until the termination of the reign? How is the comfort or dignity of the Sovereign connected with the power of distributing a certain sum of money in pensions? Why is the House called upon to fix the amount of pensions placed at the disposal of the Sovereign for an entire reign, any more than the House fixes the number of civil offices, or the extent of naval and military forces, which shall be placed under the command of the Sovereign, for a whole reign? The power of appointing to a place in the Pension List is in no way more essentially connected with the comfort or dignity of the Crown than the power of appointing to civil or military offices. It would be most unwise to determine at the beginning of the reign how many offices the Sovereign should have the power of conferring, and to restrain ourselves from varying that number until the demise of the Crown; and I contend that it would in like manner, and for the same reasons, be most unwise to fix an unalterable and irrevocable Pension List. If pensions are to be continued at all, we ought to reserve for Parliament the power of discontinuing them, as to future grants, whenever it shall think fit. We ought to retain in our hands the option of modifying or terminating the system, if abuse or profligacy should demand our decisive interposition. It will be remembered that the committee of 1831 distinctly recommended that nothing should be retained on the Civil List except such charges as conduced to the personal comfort and dignity of the Sovereign. Now, I again contend that in the true meaning and in the just spirit of that recommendation, the pensions ought decidedly to be removed from the Civil List; for pensions are obviously not connected with the personal comfort of the Sovereign, and they are no otherwise connected with the dignity of the Sovereign than as the army, the navy, the civil and military appointments are also connected with it.

I shall be told, Sir, that the committee of 1831, notwithstanding their own general principles as to the Civil List, nevertheless retained the pension fund as an adjunct to the Civil List. The reasons why they did so retain it are embodied by the committee of 1837 in their Report, and sanctioned by their concurrent opinion. These reasons appear to me not only most unsatisfactory in themselves, but utterly inconsistent with the resolutions passed by the House of Commons in 1834, which the committee cite and adopt in the very same page. What are these reasons, assigned by the committee of 1831? They say,—"Some provision ought, in all cases, to be made for such payments as it is to be presumed the Sovereign would have been desirous of making had he remained in possession of his hereditary revenue. That one class of such payments would consist of payments to those of his subjects whom he wished to favour, cannot be doubted." Now, Sir, let me ask, is this the definition which the House are disposed seriously to set forth of the persons whose names ought to stand upon a Pension List. What is this, but making the Pension List an instrument and evidence of courtly caprice and favouritism? On this definition, it is idle to talk of abuse of the pension-granting power—abuse of that power is impossible; the titles of all individuals on the Pension List are all equally good and equally unassailable—the most worthless individual who does now stand, or ever has stood, upon the Pension List, comes under the class of "those of his Majesty's subjects whom his Majesty wishes to favour, and of payments which his Majesty would have been desirous of making, if he had remained in possession of his hereditary revenues." Suppose ourselves in the reign of Charles II. What were the payments which that Monarch would have been most anxious to make; and who were the persons whom he would have been most desirous to favour? Why, the Duchess of Cleveland, and the Duchess of Portsmouth, and Mrs. Eleanor Gwyn, would have stood at the head of the list, with pensions on the largest scale assigned to them: of all payments, the payments assigned to these ladies would have been most certain to be made, while the Sovereign remained in possession of his hereditary revenues. I might make the same remark with regard to the royal mistresses in the days of George I. and George II.; and I make it with the view of showing what is the real value of the definition set forth in the words of the committee of 1831. The committee of 1831 tell us, in plain terms, that the Pension List is intended simply as a means of gratifying courtly favour and caprice. Upon such a supposition they do right in connecting it with the Civil List; but, then, upon such a supposition it would be idle to talk of investigation or inquiry into the Pension List, or of separating the good names from the bad. Now, Sir, I complain of the committee of 1837, that they have adopted the recommendation of the committee of 1831, to keep these pensions in connection with the Civil List, while they only profess to adopt—but, in reality, reject—the definition furnished by the prior committee, on which alone such recommendation was founded. For this definition was virtually overruled and abrogated by the resolutions of the House of Commons, passed in 1834, prescribing the conditions on which alone pensions should hereafter be granted—resolutions which the committee also adopt and incorporate in their Report, and which they expressly recommend as the basis of all future grants. Moreover, the House of Commons has sanctioned an inquiry into the existing Pension List, with the view of distinguishing the good and deserving names from the bad and undeserving.

Now, Sir, I contend that by this inquiry, coupled with the resolutions of 1834, now engrafted on the Civil List Bill, the pensions have ceased to be those which the committee of 1831 defined them to be; they are no longer payments "such as it might be presumed that the Sovereign would have been desirous of making had he remained in possession of his hereditary revenue;" they are "payments made to such persons only as have just claims on the royal beneficence," &c. I contend, further, that though the committee of 1831, who describe pensions as mere arbitrary manifestations of the royal favour towards individuals, and mere substitutes for the presents which he would have made out of his hereditary revenue, might consistently recommend them to continue as appendages to the Civil List; yet the committee of 1837, and the House of Commons of 1837, who describe pensions in a very different manner, cannot consistently adopt the same recommendation. Grants of pensions are now to be made only to persons who come within certain predetermined conditions. The responsible advisers of the Crown are placed under formal obligations to see that this rule is observed; and in order to make assurance still more sure, a return of the new pensions granted is to be laid annually before the House of Commons.

Now, surely, Sir, it is plain that the formal imposition of this limit divests the pension of that immediate connection with the simple and arbitrary preference of the Sovereign which alone constituted the ground for uniting it to the Civil List. In the spirit of the resolutions of the House of Commons in 1834 the Pension List ought to be disconnected with the Civil List, and to be placed upon the Consolidated Fund; and the committee of 1837 seem to me to have committed a great inconsistency in recommending the contrary.

Sir, I have hitherto confined myself to the task of showing that the amount assignable in future pensions ought not to be named now, pending the inquiry; and that if named, it ought not to form any part of the Civil List. But, in addition to these objections, I do not hesitate to add, that there are others which lie still deeper, and which lead me to call in question the wisdom and policy of the Civil List pensions generally. In introducing this topic to the notice of the House, I have first to remind Gentlemen that the position of affairs is materially changed since the subject was discussed last year and in preceding years. A wider field of debate is now open to us; we are not only at liberty to entertain considerations which were formerly closed, but we are imperiously and unavoidably called upon to discuss a question of principle, involving all the bearings of the Pension List, and the foundation upon which it rests. In former years, when this matter came under the notice of the House, no question could ever be started except as to the character of the names on the Pension List. The existence of the pension fund, the time of its continuance, and the limit of its aggregate amount, were all distinctly provided and prescribed by Act of Parliament; no debate could be entertained respecting either of these points until the decease of the late Sovereign. The only question then open was respecting the character of the names by which that Pension List was to be filled. Accordingly, it was upon this point that all the previous discussions in the House have turned; it was to the correction of this infirmity that all the precautions of the House were directed. The resolutions passed by the House in 1834, were intended to guard against the introduction of any improper names into the list for the future: the various motions made for inquiry were intended to purify the list of names assumed to be exceptionable, and to substitute better names in their place. I wish the House to recollect that at the present moment they are not circumscribed in the way that they were then. You are not only at liberty to prescribe rules for the character of those who shall be admitted to partake of the pension fund, but you may either lessen the amount or suspend the continuance of the fund itself. Parliament is called upon to take a new decision, affirmative or negative, whether the Pension List shall be permitted to remain open for future grants, or not; and it is, therefore, incumbent upon us to take a comprehensive survey of the purposes which these pensions are expected to fulfil, and of the advantages which the public are expected to derive from them. My opinion is, that no sufficient public advantage arises from these pensions to warrant us in creating a special charge on the nation for the purpose of providing them. The House will of course, understand that I speak entirely of the Pension Fund which has hitherto been connected with the Civil List. I do not at all allude to those pensions of retreat, or retiring pensions, which come to the public servant according to certain fixed and determined rules, as one particular portion of his reward for devoting his time to the service of the public. To give retiring pensions may or may not be a beneficial system of reward: on that I do not now pronounce any opinion—I do not mean to raise the question. But admitting the system of giving retiring pensions or superannuations to be ever so good, I maintain that the pensions hitherto annexed to the Civil List by no means belong to the same class or category. They differ in this material respect: the retiring pensions are awarded after a fixed method, and according to certain determinate rules; the pensions which we are now considering are by their very nature exceptionable, irregular, and discretionary. The retiring pension is looked for and relied upon, and forms part of the regular expectations of those who enter the public service. The civil list pension can only be the lot of a select few—it comes without notice and without being reckoned upon—and it can be regarded only as a lucky windfall or accident. This constitutes a broad and marked distinction between the two; and in questioning the expediency of the one, I employ arguments which have no necessary application to the other.

Apart, therefore, from all question respecting the regular pensions of retirement, the matter which the House is now called upon to determine is this:—Is it right to create a public fund for the purpose of enabling the Minister of the day to grant pensions, annually, to a few select individuals, prescribing by certain general indications the character of the persons who are to be thus favoured? Supposing the person who receives one of these pensions to be really a man of merit, still more if he be a man of merit in distressed circumstances, there is doubtless a disposition on the part of the public to sympathise with him in the satisfaction of obtaining it. I do not wonder at this feeling—still less am I disposed to blame it; but I will only entreat Gentlemen to consider that this is neither the only consideration nor the leading consideration in the case. If any great Nobleman chose to distribute a portion of his income in annuities to persons of merit and ability, most undoubtedly it would redound greatly to the credit of his disposition. But when we are called upon to provide a fund by charges upon the public, to be distributed to any class of persons whatever, we cannot suffer ourselves to be guided implicitly by sympathies for the individuals benefited. We must require to have some public purpose shown, which such a fund is calculated to answer —some national advantage which is to accrue, and in which the people at large are either directly or indirectly to partake. Now, Sir, I look in vain for any such public advantage arising out of this fund for pensions on the Civil List. Does it operate as a reward for public service? I say it does not, for 999 public servants out of 1000 go through the whole career of their public duties without ever obtaining it. Does it operate as an incitement to superior activity or good behaviour in the public service? Impossible; for scarce any one can ever look forward to obtaining it — the chance is too small to be capable of being appreciated, or to act upon the imagination of any one: it is a prospect far too uncertain to be contemplated as a motive for exertion. Does it operate to encourage pursuits and habits of a scientific or literary tendency, which, though beneficial to the public generally, are not profitable for the individual person in whom they are exhibited? It cannot be so: the prize is one which is both too small and too much out of reach to produce any such effect upon any one. Does it enable you to reward any great and signal benefit conferred upon the nation, which outstrips the measure and obligation of ordinary service? Sir, the history of the country shows that whenever such signal services are believed to have been rendered, it has been the practice to make application to Parliament for a special grant, as in the case of Dr. Jenner's discovery of the cow-pox, and other similar grants which might be mentioned. If you look with any attention upon this matter, you will see that the pensions on the Civil List neither operate as an ordinary reward for ordinary service, nor as an extra reward for extra service, nor as an incitement to useful ambition and energy. I cannot see any way in which they conduce to a really good public effect; and that is the reason why I advocate their discontinuance. The only real effect which these pensions produce is confined to a select circle under the Minister's eye — you enable the Minister to pay a compliment to some one amongst a certain select class of individuals, and to make a certain addition to his income. The classes amongst whom the choice is to be made have been defined by the resolutions of the House of Commons, now embodied in the Bill before us — the individual to whom a pension is given must be either known in the public service, or eminent to a certain degree in science and literature; but though the Minister is tied down to choose among these classes, his preference amongst the individuals belonging to them is perfectly unfettered. He must choose a literary man, or a scientific man, or a public servant, of some pretensions; but he may choose any one of these whom he pleases.

Now, what public benefit arises from enabling the minister to single out some one mathematician, or some one natural philosopher, or historian, or poet, for a public compliment, leaving all the others unrewarded? Let us just reflect upon what happens. The minister has a vacancy on the Pension List, and he wants to pay a compliment to the science of mathematics: he selects some one distinguished mathematician to fill the vacancy. Will it not constantly happen that other distinguished mathematicians will feel themselves aggrieved by this preference? They will say, "We do not care about the money, but the compliment paid to Mr. So-and-so implies that he is the first mathematician in the country, and this is a pre-eminence which we cannot admit." Sir, I say that this is a feeling both natural and justifiable. For, why is this compliment to be paid to any one particular man of science or man of letters, at the public expense, when there are others equally deserving of it? I might easily illustrate, this argument by repeating comments which I have heard made on various pensions which have been granted during the last few years; but I avoid any such allusions, because I neither intend to criticise, nor wish to appear to blame, any of these recent pensions. But I repeat, that if you place in the hands of the minister a public fund, to be distributed in pensions, either to public servants, or to men of science and letters and philosophy, the public is entitled to require that he shall single out the most exalted merit of its kind; and the moment that the minister fixes his choice upon any one, merely upon his own responsibility and without any public competition, he is sure to arouse the sensitive feelings of literary pre-eminence and personal comparison. You pay a compliment to one man of science, or to one public man, but you create a feeling of dissatisfaction and wounded pride in the bosoms of a dozen others. The difficulty which I point out is inherent in the case. And let it not be said that I am dwelling upon something too minute and trivial when I thus talk of jealousy and dissatisfaction among the scientific or literary competitors of the person to whom the minister gives the pension. Why, Sir, the only good which the pension does is the gratification which it imparts to the favoured individual; and it surely, therefore, is not improper to take some account of the contrary feelings experienced by others.

But, then, we are told that the pensions on the Civil List are not to be distributed according to public services alone, or to scientific merit alone, but partly to charitable purposes also. I cannot think, Sir, that this new ground on which the pensions are placed will be found more tenable than the other. Your pension list is then to be an asylum for public servants or for persons of literary eminence, when they happen to be in a state of comparative distress. Let me ask whether this test will be found to hold if it is applied to pensions granted during the last few years? I am quite sure that there are persons on that list among the literary and scientific men placed there since the last few years, who would feel much hurt if any one were to ascribe their pensions to the fact of their being in distressed circumstances, or to any other cause, except their own personal title and deserts. But I believe that, when we are told that the Pension List is to be devoted partly to persons of public service or literary excellence, partly to purposes of charity, it is not meant, that, in every individual case, the two grounds of claim must both be combined, but that some pensions shall be given on the one ground and some on the other. Now, this seems to me to introduce entire confusion and perplexity into the distribution of pensions. On one and the same list, you see one person placed there on the score of public services, or scientific excellence, alone; another, on the score of charity alone; and a third, on the score of both combined. The distribution of pensions will become more arbitrary and irregular than ever. It was but the other day that the question was expressly put to me by a scientific man, in reference to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the night when he first proposed the Civil List. "I observe (he said) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer sometimes rests his pensions on the ground of distinguished eminence on the part of the recipient, sometimes on the ground of benevolence and charity. Now, it is essential (he continued) that the point should be distinctly understood whether they are granted on the one ground, or on the other. For the value of the compliment, the meaning and inferences deducible from it, by others, are entirely different, according as the one or the other is the true reason for which it is conferred."

Sir, I perfectly agreed with the gentleman who made this remark to me. I think the scientific world have a right to know when any particular man of science is singled out for a pension charged on a public fund, whether the grant implies scientific superiority, or whether it is intended as mere relief and assistance. If you leave this question doubtful, you greatly impair the value of the pension, even as a compliment to the pensioner himself; and you entirely destroy its value, as a compliment to the general body of scientific and literary men. If we look at the real state of the case, we shall find that the only persons who are in any way affected by a Pension List are a select circle of persons whose position and circumstances make them known to the minister, who may expect to receive pensions themselves, and who may consider themselves, in a certain sense, as competitors of the person preferred. To the public, generally, no benefit whatever accrues: they receive no service which they would not have received just as much without the grant of any such pension. But what is the effect produced upon this select circle of rivals and expectants? Sir, I cannot but think that whatever effect is produced upon them is of a very undesirable character. If there be any of them who desire to recommend themselves for a grant on the Pension List, the most effectual way of doing so will be by keeping well with the Minister of the day, — by pliant and obsequious behaviour in regard to his views, — by acting so as to obtain patronage and support from the Minister's partisans. If, I say, there be any person amongst the narrow circle to whom pensions may be given who seeks to recommend himself for a preference, this is the path which he will probably and naturally follow. And is it a desirable thing that he should be encouraged to follow this path? I think not. The habit of looking up to the Minister for vague and uncertain favours is one which is the very reverse of exalting to the character of literary men or of public servants. Instead of trying to create these habits, we ought rather to inculcate the lessons of independence and self-reliance. We ought to teach them to look to the natural and constant reward of their own exertions, rather than to the accidental breath of ministerial favour — I would, at any rate, abstain from holding out to them any artificial temptation to servile or obsequious conduct.

When Gentlemen speak of the importance of encouraging literature and science by means of pensions to literary and scientific men, I beg them to recollect what proportion of the existing Pension List is occupied by names of celebrity in these departments. So far from forming the general rule, names of literary or scientific celebrity form rare exceptions on the present Pension List. Out of a total expenditure of 130,000*l.*, something between 4000*l.* and 5000*l.* is devoted to persons of literary and scientific eminence. There cannot be a greater mistake than to imagine that the Pension Fund has been either wholly or principally devoted to the sustentation of men of letters. But if it were so devoted, wholly and without reserve, would the effect be good? Sir, I think the effect would be any thing but good. The employment of a large fund in this way would give the Minister a degree of controlling influence over the literary and scientific world, which would be fraught with a large balance of evil. It would enable him to corrupt and buy over to his own service a large proportion of those distinguished minds, by whom the intellectual character of every age is formed; and that, too, without being guilty of any apparent wrong, or seeming to deviate at all from the line of his duty. He has but to let it be understood according to what principles he will dispense his rewards, what particular tone of writing he will please to recompense, and there will be abundance of authors to tread the path chalked out for them. The integrity of literary men would be undermined, and their independence of character assailed, by temptations to which assuredly but too many of them would succumb. A large pension fund in the hands of the Minister, applied in the way of discretionary rewards to what is called the encouragement of literature and science, would be apt to degenerate into a fund for the corruption of literary and scientific men. If the pension fund be small, undoubtedly the effects will be less mischievous. But the tendency will still be the same: it is the force and efficacy only which will be diminished. And, surely, if the continuance of the pension fund is to be justified upon any sound principles, we ought not only to prove that it is not productive of little or no evil,—we ought, further, to demonstrate that it will bring about some positive and assignable good.

I know, Sir, that Gentlemen, when they discuss the question, commonly state some particular cases in which some pecuniary aid is both urgently needed and specially deserved;—the case of an author struggling with want, and engaged in useful studies which are not widely appreciated,—the case of a scientific man prosecuting researches, of which the result must be long deferred,—and other such instances, which touch powerfully upon our sympathies. Sir, I do not deny that such cases exist, and that it is a great delight when persons are found who have both the means and the will to relieve them. But the question to ask is, are these the cases to which the pension fund, in the hands of an English Minister, will be devoted? Whether we consult past experience, or future probability, we may confidently affirm that such cases will occur but rarely in the Pension List. If they are found there at all, it will be by a happy accident rather than by any natural result of the system. It is not such cases as these which make themselves vividly present to the eye of a Minister, or which are forced upon his attention by influential partisans. Those authors in whose favour our sympathies are most strongly enlisted during the present discussion, are precisely the persons least likely to benefit by the Pension List. Unless their cause is espoused and enforced by some powerful patron, they will be left to work and to suffer unheeded, and their claims will be postponed to those which are more in the highway and blaze of public celebrity. And therefore, the existence of cases such as these described, of unrewarded talent struggling against the pressure of poverty, cannot be held to constitute a sufficient reason for levying a pension fund at the public expense. Surely Gentlemen will not be inclined to reason this case as if there were to be no abuse whatever in the distribution of pensions,—as if the Minister were always to seek out for the best and fittest recipient, without any other object whatever. Is it at all to be imagined that this will be the fact? Has it happened during the past, or will it happen during the future? In this matter of the Pension List, especially, there always must be a peculiar liability to abuse. There is so much discretion and favour in the case, that an absence of abuse here is altogether incredible. The resolutions of the House of Commons, and the necessity imposed upon the Minister of laying on the Table of the House of Commons a return of every person upon whom he confers a pension, will, undoubtedly, operate as a restraint to some extent: the person selected will be one of some pretensionand qualifications, and you are secured against grants which are culpably unworthy; but, above that point, the protection is not of any efficacy, if the Minister be inclined to evade it. If any man calls to mind the solicitation to which the Minister must necessarily stand exposed, the influence made with him to favour this man or that man, it would be strange, indeed, if he were unable to bestow his undivided attention on the task of searching for the fittest man. I cannot so far banish the recollection of former experience, and the probabilities derived from influences which are no less active at the present time than they were formerly, as to believe that the distribution of these pensions, hereafter, will be such as to correspond with the lofty purposes which they are understood to aim at. The recommendation of the Minister's partisans must be during the future, as the existing list shows that it has been during the past, the most frequent passport to a pension; the large majority of pensioners will have no better title to be on the list than hundreds of others who are not on it, and have no chance of ever being on it.

Sir, in regard to that particular defence of the pension fund which is founded upon the necessity of providing means for relieving persons of merit who are in distressed circumstances, I beg the House to reflect carefully upon one particular circumstance — I mean the analogy of the Poor Law Amendment Bill. There may be Gentlemen in this House who think that this analogy has been pressed more closely and frequently than the real circumstances of the case warrant; but they may be assured that there is no one point of our proceedings on which the public mind is more keenly alive, or by which the dispositions prevalent in this House are more likely to be judged. I supported that Bill when it was first proposed, and I still continue to support it now. I think it has worked, as a whole, most beneficially for the great body of the poor; but, at the same time, I cannot conceal from myself that there are peculiar cases in which it has pressed hardly upon some individuals, and in which it has imposed the necessity of withholding relief where sympathy and compassion, if we allowed ourselves to consult them without reference to the general results of the proceeding, would have prompted us to give it. The Poor Law Amendment Act involves this very serious principle — that no relief is to be given out of the poor rates except to entire indigence and destitution — that no relief in aid is to be extended either to cases of peculiar merit, or to cases of peculiar hardship, if they fall short of this unhappy extreme — that all these special cases shall be left to private bounty and charity, and not provided for out of the public fund for the poor. I ask whether it is not altogether inconsistent with this principle of dealing, if you now bring into existence a public fund for the express purpose of relieving those same special cases in persons of a different rank from the poor, which you have forbidden to be relieved out of the public poor fund in the instance of the poor themselves? Will not poor men, who are weighed down by a very large family, or by some peculiar burden of misfortune, have some reason to complain of unequal treatment, if you enforce the principle of shutting them out from relief, in aid, out of the public fund, when you think it right to create by public tax a special fund in order to alleviate this precise species of calamities in the dependents and connections of the rich? I do think, Sir, that this would be unequal treatment: we should teach the great body of the poor the melancholy lesson that we adopted a principle of exclusion in regard to special cases of hardship on the part of poor men, and a principle of indulgence and munificence towards the special calamities of those whose position was nearer to our own. Sir, if any one cause more than another can tend to make the Poor Law Amendment Act odious to the bulk of the community, it is the idea that the poor are dealt with unfairly and unequally, and upon principles which are not supposed to apply to the ranks above them. I think that we shall be doing much to encourage and sanction this idea, if with the present administration of the poor laws, we proceed to create a fresh Pension List for the Crown at the cost of the people. Gentlemen may, perhaps, ask me whether I would think it fit to take away altogether the means of recompensing extraordinary merit or special service to the nation. I reply, Sir, that I think Parliament is the quarter to which application ought to be made, in the event of any special reward being necessary. A case ought to be made out before this House, if there be any extraordinary services or any remarkable excellence in other ways which is supposed to demand a recompence at the hand of the nation.

I know I shall he told that Parliament will be both profuse and partial, and I am well aware that this is true to a certain extent. But still I contend that the best security which you can take against excess or error is, to require that the case shall be previously proposed and approved in Parliament before any grant is made. This is the same security which we have against extravagance in any other department of the public expenditure: and imperfect as I confess it to be, still I think that the charge upon the nation would be both smaller in amount and more conducive to really beneficial purposes, than it is likely to be under the proposition of the Right Honourable Gentleman now before us. I think that propositions of this kind would not be lightly submitted to the House, when it was necessary to sustain every one of them by a statement of positive merits or services, open to comment or discussion in this House, and when every separate grant carried with it a specific addition to the public burdens. I think that propositions for special national recompence would not often be made, and would be still less often successfully made; and most assuredly in a good system such interpositions ought on all accounts to be rare. If it be contended that the Crown would be deprived of the means of rewarding ancient and faithful personal servants of the Sovereign, I submit that the proper way of obviating this objection would be to make a moderate addition to the privy purse, or to the sum allowed in the fourth class of the Civil List for royal bounty. In my view, I confess, these sums as they now stand are quite sufficient, and more than sufficient, to meet all the reasonable wants of the Crown, of the kind which I am now considering: nevertheless, if the House thought otherwise, these amounts might receive a moderate increase. Upon the principle which I propose the reward of merit would stand pointedly distinguished from relief to distress, as I think it ought to be: it would neither be dispensed through the same hands nor out of the same fund.

Sir, I have now endeavoured to state to the House the grounds on which I propose that this sum of 1200*l.* annually for new pensions shall no longer stand on the Civil List. I have stated objections which I consider to be weighty and forcible against the continuance of a pension fund generally; I have endeavoured to show that no public advantage accrues from it sufficient to induce us to create such a fund at the cost of the people; I have endeavoured to show that whether we consider it as a fund for relieving distress or for rewarding merit, in either case there are objections which more than outweigh all the benefit to individuals which can be supposed to arise from it. I have also sought to impress upon the House my conviction that, in creating a public fund for the relief of those special cases of distress in favour of which the pension fund is invoked, you place yourself in awful contradiction with the strict principle involved in the Poor Law Amendment Act, and that in the present temper of the nation, you cannot too carefully avoid the suspicion of administering relief strictly towards the labouring classes and indulgently towards others. These objections point, of course, to an entire discontinuance of the Pension List for the future; and it is my opinion, undoubtedly, that the list ought to be discontinued. But even if Gentlemen are disposed still to maintain a Pension List of the amount here defined, I have endeavoured to show the House that there are grounds for striking this particular clause out of the Civil List at present. For I contend that the provision for pensions does not properly and conveniently belong to the Civil List, and ought not to be fixed irrevocably and unalterably for the duration of a long reign; and I contend, farther, that there is a peculiar impropriety in fixing the amount of the pension fund for the future, at a moment when a full inquiry into the administration of the pension fund for the past is just commencing; — an inquiry which may supply materials most important for determining the deliberate judgment of the House as to the future amount which it may be wise to allot for this object.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I rise to second the motion of my Honourable Friend. I do so the more readily because the proposition that is now made is the one which I myself submitted in the committee of 1831. I think, so far as reason will go, that my Honourable Friend has exhausted all the arguments on the subject, and it would be only a waste of the time of the House were I to occupy it at any length. I will only say, that my opinion is strengthened more and more every day, from the working of the pension system, that no grant whatever ought to be allowed to any individual out of the public funds. I hope that the time is coming when this principle will be acted upon. The reason why I am anxious to second the motion is, that I do not consider the continuance of the pension fund consistent with the Report of the committee of last Session. The very word "pension" is rendered odious from the abuses that have crept into the system. And such is the general feeling throughout the country, that I do not think that this grant of 1200*l*. a-year would, in the words of the committee, add either to the honour, the comfort, or the dignity of the Crown.

The question having been put, —

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said: — I have no reason to complain of the mode in which the Honourable Member for the city of London has introduced this subject; on the contrary, the calm tone in which he has treated it is to me perfectly satisfactory. But having done justice to the mode in which the Honourable Gentleman has introduced this question, he will excuse me if I take the liberty of saying that I differ essentially from some of the principles laid down by him, and I will also show that he is in error in some of his facts. I admit that the points of mistake are not material, inasmuch as the Honourable Gentleman has rested his chief argument upon principle; but whether the question is more or less material in arguing this subject, I think it necessary that the House and the public should be precisely informed with respect to the money part of the argument, and the exact charge which by the new plan is intended to be cast upon the public as compared with the previous plan. The Honourable Gentleman has stated that the charge of 1200*l*. a year in a period of twenty years amounts, by my admission, to the sum of 40,000*l*. In this the Honourable Gentleman is completely and entirely mistaken. What I have stated is this, that 1200*l*. accumulated in any way for the youngest and best of lives could not produce 40,000*l*. I am, therefore, surprised that the Honourable Gentleman has fallen into this mistake. My statement was this, that the combination of the old Pension List and the new Pension List would amount to that sum; but I must observe, that this statement applies to the combination of both lists. This is a mere question of fact, and I call the attention of Honourable Gentlemen to the reduction which has been made on the previous Civil List as a most material consideration. Under the old system of fixing the maximum at 75,000*l*., which is supposed to be filled up, as in all probability it will be, during a period of, say, twenty years, this sum would be annually charged upon the Pension List. By the new plan, as adopted in the Bill before the House, this charge will be reduced in a period of twenty years to the sum of 41,000*l*., thus showing an absolute saving of not less than 34,000*l*. The Honourable Gentleman's argument may be justly said to apply to the lesser sum as well as to the greater; but as the House has been told that no reduction is effected, but rather that there is an increase in consequence of the provisions of the present Bill, I think I have a right to call the attention of Honourable Members to the fact. It may be ascertained, by calculations, what is the actual value of the faculty vested in the Crown under the old system of fixing the amount of pensions at 75,000*l*., taking the average of the pensions. If you take this, and compare it with the value of the faculty of creating new pensions to the amount of 1200*l*. a-year, the difference in the amount is not less than 778,000*l*.

I will now proceed to the argument of the Honourable Member, which divides itself into two parts. The one is, whether pensions shall be granted at all; and the other, whether, if granted, they shall be granted by the Crown? I beg to say one word of a preliminary nature on the second part. I am afraid there is a decided difference between the principle on which I am disposed to act and the principle laid down by the Honourable Member for London. That Honourable Gentleman wishes altogether to separate form the Crown of England the power, under just regulations, and under strict parliamentary responsibility, of conferring any rewards. I wish, on the contrary, that this power should attach inseparably to the Crown. Such a power must exist somewhere, and I think it is consistent with our monarchical principles, of a fixed Government, that the source of honour and rewards should be connected with the Crown. I think that such a power could be more safely lodged with the Crown, under parliamentary responsibility, than elsewhere, and it is in accordance with the principles on which this House has on former occasions thought proper to act. Upon those principles, there arises an irreconcileable difference of opinion between the Honourable Gentleman and myself; and I think that if the argument against the Crown be good for anything, it must go further, and make all rewards, honours, and distinctions proceed from Parliament, and not from the Crown. The argument of the Honourable Member, if it be good for anything, goes this full length, and the principle he advocates strikes at the root of the monarchy itself. But the argument of the Honourable Gentleman goes further. The principles of the Constitution, as I understand them, create the Crown the source of all honours and distinctions.

But the Honourable Member for the city of London calls upon the House to affirm a principle with regard to the grant of rewards, which, if applied elsewhere, would be destructive of the best interests of the country. Would the Honourable Member have the Parliament appoint the judges and all the other judicial officers who are now appointed by the Crown? If he would make the Crown the source of honours and distinctions, why attempt to deprive the Crown of the right of granting rewards of this description?

But I will come to the argument with respect to the question, whether pensions shall be granted at all? I have endeavoured to show that, in point of economy, the provisions included in the Bill before the House are such as to recommend themselves to their adoption. But there are other grounds on which I rest my economical argument. The Honourable Member for the City of London has said that he would exclude altogether superannuation allowances and rewards for retired public servants. Now, I think the Honourable Gentleman is not very wise in so doing. There are many cases in which rewards for public services may be safely and properly given under parliamentary responsibility, which will not come under the strict rules which apply to ordinary cases of superannuation allowances. There are many cases in which the strict rules on which rewards are granted for wounds and public services would exclude persons who might have the strongest claims upon the gratitude and good feeling of the country. The effect of the Honourable Gentleman's proposition would be to place us in this difficulty, that though there would be a right with respect to retired and superannuation allowances, they would be subjects of indefinite application, sources of infinite inconvenience and expense to the country. You must have, now, another fund from which public servants, subject to parliamentary responsibility, may obtain those rewards, which they cannot and ought not to have under the strict rules of the Pension List. If I had the list before me, I could show innumerable cases of this description. The Honourable Member for the City of London is himself a Member of the Civil List Committee; and I will take upon myself to say, that he will himself admit, that the committee has had before it innumerable cases of this description. The Honourable Member says, that he wishes that a line of distinction should be drawn between those pensions which are granted for scientific and literary attainments, and those which are granted from charity. I admit that the class of arguments which applies to the one is essentially distinct from that which applies to the other. The Honourable Gentleman says, that on the part of the scientific and literary world he is desirous that there shall be no such thing as pensions at all; and the Honourable Member gives, as his reason, that he apprehends that these rewards are given for the purpose of influencing the opinions of authors or men of letters.

Now, I do not think it possible for any individual, in these days, to suggest such a motive or such a consequence. Does any man think that the pension was granted to Dr. Dalton from political motives? Did the Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Peel) hesitate, for a moment, to grant a reward to Professor Airey, or did he inquire, beforehand, into Mr. Airey's politics? Or was the reward withheld from that gentleman because he happened to hold entirely opposite opinions to the Right Honourable Baronet? If I am not much in error, — I know not whether I have been misinformed, — but respecting one pension which was brought into question early in the present Session, namely, the pension granted to Mr. Moore, I believe that expressions of the greatest kindness were used by the Right Honourable Baronet, when the Right Honourable Baronet stated, that if the pension had not been already granted, he would not have been indisposed to have taken into consideration the claims, the genius, and the talents of Mr. T. Moore. I have heard such a rumour. I know not whether it be true, but this I do know, from the evidence of the papers before me, and the facts that have come to my knowledge, that whether Mr. Moore has been a Whig, or Mr. Southey a Tory, — whether Mr. Wordsworth or any other distinguished person has been in question, no Minister would be base enough, in the days in which we live, to make a selection from a reference to the politics of the parties; and, if a Minister had been base enough, he would not have been fool enough, to commit himself to such a prostitution of the power reposed in him. But I must say, that I have a better opinion of the character of literary and scientific men than the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Grote). I believe that if any Government were so disposed to prostitute their power, there is a spirit in literature and science which would not allow literary and scientific men to be insulted, or their talents to be disgraced, by their being turned to such miserable purposes of political profligacy.

I will now refer to the reports when literary pensions were first brought under the consideration of this House. I will allude to the pension granted to Dr. Johnson. Did any one ever ask what were the politics of the learned Doctor? The Honourable Gentleman must have means of information from which I am excluded, if he has reason to believe that the pension which was given to Dr. Johnson was at all given on political grounds. Why, Mr. Fox, who was as good a judge of literary merit as of politics, objected to the grant, and said it was a disgrace to the Ministry to propose it, because it was an insufficient reward for the great philosopher's literary labours, and declared that the grant ought to be doubled, if given at all. With respect to service pensions, I cannot, for a moment, allow that in such grants there are any of the considerations enumerated by the Honourable Member (Mr. Grote). The poor laws were intended as a relief for distress and destitution, and not as a reward for public services. If the Honourable Gentleman feels the full force of his argument, he ought to declare, openly before the House, that, in every case where an officer or public servant receives a service pension, whose family or relations are rich or well off, the pension should be withdrawn. There is not the least analogy between the poor law provisions and the grants for public services. Now, with respect to the pensions of bounty. The Honourable Gentleman says, that this bounty has always been abused. I do not deny it. But what is now the object of the House in legislating upon the subject, but to prevent abuse for the future? As to the argument which the Honourable Member adduces, that if pensions are to be granted, the House, and not the Crown, should be the medium of granting them,—the point has been discussed so recently, that I will not detain the House by arguing it. The Honourable Member has alluded to the case of Captain Ross,—a case in which the Crown would not have made a grant without inquiry; but so anxious was the House of Commons to assist the gallant officer, that it first made the grant, and afterwards established an inquiry into its necessity. This circumstance proves the liability of this House to commit many abuses, and I deny that it is the proper tribunal to originate pensions, although it may judge of the discretion of the Government, who are responsible for all their recommendations. Let the House recollect that it is to have all, in the way of supervision, that it can require; the Pension List will be laid before it every year, when Honourable Members will be able to object to any one grant which they do not think justified by the circumstances of the case. If the House were to exclude the clause for the very limited grant, it would be, for the first time in the history of this country, that its Sovereign would be left without the means of rewarding literary and scientific merit. If the views of the Honourable Member be adopted, it will be vesting in the House of Commons the exclusive right of conferring all appointments and dignities, and it will be depriving the Crown of its highest and most valuable prerogative. Again, that power will be vested not in the collective body, but in the majority of the House, who may act under the influence of party and political impulse. It would be more advisable to dispense altogether with pensions than to leave their administration to this House. All former pensions have been vested in the Crown, and what I now ask of the House is to regulate the principle, and limit the amount of the Pension List, but not to deprive the Sovereign of those resources of which she would have been in possession had not her hereditary revenues been given up to the country. It should be the prerogative of the Monarch to reward literary and scientific merit; and, holding this opinion, I shall vote against the motion of the Honourable Member for the City of London.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—It is my intention to give my decided vote against the proposition of the Honourable Member for London, because I conceive its object to be to deprive the Crown of the right of granting pensions as the reward of merit. At the same time, I cannot say that the provisions in the Bill are altogether satisfactory. I think the sum of 1200*l.* as an annual grant for pensions, is far too scanty, particularly when the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has consoled the House by stating that, in twenty years, there will be a saving of 30,000*l.* per annum to the country by the arrangement. This confirms me that 1200*l.* is an ungenerous grant. At the same time, I think that there are advantages in allotting a fixed annual sum to the Crown, provided that the grant is a liberal one. The allowing of a pension depends, in a great measure, upon the means in the hands of the Crown to pay it, and where the power of so doing is, as in the reign of William IV., contingent upon the falling in of existing pensions, it will often happen that, at the time when there are most calls for grants of this kind, there are no means of making them; whilst, at other times, the Crown will have more abundant means at its disposal than the occasion of the day requires. I think, therefore, that a fixed sum, provided it be of such an amount as to be a fair equivalent for the means already at the disposal of the Crown, would be an improvement. But I must say again, that I think the sum of 1200*l.* a-year too small, when it is considered that out of it are to be met all the pensions for the three great divisions of the kingdom.

There is another feature, also, in the plan of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer of which I disapprove, namely, that, in any year, if the Crown do not grant pensions to the full extent of the 1200*l.*, it is not to have at its disposal the residue for the ensuing year; but that, in no year, the Crown is to grant more pensions than to the amount of 1200*l.* I must say, that I think it would be better not to limit the discretion of the Crown in this way, as it must naturally occur that in some years there will be more proper occasions for its bounty than in others; and the object of Parliament in affixing a limit at all will be fully answered by providing that the grants of the Crown in pensions shall not exceed an average of 1200*l.* a-year, taking one year with another. I trust, therefore, that this part of the Bill will be reconsidered, and altered in a way, as I think, tending manifestly to the public advantage.

The next objection which I have to the plan of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the proposal to call upon the Crown to lay upon the Table of this House, every year, a list of the pensions granted by virtue of this Bill.

Several Honourable Members. — Hear, hear, hear!

SIR R. PEEL. — There are some Honourable Gentlemen in the House who really do not seem to be at all disposed to be satisfied with any arrangement whatever on this subject. They first make a resolution to govern the Crown in the distribution of all future pensions, — a resolution to which the Crown has shown every disposition to adhere, and which it has hitherto acted up to most implicitly; yet with this resolution the very Honourable Members who assisted in passing it are now finding fault. Now, when the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke, as he did, of our bounden duty to preserve the monarchical prerogative in the distribution of these bounties, I wonder that he did not premise that the very arguments which he used bore directly against his own proposition. The fact is, that the Right Honourable Gentleman, in his anxiety to conciliate both sides of the House to his scheme, has necessarily been betrayed into inconsistencies which will hardly escape observation. When the Right Honourable Gentleman, addressing his own friends behind him, said that the House of Commons ought to exact a yearly statement from the Crown of the manner in which it has disposed of the sum of money granted to it by this Act of Parliament, I marvel that the Right Honourable Gentleman did not perceive that such an exercise of authority would almost amount to a veto upon, if not actually to a directional power over, these bounties. The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that the Crown is the fountain of honour and favour. Now, this being the case, I cannot see that the prerogative of the Crown applies any more directly to one than to the other; yet what would the Right Honourable Gentleman say, if it were proposed to make the Crown give in a return to this House of all the titles and honorary distinctions which it has conferred from year to year? Would not this be objected to as a pretence, on the part of this House, to exercise an inquisitory authority over the exercise of the royal prerogative?

I am aware that returns of pensions in existence have been given from time to time; but this was done at particular periods, and upon a requisition made, either when the House was about to legislate upon the subject of the Civil List, or when a strong feeling of jealousy or misgiving existed as to the application of these funds. But I think there is a very clear distinction to be drawn between an occasional return of this kind, and a yearly legal presentation for the purpose of challenging inquiry into the acts of the Crown. I must confess that, when I heard the speech of the Right Honourable Gentleman, I was very much surprised at his making use of observations so very contrary to what I have been accustomed to hear come from that side of the House. It only shows what rapid changes we have to expect from that quarter; and we ought not to be at all surprised if, seven years hence, we should see a proposition emanate from the Right Honourable Gentleman's party to take away all power to grant pensions from the Crown, and to vest it entirely in the House of Commons. I have already said that I consider the grant of 1200*l.* far too limited for the proper exercise of the royal prerogative in the rewarding literary and civil merit. This is my opinion, and I predict that the country will participate in it before very long. What will be the consequence? The feelings of the country will revolt at seeing men who have devoted their talents and their energies to the prosecution of literary and scientific pursuits, for the practical benefit of the community, languishing in distress and want. The Crown will be applied to to succour them, — but applied to in vain; for, with every disposition, it will not have the means to grant pensions so loudly demanded by all the dictates of humanity, of gratitude, and of sound policy. What will be the case, then? The House of Commons will have to step in, and avert the consequences of an error of which it has been guilty, but, at the same time, will take to itself the merit of the grant, to the obvious disparagement of the Crown. All this may not be the consequence of a premeditated step towards republican principles, — the desire may not, perhaps, now exist to establish the power of the House of Commons on the ruin of that of the Crown; but, as the right to grant bounties must be exercised, and must rest somewhere, — so, if this grant, in the hands of the Crown, be now thus restricted, that power must eventually be taken out of the hands of the Crown, altogether, by the House of Commons.

Having expressed my opinion that the proposition of the Right Honourable Gentleman, limited as it is, is fraught with dangerous consequence to the monarchical principle of these bounties, I shall proceed to another branch of the subject. I must say that it is rather extraordinary to find Honourable Gentlemen who formerly required that all bounties should be confined to rewarding literary or scientific merit, and who caused a resolution to be passed to that effect, now quarreling with their own regulation. The Honourable Gentleman opposite has said that giving a reward to a meritorious individual is a very invidious proceeding, and calculated rather to give offence than otherwise to the other members of the same class. Now this, I must be allowed to state, is a most extraordinary argument. Why, what used to be said of this country, in comparing it with surrounding nations? Was it not said, that despotic nations rewarded science, and selected eminent scientific and literary men, anxious to pay them a just compliment, whilst they also afforded them a substantial reward? "See," it was said, "what despotic governments do: they reward science — they select eminent men — and are anxious to pay a compliment to them, by conferring upon them some substantial reward." The argument of the Honourable Member is completely against Sir Walter Scott's being made a baronet, because I contend that it applies equally to granting a dignity as granting a pension. Doubtless the Honourable Gentleman will say that the honorary distinction cost nothing, while the pension would put the country to the expense of 300*l.* a year. This is the argumentum ad pecuniam which seems altogether to influence the Honourable Member's views in this matter. I always think that when a literary man of eminence is selected for royal favour, the whole class is elevated and complimented in that act. I well recollect what was said, over and over again, on the former debates on this subject,—that by granting pensions too exclusively to persons connected with the military profession, or with politics, those two classes of public characters were elevated into undue importance, to the disparagement of meritorious conduct in other useful pursuits. It was then that a resolution was passed for rewarding literary merit and scientific acquirement; and now that this resolution is being faithfully acted upon, the Honourable Gentleman complains that by rewarding members of the literary profession with pensions the circle of letters is degraded, and the other members of it have cause to complain of an invidious selection having been made for the royal bounty. Then it appears that the real ground of complaint now is, not what it was formerly,— that literary merit is not rewarded; but—that it is rewarded;—in other words, Honourable Members quarrel with their own resolution. In my opinion, it is proper that literary and scientific men of merit should receive the occasional aids which they require, and be honoured with the conventional distinctions which are established in a monarchy — I think that these rewards should be conferred only by the Crown; and that unless there is suspicion of abuse in the exercise of the power of the Crown, it should not be questioned by this House; still less should those rewards and distinctions be conferred by the majority of this House. On these grounds I shall oppose the motion of the Honourable Member for London.

Mr. CLAY. — I shall support the motion of the Honourable Member for London, for two reasons: in the first place, because I fully coincide in the opinion of the committee on the Civil List, appointed at the commencement of the last reign, who recommended that the Pension List should be separated entirely from the Civil List of the Crown; and in the second place, because I think that the proposition for granting 1200*l.* a-year to the Crown, for new pensions, is an injudicious, a crude, and an improper one; involving the Crown in much difficulty and responsibility, in its exercise of which it may entail upon itself much of public odium and disappointment. At the same time I beg to be understood that I cannot go along with my Honourable Friend (Mr. Grote) to the full extent of his argument, and say that no pensions should be granted except by this House; still less am I prepared to say that no pensions ought to be granted at all. On the whole, I think that there is much indiscreet haste evidenced in bringing forward this proposition at the very moment when a committee is sitting on the subject. I think that at least such a grant should have been withheld until that committee had made its Report. With regard to giving the right to the Crown of allowing any pensions at all, I am not prepared to affirm that there are no conceivable circumstances under which the Crown, as the fountain of honour, should not have the power of bestowing pensions. I maintain that there may be a certain combination of circumstances under which no rule, à priori, can be made to determine what is the privilege which the Crown should enjoy in remunerating eminent public services. I am, however, quite averse to the proposition for allowing such a power to be reposed in this House. A popular assembly never wisely interferes with the distribution of patronage; and no instance can be found, either remote or proximate, in the history of this House, by which it can be proved that Parliament ever wisely performed the appropriate duties of the Executive. If there be any privilege with which this House can be less wisely and advantageously entrusted than another, it is, beyond all doubt, the power of originating money grants to individuals. An assembly, such as the House of Commons, is too much governed by impulse for the just exercise of such a right. The course of their proceedings, I fear, would be this: that, under certain circumstances, they would give a great deal too much, whilst under the influence of other considerations, and swayed by some feelings of the moment, they would be tempted to neglect public services of the highest order. The temper in which a popular assembly would grant pecuniary remuneration to individuals is, I think, well illustrated in an expression used by Sterne's celebrated character, Yorick. He is represented to have said, when touched with compassion for the sufferings of an individual, "that he gave him all the money in his pocket." He does not inform the reader what was the exact amount; but in giving his reflections on it afterwards, he says, "that he considered it at the time much too little, but he has since deemed it a great deal too much." Such, I am convinced, is the spirit in which a popular assembly would act, if invested with the power which is contemplated. With the limitations which I have laid down, I shall give my support to the motion of the Honourable Member for London. I hold myself at perfect liberty, when the Report of the committee for inquiry into this subject shall be laid before the House, to support a resolution for granting a specific sum, annually, for this object out of the consolidated fund, though I am not at all sure that it ought not to be a larger sum than the 1200*l.* a-year now proposed. I look upon that sum as either too much or too little; and consider the grant proposed by the present Bill hasty, without the Report of the committee.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I differ, almost equally, from each of the two sections of Honourable Gentlemen arranged on the opposite benches. I cannot concur in the opinion, that the sum which the Crown now receives for the purpose of granting pensions can be found too large, though I am quite willing to hold with the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, — that it may be too small. The first words which I heard from the Honourable Member for London, as I entered the House, were grounded on the proposition, that as the Crown was, according to the popular maxim, considered the fountain of honour, this House should be viewed as the fountain of special reward. My Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with great consistency of argument, but singular inconsistency of conduct, asked the Honourable Member for London this question: — "If you concede to the House of Commons the privilege which you require, with what colour, afterwards, can you deny that it must also be looked upon as the fountain of honour?" I understood the Honourable Member for London to assent to that conclusion.

Mr. GROTE. — No; I never did so.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I certainly understood the Honourable Gentleman to concur in the view suggested by the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Giving the Honourable Gentleman, however, full credit for his denial, I still conceive that the conclusion at which he has arrived is imperfect, and that if he maintain that the House of Commons should exercise an exclusive control over the expenditure of money for compensating individuals who have contributed to the public service, there is no reason why it should not also preside over the distribution of honours. This view of the question is strengthened by the admission which the Honourable Member for London has made,—that the bounty fund of the Crown ought to be increased; and that it should be disbursed, not in the shape of pensions, but of alms. It appears to me, that the wisest course would be to leave the Crown unfettered in the disposal, not only of this 1200*l.* a-year, but in its larger revenues. The amount of the income of the Crown has been diminished, by taking away the hereditary revenues; and after having deprived the Sovereign of one half of funds irresponsibly distributed, it is required that an account shall be rendered of the whole sum which is now received. It is not just to hold out to the Crown the semblance of free agency, whilst its revenues are periodically subject to the revision of this House. I trust that some Honourable Member — I hope it will be my Right Honourable Friend near me (Sir R. Peel) — will move that this clause be altogether omitted. I hold that though this House is fit to originate all parliamentary pensions, it is not a tribunal which ought to decide as to the amount or distribution of other pensions. In those cases they ought to be left to the decision of the Crown; and the money granted for this purpose should be given absolutely, and without any limitation; or it would be a mockery of power, and would place the Crown in a more invidious position than it before occupied, with repect to the same subject. I think the Ministers of a young Queen, who has just succeeded to the throne, have not acted well in limiting to so small a sum the amount which is left at her disposal, for the purpose of pensions; and I regret it, both on account of her Majesty, and the country. I believe that the latter would have sustained the Ministry in upholding the just privileges of the Crown; but they have taken a course which satisfies neither party, and have yielded the principle, without remedying what is considered, by some of their supporters, a practical grievance. The Honourable Member for London is against any pensions; and is equally opposed to the grant of 1200*l.* a-year as to one of 12,000*l.* a-year. Looking, however, with no feelings of approbation on the general proposition, I still feel bound to prefer it to the amendment which has been submitted.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I feel bound to take a part, though I do so reluctantly, from an indisposition to trespass on the attention of the House, in this discussion; because I am compelled to vote against those with whom I have been in the habit of acting, and I wish to convince them that it is from no unworthy motive that I thus act, but that my opinions, however erroneous they may be, are taken up with sincerity, and are the subject of much reflection. I wish, in the first place, to state, that of all those who have spoken on this question, I most agree—indeed I may say that I almost entirely concur — with the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth. I do not think there is any great force in the special argument used by my Honourable Friend the Member for Dublin, and it strikes me that the views of the Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Clay) are contrary to the general principles which influence my vote. I admit, that if the amount of pensions had not been reduced to a large extent, the argument would be, that we should be stultifying our vote for inquiry if we resolved to grant the same, or almost an equal amount, as that now submitted to the committee. If the labours of the committee lead to any important results, it is probable that some portion of these pensions will be found to be misapplied, and that a reduction to that extent ought to be made. But when I heard the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which has not been rebutted or even touched upon by any Honourable Member who has spoken, that the enormous reduction has been effected in the amount of pensions of 75,000*l.* to 40,000*l.*, I felt that such a diminution must exceed anything which the committee could effect. I cannot conceive that a committee, admitting the principle of granting pensions at all, can come to the conclusion that 40,000*l.* could not be usefully employed for accomplishing such an object. I think that the fear of making too great changes, and shaking public opinion too much, will fix the reduction which has been made, as one large enough for the demands of the country. I cannot but recollect that, seven years ago, the Crown of England had the unlimited disposal of 150,000*l.* a-year, and that that grant is cut down to 40,000*l.*, with strict and annual responsibility. I do not concur in the assertion that the proposed 1200*l.* a-year is too small an amount, though I fully concur in the opinion, that the distribution of pensions should not be correspondent to that amount in any particular year. The result of this resolution would be, that the full amount being given to be applied to each separate year, and carried over to no other, unmerited pensions would be granted, in order to expend the whole sum of 1200*l.* a-year.

But my Honourable Friend the Member for London objects altogether to the principle of granting pensions by the Crown. I wholly differ from him, because I conceive it is a power which should be reposed in some authority in this great and highly civilised country. I think it desirable that men of letters should be fostered by the Government, when labouring, not for popular applause, or for the sale of their works of the day; but that their spirit should be sustained, whilst contributing to the advantage of posterity, without receiving the recompence of popular favour. If we look to the authority of those who have done the most friendly services to and conferred the greatest benefit upon posterity, — if we go back to history,—we shall find that of all those who have implanted the impress of their own thoughts on future generations, there has not been one who was not supported by the bounty of the Crown or of individuals. I might give the challenge to produce any great name in our literature, from Chaucer's down to those of our own time, and ask whether there is any considerable number of their profession who were not supported by regal or individual generosity. Let the House look to those who were maintained by the Earl of Essex and by Queen Elizabeth, as well as by the dissolute and worthless Charles II., whose pleasure, interest, and taste it was to cherish literary excellence. Let us look to the munificence of our nobility. I must confess that I am afraid the spirit which formerly actuated the nobility has passed away, or, at least, that public feeling is so altered that men of eminence will not brook to receive the bounty of an individual. I am afraid that such a philosopher as Hobbes would be loth to confess that he lived on the bounty of a Duke of Devonshire, and that the free and independent spirit of such a man as Locke would never consent to be looked on as supported by an Earl of Shaftesbury. One of the brightest ornaments to the Pension List was Dr. Johnson, who, when party spirit ran most high, did not disdain to receive the bounty of the Crown. Nothing can better illustrate the propriety of bestowing the bounty of the Crown on those who have applied their genius to the benefit of posterity, than the comparison between the pursuits of the two eminent men, Drs. Dalton and Wollaston. The first exercised his powers in extending the boundaries of science; whilst the other felt it his interest to engage in practical discoveries, which were not the fittest occupation for so great a mind.

I am convinced, also, that public remuneration ought not be confined to great men, and that such characters as Lord Chatham and his descendants should not be alone — profusely, I may say — provided for. Is it proper or decent that great merits only should be regarded, and that such individuals as Colonel Stewart, whose services were perhaps equally useful, should be neglected, and their children left without any remuneration? If a proposition were made in this House for giving some reward to Colonel Stewart, scarcely any one would be found, amidst the turmoil of party contention, to recognise his claims on the public generosity. Well, then, here is a case in which the power, vested in the Crown, might be most beneficially and judiciously exercised. According to the spirit of every wise constitution such a privilege should be confided, not to a representative assembly, but to the Executive. I know not of what use an hereditary Executive, or any executive at all, is, if it be not better adapted to decide, by its individual discretion, such matters, than if these were trusted to the judgment of a numerous assembly. At the present moment, when it is desired to introduce a new system, and when a check is to be put to jobbing, it is wise, for some time at least, to have these matters made the subject of annual investigation. I must confess, however, that the best course would be, to postpone passing judgment on these grants until after the lapse of a considerable time. I do not consider the time at which they are given the best for determining the merits on which they have been founded, biassed more or less as they must be by the expressions of popular favour, or the animadversions of the day. It would perhaps be best to have the Pension List revised at certain periods, — say, on the accession of every Monarch. I am certainly favourable, for the reasons which I have stated, to establishing annual returns as to the pensions granted at the present time; but I must protest as strongly as any Honourable Gentleman at the opposite side of the House, against making this House the arbiter of individual claims to the public bounty. Such a change must lead inevitably to a system of jobbing, of profusion, niggardliness, and unwise distribution of patronage, which will produce a deplorable waste of the public money, and be attended, in all respects, with the worst possible consequences to the country. I really believe, that it would often happen that the best pension would be that which was least favoured by the opinion of the day. It must be recollected that no pension ever excited more animosity than that conferred upon Dr. Johnson; and yet we look back to that just tribute to the unquestioned abilities of a great man, without any prejudice as to his support of the American war, but with a firm conviction that it proved the discernment of a Government in enabling a powerful mind, — whose opinions, though they may be considered erroneous, must be admitted to have been consistent and comprehensive, — to keep its energies alive, and to labour for the instruction and advantage of posterity.

I must refer to an instance in our own times, which proves the truth of the proposition I have laid down. I beg to allude to the pension of Mr. Coleridge, which was granted by Lord Grey's Government, and which reflected great credit upon it. Of all those who have contributed to the literature or philosophy of the country, the opinions of half the thinking men of the present day are more influenced by the writings of Coleridge than by those of any other individual; but at the same time he was desperately obnoxious to a particular party, and the consequence was, there was a greater outcry raised against his pension than almost any by which it was preceded; and it was in consequence withdrawn. Against the allowances given to Mr. Wordsworth and Mr. Southey a most illiberal outcry was raised, — which, in conjunction with the disapprobation expressed in the case of Mr. Coleridge, proves to me, that public opinion is not always exercised for the benefit of the community, or for the promotion of the interests of science.

It has been said that this power of granting pensions might be converted into a means of bribing literary men. Now, in the first place, I do not consider that influence the most dangerous which we have to fear. I think there is much greater danger that literary men would, for profit, flatter the passions of the multitude, than that they would be subservient to the interest of the Crown. By such a course, too, they would be likely to acquire a larger portion of that honour to which all superior minds aspire, namely, the good opinion of their fellow-creatures. But is it prudent to deprive the Crown of the means of direct corruption, while there is left to it the power of effecting that object much more effectually? If it was really the object of the Crown to corrupt Mr. Wordsworth, it had the power of doing so much more effectually by giving him the situation of stamp distributor, than by selecting him as the recipient of a pension which must attract public attention. It appears to me, that the danger of corrupting literary men does not apply to the Pension List, when there are so many modes of accomplishing the same object. It has been remarked, that pensions are sometimes given as a compliment, without reference to the wants of the individual. Now, I look upon the power of granting pensions as one of the most important trusts which can be confided to the Crown. The Crown is enabled, by it, to render great and immortal services to posterity, by fostering that species of ability which is most worthy of protection. The pension which appears to me, in this light, to be the worst since the new system has been established, is one of those given, at different intervals, by the Government of the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth, and that which has succeeded it, — I allude to the allowance made to Mrs. Somerville. That lady, I understand, is in perfectly easy circumstances, and her husband receives large salaries from offices which he holds under the Government. However meritorious her researches may be, —and no one wishes less than I do to depreciate them,—they are confined to the acquirement of branches of learning to which her sex has not, generally, aspired; — and no one can undertake to say that they add anything to the stock of human knowledge, or enlarge the bounds of science. Such a waste of money is to be the more deplored, when I recollect the circumstances under which that grant was made. I cannot but consider that pension a cruel perversion of the application of the fund, when I reflect that Dr. Wallace, the professor of mathematics in the university of Edinburgh, who, next to Ivory, is the best scientific scholar this country has introduced in the present century, and who spent his life in writing books of great value, and in teaching, was refused a pension when he found himself reduced to poverty in his old age. I am very much obliged for the attention which the House has given to me, whilst explaining my views on this subject, upon which I feel constrained to dissent from those to whose judgment I am accustomed to defer, and in whose principles I mainly agree. I must, however, give my assent to a mode of rewarding literary merit, which, if not the most wise and honest, is more so than any other means which the Constitution affords.

SIR RONALD FERGUSON. — The Honourable Member labours under a mistake, in supposing that Mrs. Somerville is in such affluent circumstances as he has stated. Her husband is merely physician to Chelsea Hospital. Beyond the salary which he receives there, they have no pecuniary resources; and if Dr. Somerville were to die to-morrow, she would be left without the means of support.

Mr. F. BARING.—I have followed the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard through his admirable and ingenious comments on this subject, and I cannot help thinking that the manner in which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has canvassed the peculiar merits of particular individuals will tend to illustrate what might be the course of argument and discussion if the House were to grant these pensions, and not the Crown. The Honourable Gentleman, though not intending to be offensive, must have felt that the allusions made to Dr. Wallace and Mrs. Somerville were objectionable. Perhaps I may be allowed to give some explanation of two of the cases which have been mentioned.

Several Honourable Members.—No, no!

Mr. F. BARING.—I mean only to justify the course which the Government pursued, and not to dwell on individual merits. The Honourable Gentleman has said that Dr. Wallace's application for a pension was refused. Now, the Noble Lord, who was then in power, when that application was made to him, said, that there was no vacancy on the Pension List, and therefore his request could not be granted, but that it should receive his earliest attention; and I believe an offer was made to him from the Crown, that he should be put in the situation which he would have been in if a vacancy had occurred, and that that offer was accepted; and he has actually received money from the bounty of the Crown. With regard to Mr. Coleridge, he was placed on the list of pensions granted by George the Fourth to literary men. At the death of that monarch these allowances dropped, and were not renewed in the succeeding reign; but the recipients were continued on the Pension List for the amounts which they previously received, when vacancies occurred.

The Right Honourable Baronet has said that 1200*l.* is too small a sum to be thus granted; and on this point I may, perhaps, agree with him. But the Government can neither be blamed nor praised for the reduction, for it has been made at the suggestion of a select committee. The Right Honourable Baronet has said, that if the grant were restricted to 1200*l.* in any one year, the Crown would be pretty sure to grant to the full extent of its power. That is the very point to which I called the attention of the committee; and I regret that I did not receive any support from the Right Honourable Baronet at that time. The provision in the Bill is conformable with the recommendation of the committee, which the Government have thought it their duty to adopt. The Right Honourable Baronet has objected to the laying of the names of the recipients of the pensions annually before the House; and has observed that the lists of promotions of honour made by the Crown are not in like manner laid on the Table of the House. That is very true; but still it is equally true, that they are made public, either by means of the London Gazette, or by some other way. I really do not believe that the Right Honourable Baronet will contend, that no protection is requisite against improper grants of pensions. In Mr. Burke's Bill relative to the pensions, certain checks upon the indiscriminate grant of these pensions are shadowed out, and the Government is bound to take care not to break through them; but distress and good deserts are expressly stated to be good grounds for granting them; and the House will have to say whether the intentions of the Legislature have been fairly carried into execution. The practical working of the proposal, to lay the names upon the table, will be, not to raise a discussion upon the individual names, but to check the profuse grant; to cause a strict examination into the merits of the original claim, and to place a severe control over the Government.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Divide, divide!

Mr. HAWES. — I can assure the House that I will detain it only a few moments. I am exceedingly anxious to state why I differ from my Honourable Friend the Member for the city of London, and, also, why I intend to pursue the same course as I did in the committee. I fully concur in the sentiments expressed by the Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets. In my view of my Honourable Friend's motion, it does not raise the principle whether pensions ought to be granted by the Crown, or not; for, if it did, I should certainly give it my support; but all that it does is, to say that the annual sum of 1200*l.* shall not be charged on the Civil List, such a sum being equivalent to the annual average of pensions now dropping in: and as my Honourable Friend does not propose to affirm the general principle, I cannot see the utility of his proposition.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I think that great injustice has been done to my Honourable Friend the Member for the city of London, because the whole subject has been argued as if there existed no other fund but the one in question, out of which the Crown may grant pensions. I beg to remind the House, that there do exist other such funds. First of all, there is the privy purse, amounting to 60,000*l.* a-year, and a yearly provision of 8000*l.* of unappropriated monies. Now, my conviction is, that the avowed object of the grant of this Pension List of 12000*l.* a-year, namely, that it is destined for the assistance of literary and scientific men, is a bad one, because it will interfere with the independence of the literary and scientific character. I object to this clause in the Bill on political grounds. In the first place, the proposed pensions will not be liable to the same imputations as those of the old Pension List. When pensions were granted to members of great families, those parties were already so corrupt, that it may fairly be said that they could not be further corrupted. It was not thought an honour, but the very reverse, to have one's name on the Pension List. Consequently, literary and scientific men were deterred from receiving pensions, because the acceptance of them was looked upon as a disgrace. I shall certainly oppose the clause, as I think it a good thing for literary men to rely for emolument on their own exertions.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Divide, divide!

Mr. GROTE. — Before the House proceeds to a division, I beg its indulgence whilst I explain one or two points which seem to be misapprehended by Honourable Members. My Honourable Friend the Member for Lambeth seems to think that my motion is nothing more than a transfer of the payment of the 1200*l.* a-year from the Civil List to the Consolidated Fund; but it is not so. All I move for is, that the power of granting pensions to this amount, annually, shall be struck out of the Civil List Bill; and if any Honourable Member chooses to move that they shall be charged on any other fund, it is perfectly competent for him so to do. I have not stated what my opinion of the abstract question is. I do not even propose to pledge the House on the question, whether the same amount ought to be granted, or not. All I do is, to expunge it from the present Bill. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford University has stated, that, from the tenour of my arguments, he gathers that I am hostile to the grant of all honours by the Crown. I have no objection to any inference to which Honourable Gentleman may think that my arguments may lead; I will not pronounce any opinion upon this distinct question, which is not before the House; but the only point which I wish Honourable Members to affirm or reject is, whether the House ought, or ought not, to create a public fund, by the taxation of the people, to be at the disposal of the Crown, or as a means of patronage in the hands of the Government of the day. This is the proposition which I am anxious that Honourable Gentlemen should decide in the affirmative or the negative; and I have only to observe, again, that the propriety of the grant of honours by the Crown forms no part of the question.

The House then divided: —

SIR R. PEEL. — It was argued in the committee, that the pensions should be regulated by a fixed annual sum, and not by a varying amount up to 75,000*l.*; and a resolution was moved to that effect. I adhere to the principles which were laid down by Lord Althorp in the year 1830, and have given my vote accordingly. And, having stated this, I will limit myself to one more point, and that is, that it is proposed to enable the Crown to grant an annual sum of 1200*l.* I propose that 1200*l.* shall be the maximum for one year on the average, and if that amount be not granted in any one year, then that the difference may be made up in any subsequent year, so, nevertheless, that the whole average shall not exceed 1200*l.* per annum. I may, perhaps, make my meaning more clear, by supposing that the amount of pensions granted in one year is only 800*l.*, which would be less by 400*l.* than the amount allowed by the Bill. I would, in such a case carry that sum over to the next year, to the advantage of the Crown, and empower it to grant pensions in the following year to the amount of 1600*l.* The intentions of the House would not be defeated by such an arrangement, because, upon an average of years, the annual sum granted would not exceed 1200*l.*

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I merely rise to say that I have no objection to effect the purpose intended by the Honourable Baronet, by altering the provisions of the Bill; because, in any event, a saving would accrue to the country.

SIR R. INGLIS. — As the Bill now stands, the pensions are to be "at the rate of 1200*l.* per annum." We have only to render these words more clear.

Mr. HUME. — I hope, Sir, that the Right Honourable Member will not thus give way, and yield to the suggestion of the Right Honourable Baronet; for, if there be no meritorious individuals worthy of receiving, in any year, grants to the amount of 1200*l.*, the public ought to have the benefit of the saving, and the surplus of one year ought not to be carried to the next.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I am surprised to hear my Honourable Friend say that he hopes the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not yield to the amendment proposed. There is no "yielding" in the matter; for the Right Honourable Gentleman is highly delighted with the proposition, and the most perfect harmony exists between the two sides of the House on the question. It seems to me that we are very awkwardly situated on this side of the House. I think we ought to remove to the opposite side; and the Right Honourable Baronet and his party should come here. The real Opposition is reduced to nineteen or twenty Members. If the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes the Bill to remain in its present form, why does he give up the present clause? Why, it appears that her Majesty's Government are afraid that the whole 1200*l.* might not be expended in one year, and they are determined that no saving shall thereby occur to the public. Is it not preposterous that 1200*l.* per annum should be added to the enormous income of the Crown? The real question is, — whether 1200*l.* shall be added every year to the already enormous grant of 385,000*l.* for the Civil List, for the purpose of bribing the literary and scientific men in the country, nominally by the Crown? But it is absurd to say that the Crown will have anything to do with the matter; the whole will be in the hands of the Minister of the day, to grant to whomsoever he chooses. The Right Honourable Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) seems to enjoy the situation in which Ministers are placed, by doing the work of his party. The Right Honourable Baronet expects, in a short period, to have the distribution of the money, and, of course, will not oppose the extravagance of Ministers, even when they go beyond what he would have ventured to suggest. But the evil is, that the present Ministers have the confidence of a portion of the people; and the consequence is, that they allow the Whigs to do that which they will not allow the Tories to do. By the junction which takes place with Honourable Members on the opposite side of the House and those who sit behind the Ministerial benches, the Radicals are left in minorities of twenty or twenty-two. I do think that there ought to be some change of seats: and I trust that, during the recess, the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair will cause some cross-benches to be erected; for those Honourable Members who sit behind the Ministers are, in my opinion, wofully out of place.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG.—Without imputing to those who will have the control of this fund any improper motive, I think they will, at all times, find persons to receive the money against whom no objection can be made. If the Crown is not permitted to exercise its discretion in granting any surplus that may arise in preceding years, there is no doubt but that the whole 1200*l.* will be granted every year. I think, then, I am best consulting the interests of public economy by supporting the motion for striking out this proviso.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—Although this is a point, perhaps, of no very great importance, it does appear to me that, if we omit this proviso, we shall not confer any benefit on the public. With regard to what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Finsbury (Mr. Wakley), I feel it to be the highest compliment that could be paid to the Government. That Honourable Member has said, that, objectionable and ridiculous as the propositions of the Ministers may be in the estimation of some Honourable Members of this House, yet still they meet with the confidence and support of the country. I think it would ill become that sense of modesty which a member of the Government ought to possess, if I were to take this very high compliment, which the Honourable Member has thus paid us, without any acknowledgment.

Mr. LEADER. — If we are to grant 1200*l*. every year, we shall save nothing either way; but if we keep the proviso as it is, no doubt the money will be granted to deserving persons only. It appeared to me, that the remark of the Honourable Member for Finsbury was not so high a compliment as the Noble Lord seemed willing to suppose. I understood the Honourable Member for Finsbury to allude to the Irish people when he said that the Government had the confidence of a portion — and the Honourable Gentleman said but a portion — of the people. There can be no doubt that the present Ministry have governed Ireland rather better than the rest of the empire, and the people of that country have some reason for supporting them. Now, I must say, that if the two great parties in this House had been differently placed, — if the Gentlemen on the other side had been on the Treasury benches, and if the Gentlemen on the Treasury benches had been on the Opposition, we should not have had to complain, as we now have, of this measure being pressed forward so indecently, and with so little desire to give sufficient time for its consideration. And, above all, I am inclined to think, that if the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth had been on this side of the House, and the present Ministers in opposition, the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department would have been heard declaiming in eloquent terms against the extravagance of the proposed Civil List; and instead of going out to divide only nineteen or twenty, as we have done, the Radicals might have gone out, by the aid of the Noble Lord, 120 strong.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I am quite aware that it would be no difficult task to find persons on whom to bestow any surplus that may be left from preceding years in addition to the 1200*l*.; but the question is, would the Government bestow it only on deserving persons? My opinion is, that they would not. I think the Government would, in one year, curtail the grants to deserving persons, in order to grant largely in the following year to their favourites, and all sorts of jobbing and corruption would result. I have hitherto voted with the majority in favour of the Bill, in the hope that her Majesty's Government would stand by its integrity. But it now appears that they are disposed to acquiesce in a proposition proceeding from the Tory side of the House. I hope, however, that the House will stand by the integrity of the Bill, and thereby rescue the Government from the effects of their own vacillating conduct. It has been said by an Honourable Gentleman opposite, that her Majesty's Ministers have not given satisfaction to the Radical portion of the House, and, at the same time, have alienated the affections of the Honourable Members on the Opposition benches. Now, I must say that, till the Honourable Gentleman made that observation, I was not aware that her Majesty's present Ministers had ever possessed the affections of the Tory side of the House.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I gave my last vote on a principle of economy; but, being disposed to place some confidence in Ministers, and not supposing that, for the mere purpose of exhausting the 1200*l*., they would grant it to persons not entitled to it, I hope the provision will be retained in its present shape.

Mr. ELLIS. — I do not think her Majesty's Ministers have been well used by Honourable Members on their own side of the House. I am not inclined to impute to the Government any improper motives in granting these pensions; and, considering the Right Honourable Baronet's proposition to be founded in justice, I shall give it my support.

Mr. HAWES. — The proviso, as it now stands, limits the sum placed at the disposal of the Crown for the purpose of granting pensions to 1200*l*. in any one year. My opinion is, that this limit is most proper, and I am sorry to see a disposition on the part of the Government to abandon it. I think that a due regard for economy in the public expenditure calls upon the House to negative the amendment of the Right Honourable Baronet; and I shall certainly give my vote in favour of the proviso in the Bill.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth whether the House is not bound to adhere to the resolutions of the committee on which the Bill was founded? Now, one of those resolutions declared that a provision should be made, enabling her Majesty to grant a sum "not exceeding in any one year 1200*l*." Ought not that to be conclusive? Why was the present motion not made in the committee? Why was it reserved for the third reading of the Bill? Her Majesty's Ministers ought not to yield to the Right Honourable Baronet's proposition, but should do justice to their own purpose. I shall certainly take the sense of the House on the question.

The House then divided: —

Ayes . . .	26
Majority . .	88

SIR R. PEEL.—I have another amendment to propose, namely, in paragraph 14. line 4., to leave out from the end of line 4. to the end of the clause, "That a list of pensions granted be laid upon the table of this House."

Several Honourable Members. — "Divide, divide!"

SIR R. PEEL. — As my proposal is objected to, I will not take up the time of the House by pressing it to a division. I, for one, am perfectly satisfied with the division which has just taken place.

The question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question," was then put, and agreed to.

Mr. CHALMERS. — I rise, pursuant to the notice which I have given, to move the omission of that proviso in the Bill which directs that a sum of 10,000*l*. per annum shall be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for home secret services. The Select Committee recommended that the item of secret service money should be withdrawn from the Civil List Bill as a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and that the amount required should be charged upon the hereditary revenues of Ireland. I think I have a right to expect the acquiescence of the House in my amendment; at all events I may fairly calculate upon the support of those Honourable Gentlemen who were members of that committee. My amendment is in paragraph 24. line 3., to leave out from the words "such payments" to the word "and," in line 27. (ten thousand pounds charged on Consolidated Fund for home secret services).

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — My Honourable Friend, who has proposed this amendment, has made allusion to the Report of a select committee of which I was a member, and in which I fully concur. That Report recommended that a particular grant should be transferred from the Civil List and voted in committee of supply. That recommendation has been acted upon. The item referred to by that Report has nothing to do with this vote of 10,000*l*. which included in this Bill. The committee recommended that a particular grant should not be comprised in the Civil List Bill, — and it is not so. The clause is framed in strict accordance with the Report. I may be allowed to call the attention of the House to the very great reductions which have been made by the Government in this item of the public expenditure. When we first came into office the annual charge for secret service was no less than 45,000*l*. We reduced it in the first year to 41,000*l*., then to 39,000*l*., then to 37,000*l*., and in the last year to 35,000*l*.

Mr. HUME. — I think the Right Honourable Gentleman is bound to tell us what is the distinction between the sum of 10,000*l*. granted in this Bill and the 35,000*l*. voted, in committee of supply, for the same purposes. In my opinion, there ought to be no distinction. I allow that reductions have taken place in the grants for home secret service since the present Ministers have been in office; but I am sorry that the reduction has not been greater.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The distinction is one that has uniformly been maintained, that while it is proper to come to Parliament to grant a general sum for secret services, it is right that Government should have at their disposal a fixed amount for these purposes, uncontrolled by a parliamentary vote. It must be quite obvious that the amount of 10,000*l.* is inadequate to the demands on the home secret service money; and while I show the reductions that we have effected in this branch of the public expenditure, and thus give the best proof of our desire to economise, I consider that it is highly necessary that a fixed sum should be provided for this purpose in the present Bill; accordingly this provision has been inserted. But we shall still have to come to the House to make up the deficiency by a vote in committee of supply; and thus, as I before stated, we are strictly following out the recommendation of the select committee, and, as I think, consulting at the same time the convenience of the House.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Divide, divide!

The House then divided: —

Ayes . . .	100

Upon the question, that this Bill do now pass, being put from the chair, —

Mr. G. F. YOUNG said: — I rise to move that this Bill do not pass. The proposed Civil List considerably exceeds that of former provisions for the support of the dignity and comfort of the Crown, and as no security is given for an efficient inquiry into the revenues arising from the duchy of Cornwall and the duchy of Lancaster, with a view to a just and equitable appropriation of them, and also as the Select Committee on the Civil List have stated in their Report that they had not the power of sending for papers or examining witnesses, the information they have received must necessarily be limited. I think the House has not sufficient evidence to justify it in giving a final sanction to such a measure.

The SPEAKER. — I do not see how I can put the question.

Mr. HUME.—I apprehend, Sir, that the only motion that the Honourable Member for Tynemouth can make at this stage of the proceeding is, that the passing of the Bill be postponed to some future day. But, after the discussion that has taken place, and the House having agreed to all its provisions, I would submit to the Honourable Member that any further postponement would be unnecessary.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG.—I am fully aware that it would be perfectly useless to divide against the passing of the Bill, and it is not my intention to do so; but as I wish to place my opinion upon record, I will move, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "the further proceedings upon this Bill be adjourned till Monday, the 5th of February next."

Upon the question being put, —

LORD J. RUSSELL said: — I should wish to understand, before the Honourable Gentleman's amendment is withdrawn, whether any other motion of a similar kind is to be made?

Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — As I am not in communication with any other Honourable Gentleman upon the subject, I cannot answer the Noble Lord's question.

Mr. HUME. — As the House has now confirmed all the details of this Bill, the only question is, whether it shall pass at once, or be adjourned to a future period? I have offered no small opposition to several items in the Bill, during its progress through the House; but I do not see any advantage that would be gained by my opposing it now; at the same time, I feel it to be my duty to call on the House to consider what they are about to pass, —a Civil List that is likely to saddle the country with enormous expenses for many years to come. If my amendment had been carried, we should have kept the Civil List within what the Bill now makes it by 12,000*l.* As it now stands, the Civil List for 1837 and 1838 will exceed that of former years by 62,000*l.* The Civil List of William IV. amounted to 510,000*l.*, including pensions, secret service, and all such matters. The support of the members of the Royal Family amounted, in addition, to 206,000*l.*, making on the whole 716,000*l.* But we are now called upon to grant for the Civil List 385,000*l.* Then there is the 8000*l.* additional to the Duchess of Kent, the 75,000*l.* allowed for pensions on the Civil List, and other items, making the aggregate amount 778,000*l.* Here we have a difference of 62,000*l.* as between the amount required last year and this year. Now I must say, that, considering the great distress that the country is labouring under, and the many complaints which we hear from all parts of it of over-taxation, for a reformed Parliament to sanction such proceedings, is to me a matter of equal regret and astonishment. I say, also, that her Majesty's Ministers have not supported their character as a liberal and economising Administration in proposing such a Civil List as the one embraced in this Bill. The Government ought to have considered the additional sum becoming payable to the Queen Dowager. I may be told, that in objecting to this extravagant waste of the public money, I am not the friend of monarchy. But I say, that it is the man who creates profusion who is the greatest enemy to royalty. History shows how dangerous extravagance has been to monarchy. It was the profligacy and extravagance of the royal family of France that led to the dethronement and destruction of a king of that country. I have in my hand a curious document stating the whole expenses of the American Government.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

I know that it is not a pleasing comparison to allude to the simple forms of a republican government, especially to those who wish the expenditure of a monarchy to be unlimited. People are, however, imperceptibly led to compare figures and to look at results; and the impressions thus created are, I think, likely to be highly injurious to monarchical government when carried on with extravagance. I find, here, that the expense of the whole of the American Government is not more than 33,600*l*. a-year, including the amount of salaries and other expenses required for maintaining the establishments of two Secretaries of State, Lords of the Treasury, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer; whereas almost 800,000*l*. a-year is expended for the maintenance of the Monarchical Government of England. We find no less a sum than 35,000*l*. voted in this country for secret service money alone, in addition to this enormous Civil List. I say, the same system of shameful extravagance is carried out in all the various departments. Look, for instance, at the establishment of the Master of the Horse, the expense of maintaining which is 27,000*l*. a-year, having been raised from 12,000*l*. a-year. 6000*l*. are expended for liveries alone, and 3000*l*. for those of the Lord Chamberlain; and I do not know how much for the department of the Lord Steward. The establishment of the Master of the Horse includes 120 servants, the liveries of each of whom cost the country 50*l*. a-year. This wasteful profusion cannot add to the comfort of the Sovereign, nor is it any addition to the dignity of her high station. It is consistent with the gaudy grandeur of the French court, not with the humble but truly dignified state of George the Third. The country has much reason to regret the bad example which was set by the immediate successor of that Monarch. The extravagance of the court of George the Fourth has ruined the country. I am sorry to see the present Ministers following in the footsteps of the Government of that day. It rested with them to advise her Majesty, and they ought to have submitted to the Queen the propriety of dispensing with all unnecessary finery; they ought to have told her that it is not gold lace that procures respect. It is a great mistake to fancy that the people of England are taken by all these expensive shows — these cocked hats and gold liveries. The conduct of the Ministers has been most impolitic and unfriendly towards a young Sovereign, in making her reign to commence with extravagance, instead of advising her to adopt a system of economy calculated to secure the respect of the people. Such extravagant expenses lead to comparisons. What would be the result if this money which we are called on to vote, not for the comfort of the Crown, but to be expended in profligate show, were divided among the poor? The amounts granted to the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, and the Master of the Horse would maintain 25,000 persons for a whole year, according to the rate at which many persons are paid for their labour in this country. And the money granted for lords and ladies in waiting would maintain 14,600 families at 8*s*. per head per week. Why should the country be called on to pay so much money for the support of ladies of the bedchamber, and grooms, and "beef-eaters," with cocked hats and fine gold liveries?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

It may be a laughing matter to those who have abundance; but when the pinching hour comes, a comparison will be made, and it will be asked, "Why is our sugar taxed, and why are all these other heavy taxes levied upon us, but to keep up this pageantry?

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and laughter.]

I know that the great majority of the House differs from me on these subjects. I am sorry for it. I will not now offer any vexatious delay to the progress of this Bill. I may be wrong. But that will be seen. The day of discontent may come, when the people will say, "Everything we eat and drink is taxed, and for what? To support a Government which gives us bad laws, and to keep up individuals from whom we have no commensurate return." I will conclude by repeating my protest against such a system of profligacy.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I have no wish to prolong this debate; but one or two observations which the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has made, I think call for some reply from me. The Honourable Gentleman has charged the Government with extravagance; — and on what ground? His argument just amounts to this — that because too much was granted at one period, therefore, too little ought to be allowed at another. With respect to keeping up the royal establishments, the people are more immediately interested in them than the Government. For, if not the people, who are the parties benefited by the keeping up of St. James's Park, the Regent's Park, and Kensington Gardens? I should like to know whether the inhabitants of this metropolis would like to be shut out from these places of favourite resort, because of the expense of maintaining them? We are asked to establish public walks throughout the country, and yet the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, who supports that proposition, turns round upon the Government, and complains of the expense incurred in maintaining those to which I have alluded. The Honourable Member has also brought forward, as a contrast, his favourite system of government, namely, that of the United States. The Honourable Gentleman has spoken largely of profuseness in the various departments in ours; but the Honourable Member might, I think, have recalled to his memory former times, when much greater expenses were incurred, and when not only the official but the private residences of the Ministers were charged to the country. Then, with respect to the official liveries worn by her Majesty's Ministers, the Honourable Member might have known that the official costume of the American Minister at this court is so nearly the same, that Mr. Stevenson might be shuffled in amongst her Majesty's attendants without having the error discovered, merely by his costume. I can understand the Honourable Member, when he says, "Look at the comparatively small expense of maintaining the American Government," — for he then puts the question on an intelligible ground; — but I, on constitutional grounds, must protest against the Honourable Member's argument, as at all applying to the government of this country. I would, however, say to the Honourable Gentleman, that if I were called upon to form a new government in a new country, my object would not be so much to form a cheap government, as the one that would be most useful and beneficial to the governed. But be the advantages of economy never so much pressed by the Honourable Gentleman, I feel that I owe allegiance to my Sovereign, and that my feelings and principles and hopes are identified with monarchy; and therefore I will never lend any support to that which, in my opinion, would tend to subvert that part of the British Constitution.

Mr. HUME. — The Right Honourable Gentleman has misunderstood me. I did not complain of the expenses incurred in keeping up the parks; they were not included in my account, and I said not one word about them. But I do not think that the Right Honourable Gentleman has answered one of my objections to the grant of 778,000*l*.

Mr. WAKLEY. — For one, I feel it my duty to state, that I consider, whatever faults may be attributed to the Ministers, on the score of extravagance, greater blame is due to the House for suffering that extravagance to pass. The Government are not so much to be condemned as those Honourable Gentlemen who profess to represent the feelings of the people; indeed, my only astonishment is, that a still larger Civil List was not proposed, seeing the temptation that was held out to the Government; for when the Honourable Member for Kilkenny proposed a reduction of 50,000*l*., we found only 19 Members, out of 200 who were in the House, voted for that reasonable proposition.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — As I am fully aware that no advantage can be gained to the constituency by pressing my amendment, I trust I shall be permitted to withdraw it.

The amendment was then, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR A. DALRYMPLE. — I wish to ask a question, — whether the arrears of pensions now due are to be paid, or are they to be submitted to the consideration of the Pension List Committee?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — It is intended that the committee shall inquire into all matters connected with the Pension List.

The Bill was then passed.

Beverley Election. — Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House that George Rennie, Esquire, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Beverley, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act. — Order for considering petition on Tuesday, the 8th day of May next, read, and discharged.

Frome Borough Election.—Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that Richard Nuth, and the other electors, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Frome, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act. — Order for considering petition on Tuesday, the 15th day of May next, read, and discharged.

Preston Election. — Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that Daniel Clinton and James Murphy, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Preston, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act. — Order for considering petition on Thursday, the 17th day of May next, read, and discharged.

Sligo County Election. — Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that Daniel Jones, Esquire, junior, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the county of Sligo, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act.

Sligo County Election. — Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that John Gallaher, and the other electors, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the county of Sligo, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act.

Portarlington Election. — Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that Joseph Lawler and Patt Gorman, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Portarlington, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act.

Limerick County Election.—Mr. Speaker also acquainted the House, that the Honourable George Eyre Massey, and the other electors, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the county of Limerick, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act.

Upon the question being proposed, that this order be discharged, —

MR. FRESHFIELD said: — I rise to state why I think this order should not be discharged. I hold in my hand a petition from the agent in this case. He states, that on the 25th of November the affidavit was sworn, and the petition handed in to the Hanaper Office; that on the 2d of December it was presented to the House; but on the petitioner presenting himself, yesterday, to the examiner, he was told that as the affidavit had been sworn before the petition was presented, the proceedings were irregular. Now, that the House can give the relief sought for in this case, I will show by a precedent which is to be found in an entry in the Journals of the House of the 10th of February, 1807, and which refers to the Penryn election. It appears that on the 16th of January, in that year, the sureties to that petition entered into their recognisances, and swore to the affidavit seventeen days before the petition was presented, and the House in that case granted its indulgence to the parties. Now the two cases are precisely in point; the only difference being, that in the Penryn petition the affidavit was sworn seventeen days, while in the Limerick case it was sworn but eight days previous to the petition being presented. Here, then, is no objection to the sufficiency of the sureties, no intention of deceiving any party. I know that the House must discharge the Order for taking the petition into consideration, unless sufficient reason be assigned to induce them to take a different course. But, under the circumstances, I have no doubt that the House will allow the petitioner time to complete his recognisance. I have used the utmost industry to find the sitting Member, or some of his connections; but I have been unsuccessful. My present object is that the petition should be printed with the Votes, and taken into consideration to-morrow.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I do not rise to make any objection to the course proposed by the Honourable Member, but merely for the purpose of proposing that, as the House has now been sitting since twelve o'clock, a short adjournment should take place. I would propose that any discussion which might arise upon this petition should be deferred, and that the House do now adjourn till eight o'clock.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I would suggest, before the House adjourns, that it would be more convenient to postpone the discussion upon this, as well as upon the other election petitions which stand upon the paper for to-day, till to-morrow.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I cannot but impute some degree of unfairness to her Majesty's Government in postponing those election petitions which are against themselves, to a time at which, in all probability, they will be discussed amidst empty benches. It is well known that many Honourable Members have already left town, and that others are upon the point of doing so. The Government, we know, can at all times make a House, and it is their duty to insure a sufficient attendance while there is any business before it. I must repeat that this attempt to delay these petitions from to-day is most unfair.

Mr. CHARLES WOOD. — I would put it to the Honourable and Gallant Member whether it is just to impute to her Majesty's Government an unfair attempt to delay the consideration of this petition, when the request for delay comes from his own side of the House?

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I was not aware that the proposition proceeded from this side of the House. The case of Limerick, indeed, is mooted, now, for the first time; but there was a case which occupied a considerable portion of last night, and in which the Government decided directly contrary to the law on the subject; and I challenge the opinion of the law officers of the Crown whether it was not so.

The SPEAKER. — I would suggest to the Honourable and Gallant Member that it is not competent for him to advert to a question which is not now before the House.

The petition of Edward Hallows Plumptre, praying for further time for completing the recognisances, so far as that fresh affidavits may be obtained from Edward Hodges Goggin and Edward Donnelly, was then brought up, and ordered to lie on the Table, and to be printed.

PRESTON ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. TOWNLEY PARKER. — The petition of Preston having been discharged in my favour, I hope I may be permitted to say one word on the subject.

The SPEAKER. — There is now no question before the House.

Mr. TOWNLEY PARKER. — I wish merely to observe, that I was prepared with evidence, both personal and upon affidavits, to show that the petitioners' sureties were not eligible; for that the petitioners, who are required to enter into their recognisances in the amount of 1000*l.* were in this case mere paupers. This I was prepared to urge and prove before the examiners; but it appears to me that no attention is paid by them to the question of the 1000*l.* security.

The SPEAKER. — The Honourable Gentleman will permit me to call his attention to the fact, that by the Act of Parliament the examiners have nothing to do with the sufficiency of the petitioner.

Mr. T. PARKER. — In that case, the provision in the Act of Parliament relating to the sureties has no business there. I, myself, have been necessarily put to a considerable expense to oppose this petition; and as the recognisances have not been perfected, I should be glad to know from the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard, whom I regard as the Solicitor General in these matters, or from any other Honourable Member, how I am to be reimbursed?

DUDLEY ELECTION PETITION.

The SPEAKER. — It may, perhaps, be convenient that I should now call the attention of the House to those cases of election petitions upon which questions have arisen. The first case is that of the borough of Dudley. Last night, the House extended the time for the petitioner to renew the recognisances of his sureties: to that extent, I conceive the resolution of the House to have been limited; but it appears that the petitioner, who was not included in that resolution, has omitted to complete his own recognisance in time; and I understand that, to-night, a petition is to be presented on behalf of the petitioner, praying that the benefit of the decision of last night may be extended to himself. I feel bound to state my own impression that the resolution of last night does not apply to the petitioner. It is, however, for the House to deal with the matter as it shall think fit.

Mr. PRYME. — I will now ask leave to present a petition from William Meryweather, Esquire. The petitioner states that the House, yesterday, granted leave to enlarge the time for the sureties to enter into recognisances; and that the petitioner at the time believed that the indulgence was also granted to him, and accordingly did not enter into his recognisances yesterday, which was the last day open for doing so. He prays that the indulgence of the House may also be extended to him, and that further time may be allowed. I would suggest the propriety of allowing the petitioner the extension of one day to enable him to complete his personal recognisance.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE. — It appears to me that the petitioner, Mr. Meryweather, has been most lax in all his proceedings. First, he was informal in putting in the name of his brother as one of his sureties, and now he has been guilty of a laches, in not putting in securities for himself. I must say that this is not a case which the House ought, for one moment, to tolerate. From countenancing these repeated demands for enlarging the time within which parties are required to comply with the rules of the House, a most serious inconvenience must inevitably arise. I am satisfied the House will not do its duty if it do not crush, or at least discountenance, in this instance, an attempt on the part of the petitioner to avoid the strict provisions of the law.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I think the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer has made use of a most appropriate word—"crush,"—for anything more like crushing I never heard of than this. The House were satisfied, last night, that an error had been committed, and they accordingly enlarged the time for entering their recognisances, in order to enable the parties to correct that error. The language of the resolution of last night was, in general terms, that the time for putting in the recognisances should be enlarged; the inference from those words was, that the time for effecting all the proceedings connected with the petition should be enlarged. Can a fairer case be imagined than this? There is no question raised as to the petitioner's sufficiency; and he is here, ready to state, at the bar, that he understood the resolution of the House to apply to himself as well as the sureties.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — No question was raised about the petitioner, at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — The resolution in the Pontefract case extended the indulgence to all the parties; and the natural inference was, that it did so in this case.

The SPEAKER. — On reference to the votes of the House, it will be seen that in the Pontefract case, to which the Honourable and Learned Member has referred, the original proposition for an extension of time was not confined to the sureties only, but embraced all parties. The petitioner in the Pontefract case had that indulgence, but the same indulgence has certainly not been extended to the petitioner in the present case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — If the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite had been present when the Dudley case was last under discussion, he would have heard me contend that the same order ought to be made with respect to it as that which the House had pronounced in the Pontefract case; and it was but natural that the petitioner should have conceived the same rule would be applied to both cases. The House must not forget that there is here no attempt at concealment, but an error of form only has been committed. Upon the question of discharging the order for the consideration of this petition, it is certainly competent for the House to make any other order that it may deem fit; and I think this indulgence ought to be granted.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I understood that the House had met at an early hour this morning for the purpose of proceeding with the Civil List; and that the sitting would then be adjourned for a short period for the convenience of the Chair, and of the House generally. I had hoped, therefore, that the House would have consented to the suggestion of my Noble Friend (Lord John Russell), and have adjourned their proceedings till eight o'clock, when the discussion of these petitions might be resumed. This arrangement will be no surprise to any parties, as the election petition questions would then, of course, take precedence.

The SPEAKER. — Having now officially made my communication to the House with regard to these election petitions, it only remains for me to refer to the petitions from the county of Sligo and from the borough of Portarlington. In each of these cases the same objection as to the recognisance not being entered into, in conformity with the Act of Parliament, exists. I think that I should not be doing my duty to the House if I did not state a circumstance which has necessarily come under my knowledge with respect to the Carrickfergus petition. It appears that in the cases of Sligo, Carrickfergus, and Portarlington, the same party was concerned for all the petitioners. That person came to my secretary and produced two recognisances; and on being examined, they were both found to be objectionable in precisely the same respect. My secretary stated to the agent that he conceived the recognisances could not be held to be sufficient, upon which the party appearing drew from his pocket other recognisances, and the whole have been brought under my official cognisance. On examining them I found that the whole of these recognisances had been entered into at the same time, by the same parties, and before the same magistrate, whose signature is extremely remarkable. Now, these circumstances having come to my official knowledge, I felt bound to communicate them to the House, to whom it is open to inquire, through the agent at the bar, into the circumstances attending the transaction, if it shall so think fit.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — Sir, the House must feel deeply indebted to you for the communication which you have just made.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If I were now to move an adjournment till eight o'clock, there might at that hour be a difficulty in making a House. I shall not make that motion, it being understood that, though the Speaker will now vacate the chair, it will be resumed by the Right Honourable Gentleman at the hour I have mentioned.

The House being informed that it was the intention of the respective parties in the cases of Dudley, Sligo county, Limerick county, and Portarlington election petitions, to apply to the House for further time for entering into their recognisances, the consideration of the same was deferred.

BRITISH LEGION.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — Sir, before you leave the chair, there is a question which, upon the grounds of common humanity, I wish to put to the Noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department. I wish to be informed whether the Noble Lord has heard anything of a statement published in the newspapers as to an order having been signed by the Spanish Minister of War by which the officers and men of the British Legion were compelled to embark for England? There is also published an order, signed by Brigadier-General O'Connell, in command of the Legion, in which he states, that in consequence of the order of the Spanish authorities, the Legion was disembodied, and must lay down their arms. They have done so; and since then it appears that the Legion are in a state of great suffering and danger. Now, I wish to know from the Noble Lord, whether any and what steps have been taken in order that these unfortunate men may be brought home to their own country?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I am informed, but not officially, that in consequence of some difference of opinion between General O'Connell, commanding the British troops, and General O'Donnell, commanding the Spanish troops at St. Sabastian, the infantry legion have given up their arms, and are no longer considered as being soldiers in the Spanish service. If that be so, of course they must be brought home; and I can assure the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer that no time, in that case, will be lost in taking steps for bringing the men home to this country.

RUSSIA.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I will take this opportunity of giving notice that shortly after the recess I propose to call the attention of the House to the conduct pursued by the Russian Government in regard to the treaty of London; and also with respect to the commercial relations of this country in the Black Sea and on the Circassian coast.

SLAVE COMPENSATION BILL.

Read a third time, and passed.

House adjourned till eight o'clock.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HUME brought up the Report on the

CONTROVERTED ELECTION FEES COMMITTEE;

and power was given to the said Committee to call for persons, papers, and records.

PONTEFRACT ELECTION.

On the motion of Mr. AGLIONBY, the Order of the Day was read for resuming the adjourned proceedings on the petition of James Coppock (presented the 16th of December), and the same were resumed accordingly.

The examination of the witness was then proceeded with.

By the SPEAKER. — My name is J. Florence. I am a solicitor. I have occasionally acted as a parliamentary agent.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Will you state to the House what is your position in the case of this petition?

The SPEAKER. — The witness must speak out, and address himself to the Chair.

The Witness.— I think that the history of my giving in the sureties in that case is this: — Mr. Moss called on me at my House, without, however, my having sent for him. I did not send to him, but he sent to and called upon me, and stated that he wished me to allow my name to be used as that of the agent in this case. He said that the reason why he wished me to act as the agent was, that he himself had been a candidate for the borough of Pontefract. I don't think he said that the fact of having been a candidate for the borough disqualified him from acting as an agent in the business of this petition, but he said that he must decline acting as agent from a motive of delicacy. I did comply with his request to act for him as agent, and I accompanied him to the Clerk of the Recognisances where I gave in my name as agent for the petition, and signed my name as such. I do not know whether or not this mode of proceeding was the practice of his office. No other person accompanied me to the office of the Clerk of Recognisances, but Mr. Moss did.

Did Mr. Moss accompany you as an agent? — He went with me.

Did he cause any other person to act as an agent, or did he himself take any steps in that character when he accompanied you? — No; nor did he act in the office as if he were the agent.

Are you aware of any other case in which has Moss acted as a parliamentary agent ostensibly? — I am not.

Examined by

SIR. T. FREMANTLE. — Whom did you understand to be the paymaster in this case? — Mr. Gompertz.

Had you any instructions from that party to act as agent for him? — No; I had not.

From whom did you receive, then, your instructions? — From Mr. Moss.

Did your instructions from Mr. Moss go to any greater extent in this matter than to act as his agent in this matter? — Certainly not; that was the whole of the part I took in the business when the names of the sureties were put in.

Have you had any authority from Mr. Moss to act as his agent, generally, in matters of parliamentary business? — No; but in one or two instances Mr. Moss had applied to me for advice and assistance.

Have you come to any arrangement with Moss for rendering him assistance in these matters of parliamentary business? — Generally, perhaps, we have; but no particular terms have been settled between us.

Was it, in short, the understanding, that you agreed to act for him in these affairs? — Generally speaking, it may have been so, certainly. I had, in point of fact, been engaged, previously, pretty much in parliamentary business of this nature, for several individuals of the greatest respectability.

By an HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Are you aware, Mr. Florence, what is the nature of that business usually designated by the name "parliamentary business?" — I am; I apprehend that I am very conversant with that business.

Now, do you think yourself the agent in this affair? — I do.

Then, I ask, whether you have considered yourself to be the agent for conducting this petition, or whether Mr. Moss is really the agent for that purpose? — If you ask me for an answer, I shall give it distinctly as matter of opinion. I beg to say, that I was induced to comply with Mr. Moss's request, because I believed him to be a person of respectability. I consider that, having given in my own name as agent for the petitioner, until, by some means or other, that agency is repudiated by my principal, I am still acting as agent in this matter.

But what, if you have no instructions from the petitioner, can you consider him as your principal? — Then I consider that I am employed by Mr. Moss; that I am, in short, acting with him as agent.

Examined by

Mr. R. STEUART. — I gave in the names of the sureties for this petition. I consider that I was employed by, and acting for, Mr. Moss. His authority has not, at any time, been withdrawn.

By an HONOURABLE MEMBER. — To whom do you look for payment? — To Mr. Moss.

On this individual occasion only, or have you ever been employed by him before? — On this occasion, by Mr. Moss.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Having put one or two questions before in this case, I wish to put one other, advisedly. I do not mean to be so vague and general as I was last night. I put the question, arising distinctly out of some of the previous interrogatories suggested by other Honourable Members. I do not mean that this examination should be carried on without getting at some information as to the actual parties to the prosecution of this petition. The witness says that there are two parties for whom he acts in conjunction with Moss; that is to say, that he is, directly or indirectly, employed, by Moss himself, for Moss and Mr. Gompertz. When the question is put to him, — "Do you look to Moss for payment?" I have a right to put the further question to him, — "On what ground he does so?"

The witness was then recalled.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Are you sufficiently acquainted with that person to be justified in looking to Mr. Gompertz for payment?

Mr. GODSON. — I object to that question.

The witness, by order, again withdrew.

Mr. GODSON. — I move that that question be again read.

Then the short-hand writer, by direction of Mr. Speaker, read the last question from his notes.

Mr. GODSON. — When my Honourable and Learned Friend put that question to the witness, as to whom he looked for payment, I contend that he had already received a sufficient answer in the statement, that witness looked to Mr. Moss.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Sir, I must, undoubtedly, insist upon my right to put the last question I suggested, which, in fact, amounts to this: — Why is it that the witness looks to Mr. Moss for payment, instead of Mr. Gompertz?

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I certainly object to the question. One thing is very certain: if the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Cockermouth imagines that he has any right to go into these matters, which I really apprehend that no other Member but himself would be disposed to investigate, his object can only be to extract from the witness a certain piece of information, of which I will at once make him a present, namely, that Mr. Gompertz is, at this moment, a prisoner in the rules of the Queen's Bench for 16,000*l.*; and, therefore, he is welcome to the admission that the witness has not quite so good a chance of finding him a competent paymaster as he has of finding one in Mr. Moss.

Mr. GODSON — It may be well to recal the attention of the House to the consideration of what the question is that is now before us. The question which we were debating the other night (I should say at two o'clock in the morning) was, — whether or not there was a fraud or defect in the designation of an individual, who had been vouched as a surety on an election petition, in describing him as of "Regent's Park, gentleman;" and omitting his description of "boot and shoe maker," in "the Strand." Now, that is the real issue which, upon the adjourned debate, we have to try. I say that the long examination of these witnesses, upon which we have been engaged to-night, has been altogether irrelevant to that issue. The simple question, in any case, is — whether the description of Mr. Proctor had, or had not, been fraudulently given in? I submit that the examination which has already occupied so much of our time this evening, is totally beside the point which, as jurymen —as well as judges,—we have to try. As I understand the matter, the decision of Friday night last was to stand good, unless my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Aglionby) should be enabled to prove, to the satisfaction of the House, that fraud was intended in the misdescription in question. In that proof, I cannot help thinking that, notwithstanding the mode in which the evidence of the witness, Moss, was given, he must feel, himself, that he has entirely failed.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I have one question to put. Was Mr. Moss, or Mr. Florence, the real agent in this case: — and for whom?

Mr. AGLIONBY. — That is the question to which I still wait for an answer.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — That is a question which, after the answers that have been already given, I think we have no power to put. It has nothing to do with the issue (just now so accurately stated) that we have to try.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I have to apôlogise to the House for putting a question that is not a relevant one, if that really be so.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I will not be induced to accept the terms offered on the other side. The witness Moss was allowed, last night, to withdraw when I had one or two stringent questions to address to him. I desire to put this very question, which has been renewed by my Honourable Friend near me, from the chair.

The SPEAKER. — Let the witness be recalled.

The witness was again placed at the bar, and examined by

Mr. GRIMSDITCH. — It is frequently the practice for one solicitor to act, at common law, for another; and in such cases the agent of the solicitor first employed is considered as the agent of that solicitor's principal.

[Loud cries of "Question, question!"]

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I will not be treated in this way. I will not allow Honourable Members to suppose that I am to be put down in this manner. I will not be placed in the position of a Member examining witnesses for some party purpose. The witnesses are here, on my motion, as an independent Member dealing with a petition praying for leave to amend the description of a party vouched as a surety, in a case that I think surrounded with circumstances of suspicion.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I can assure the Honourable and Learned Member for Cockermouth, that I, also, am very anxious to allow this House to take its proper course. The position occupied by Mr. Florence is, as I understand it, the matter which we are now discussing. He says, that he, in point of fact, is the parliamentary agent in this case, and that Mr. Moss is not. Moss, on the other hand, has stated of himself that he is the parliamentary agent. Therefore, it amounts to this — that Mr. Florence charges Moss with saying that which is not the fact.

On the motion of Mr. AGLIONBY, Mr. John Benbow was called in, and appeared at the bar. (Examined by various Members.) He stated that he was nearly eighty years of age, had been formerly a solicitor, and had been actively engaged in that capacity for a very great number of years, but was now occupied in no business or profession whatever.

Do you know Mr. Moss? — With the permission of the House I will now state to it what I know of Mr. Moss, through whom I came to be possessed of any knowledge of this petition. About a month ago, from this time, Mr. Moss called on me, at my house in Mecklenburgh Square, and asked me whether I wished to go into Parliament? I told him, certainly not; but that I had a friend who had recently applied to me to assist him in such an object, — a gentleman who was very highly respectable, and well qualified, and who, indeed, had formerly been a Member of this House. Mr. Moss then proceeded to represent to me the state of parties in the borough of Pontefract, and other circumstances connected with the probable prospects of the electors for that place; and it certainly did appear to me, from what he so stated, that he had a very probable chance of success in a petition against the sitting Member (Mr. Massey Stanley). I should say that that conclusion was founded on papers and documents which he had received from the country. I said to him, I believe, "There does appear to me to be a case — a very strong case, in your favour. But your business is, to go down to Pontefract, and investigate the business on the spot; and when you come back, I shall be very glad to see you on the affair. Perhaps there may be some evidence wanted, and on the spot you will probably be able to obtain it." On the 30th of November, he came to me again, and told me he was going to Pontefract. I replied to him, "that he was doing perfectly right," and he said that he would take down a petition, and endeavour to get it signed by two of the electors. This, I think, was on the 30th of November. The last day for presenting petitions, as I best recollect, was on the Monday following. This interview took place on the Saturday, at night. He told me, on the Tuesday afterwards, that he expected to be asked for sureties, observing that he had presented his petition the day before, namely, Monday. I went to my friend Mr. Beavan, in Sackville Street, and, telling him that I thought I should want some sureties to an election petition, I asked him whether he would consent to be one of them? I would not tell him for what election; — but, to my question, he said, "Yes, he would." "And, perhaps," I added, "you can procure me another?" He replied, "Yes." A few days afterwards, Mr. Moss came to me for the sureties; he said that his principal was Mr. Gompertz. I hesitated for some time; but, at length, he, Mr. Moss, persuaded me to give him the paper with the names of the sureties. I did expect that similar petitions would be presented to the House, and I am much surprised that this has not been the case.

[Loud cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"]

The SPEAKER.—I am sure the House will feel that any expressions of feeling where it is so important to get at the facts and the truth, would be altogether ill-timed and inexpedient.

The witness examined by—

SIR H. VERNEY. — Witness has been a solicitor for thirty-six years, and was one of the executors of the late Lord Dudley.

By Mr. PRYME. — Witness did live at Stone's Buildings, Lincoln's Inn.

By Mr. AGLIONBY. — Witness does not know Mr. Proctor at all. Witness did not conduct the Canterbury election petition. He was not the agent concerned for it, and, professionally speaking, had nothing to do with it. He had no knowledge of Mr. Proctor. He paid no attention to the description given of Mr. Proctor in the Canterbury petition, and had not seen his name until it was given in as a surety. He does not know, exactly, how Mr. Proctor was described, but thinks it was as of the Regent's Park. How he was designated on the paper handed to him by Mr. Beavan, he has no distinct remembrance, but believes it was Mr. Proctor, gentleman, of No. 9. some street in Regent's Park.

By Mr. JERVIS. — Witness knows, from Mr. Beavan's own statement, that he, Mr. Beavan, was the agent for the Canterbury petition.

By Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — Witness was not, directly or indirectly, employed in conducting the Canterbury petition.

By Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — Witness knew of giving in his name together with that of Mr. Proctor. He knew that Mr. Beavan was the agent of the Canterbury petition case. "As to being at all concerned in the Canterbury case, I think I have already said that there are some persons who do me the honour to consult me in particular cases. I may have been consulted, in this way, upon the Canterbury petition, and in this way I may have given an opinion upon it; but that is all I have had to do with the matter. I may have been concerned in one or two communications upon it."

Do you know anything more about it?

The witness was then directed to withdraw.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I object to that question, it has always been held, in this House, that professional communications are sacred and inviolable.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—I waive that question.

The next witness was called in, Mr. John Phillips Beavan, and examined by Mr. AGLIONBY. —I am a solicitor, residing in Sackville Street, Piccadilly. I was applied to by Mr. Benbow to become one of the sureties on an election petition. When first so applied to by him, he did not tell me upon what election petition. He said, "I would rather not tell you; but if you will become a surety I shall be obliged to you, without, for the present, naming the place. A few days afterwards, I happened to meet him again, near his own house, when he said that the matter about which he had spoken to me would immediately come on. I then agreed to become a surety, and for this purpose I gave to him my own name, together with that of Mr. Proctor. I described Mr. Proctor, to the best of my belief — that is to say, Mr. W. Proctor, of South Bank, Regent's Park, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman.

By Mr. COURTENAY. — I knew he had lived there for at least nine years. He does not carry on any business at his house in South Bank. He lives on his own property. I happen to have been acquainted with him for the last ten years. I knew him when he purchased that residence. It is a private villa, standing in its own grounds.

By an HONOURABLE MEMBER.—I had not Proctor's assent to become a surety, under this petition, when I gave in his name. I knew I had only to put the case to him, upon my own word and responsibility, to get him to give his assent. I had previously given in his name, also, as a surety in the case of the Canterbury petition. I believe I then described Mr. Proctor as a bootmaker, and also of South Bank, Regent's Park. The designation I gave of him in the case now before the House was written on a scrap of paper, in a very great hurry. Whether I had previously written to and communicated with him on the subject of the Canterbury petition I cannot say; but I think I had. As to my clerk, I cannot undertake to say whether or not I gave him any particular instructions as to the designation which ought to be given to Mr. Proctor, in the case of the present petition.

By Mr. AGLIONBY. — When I first knew that my name and that of my friend had been given in as sureties on behalf of Mr. Gompertz's petition, I was certainly astonished.

By Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I did give Mr. Benbow a certain roving commission to put my name down as surety for any petition in respect of which he might think fit to use it for that purpose. It was my respect for Mr. Benbow's high character that induced me to do this to oblige him. I never saw Mr. Gompertz till this evening. I knew nothing of him. I never stipulated for any remuneration from Mr. Benbow for allowing him to use my name in the way I have mentioned. I only stipulated that I would not be a surety in the case of the Wolverhampton petition. Mr. Benbow never told me, at any of these times, that Mr. Gompertz was interested in this petition.

By Mr. COURTENAY. — The designation I gave of Mr. Proctor was undoubtedly such as would find him. As a man of property, so long resident and so well known in that neighbourhood, there could be no difficulty in finding him.

By Mr. MACLEAN. — I gave in Mr. Proctor's name as a surety, without his permission; but I mentioned the fact shortly afterwards, and no objection was taken by him to what I had done.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — Would you have given in his name if you had known that Mr. Gompertz was the petitioner?

Mr. MACLEAN. — I object to that question.

Witness, by order, withdrew.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I object to the question, perceiving the case which the Honourable Gentleman will attempt to raise upon it.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I think my question is one of great importance. It goes to try the issue, whether there are not other parties, besides these now before us, who have not yet appeared. The witness has been asked whether he would have given his name had he known the condition in which Mr. Gompertz, the petitioner in this case, then was? I ask, whether any man, or the witness himself, with the knowledge of that circumstance, would have considered this petition a bonâ fide one? My question, I repeat, is very essential.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I have not the most remote objection to the Honourable Gentleman's following out this examination to any length he likes. He may go on with it, if he pleases, till to-morrow morning; but, I beg to observe, that he can only examine as to facts, not as to opinions. No witness can undertake to say what frame of mind he would have been in under certain circumstances.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I wish to know the reason which would have induced the witness to change his opinion of the party, for whom he has become a surety?

Mr. VILLIERS STUART. — This man is in the situation of a person who has been deceived. He gave his name for a surety, not knowing at the time that Mr. Gompertz was a prisoner in the rules of the Queen's Bench. It is a fair question, therefore, whether, had he known that fact, he would have given his consent to become such surety?

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — The present stage of the discussion does not at all regard the application of Mr. Benbow to Mr. Beavan, nor whether Mr. Beavan would have become a surety had he been aware of certain facts in the case. The question really is, whether a description which has been applied to another individual, who is also a surety in this matter, was a fraudulent one, or not? It is perfectly clear, so far as the examination has gone, that the last witness wrote on a scrap of paper the name of this individual, and that he gave the paper to his clerk. He had put in Mr. Proctor's name as a surety for the Canterbury petition also. Now, from all we have heard, it is pretty evident that if, indeed, there were any essential difference between the descriptions of the same surety in the two cases respectively, that difference might vitiate the recognisances in the Canterbury case, but could not affect the recognisances in this.

The LORD ADVOCATE. — I apprehend that it is no good objection to a question, that a witness may not be prepared to answer it. Where there is a reasonable suspicion of collusion or fraud, such questions may be necessary, in order to get at a variety of facts illustrative of the case. It seems to me, therefore, quite fair to ask this witness, whether he would have become surety for Gompertz, had he known the circumstances in which that gentleman was then involved?

An Honourable Member. — If Gentlemen on the other side are disposed to divide on this question, I must vote against it. My Honourable Friend near me has said, that we have been engaged for a long time in an examination as to a mere matter of opinion. That may be all very true, as to the matter of opinion; but I object to the course we have taken, for this speeial reason, that no assignment for perjury can lie upon the answer to such a question.

The question was again proposed by Mr. STANLEY.

Mr. GODSON. — I rise to order. The Honourable Gentleman is about to put a question which can elicit nothing but the mere assertion of an opinion.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I, also, rise to order; and I wish to know how the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, who spoke last, can possibly anticipate what it is that my Honourable Friend (Mr. Stanley) is going to ask the witness.

The SPEAKER. — The more correct course would be to hear the question itself put again to the witness.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — With the leave of the House, I will put it differently.

The witness, J. P. Beavan, was again called in.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — Do you know Mr. Gompertz? — I know nothing of him; I never saw him till this evening.

Do I understand you to say that you would not have allowed your name to be put in as one of the sureties for the petitioner, had you been aware of his circumstances at the time?

Mr. GODSON. — I object to that question.

The witness was ordered to withdraw.

Mr. GODSON. — It is clear that the Honourable Gentleman cannot put the question. Besides, it is sufficiently answered by the fact which the House has already heard from the witness, — that Mr. Benbow was not to give in the witness's name, as a surety to any petitions, except as to those in which both or either of them were concerned.

The previous question and answer, on the motion of an Honourable Member, were then read by the short-hand writer, namely, "Did you give Mr. Benbow a roving commission, to put your name to any petition he pleased? — I did, most distinctly. I mean as to petitions where interests of mine or his were concerned. I did make that exception in communicating with Mr Benbow on the subject."

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I must confess that, from any thing which the short-hand writer has read, I can see nothing to justify the question of the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Stanley).

Mr. MACLEAN. — The case is this. The witness gave what he calls a roving commission to Mr Benbow, to put his name as a surety to any petition in respect of which Mr. Benbow might think proper to do so. Subsequently the witness was asked, "Would he give his permission to have his name used as a surety in any case where Mr. Gompertz had been concerned as a candidate?" He told you, certainly not.

Witness recalled, and examined by various HONOURABLE MEMBERS.

He knew that Mr. Benbow had been a candidate at Wolverhampton, at the last election; and it occurred to him that Mr. Benbow had an intention of presenting a petition against the return in that case. Witness had the honour of an acquaintance with the Member actually returned for that borough, and therefore, did not choose to interfere in the matter.

By Mr. ROBERT STEUART. — Did you give Mr. Benbow permission to put your name as surety to any other petition than those in which yourself or Mr. Benbow were concerned? — Oh, certainly.

Why, that is contrary to the answer you gave before on this point.

(The short-hand writer read the question and answer referred to by Mr. Steuart.)

Mr. R. STEUART. — Explain this descrepancy, if you please. — That answer is the substance of what I meant to say.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I understand you, witness, to say, that you had such confidence in Mr. Benbow's responsibility, that you were willing to allow him to put your name in, as a surety for any petition, except that of Wolverhampton; and this you did without reference either to Mr. Gompertz, the petitioner, or to Mr. Proctor, the other surety? — Exactly so. It made no difference to me whether Mr. Roberts, or any other individual was the petitioner in any case in which Mr. Benbow applied to me. I had that confidence in Mr. Benbow, that I would have justified in any business connected with him, to any amount.

The witness was then directed to withdraw.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I do not know whether Mr. Proctor should be called in, or not; but as Honourable Gentlemen on the other side appear to wish to see more of him, perhaps it will be better to call him at once; and I therefore will move accordingly.

Mr. Proctor was therefore called in, and examined.

Witness. My name is William Proctor. I reside in South Bank, Regent's Park. I carry on the business of a boot and shoe maker in the Strand.

By SIR H. HARDINGE. — I am aware that I am bound in the penalty of 500l. in each case, or petition; but I should not experience the slightest possible difficulty in being bound by that responsibility.

By SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I have known Mr. Beavan for many years, and I never knew a more honourable man.

By Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I did not consider whether I should have to pay the 500*l.* if the petition should fail through Mr. Beavan.

By various Honourable Members. — The house that I live in, in South Bank, Regent's Park, I have resided in for the last nine years. It is my own property. I possess property also in Worcestershire; namely, a freehold. I have a house also in the Strand, but that I only rent. My name is Proctor, not Procter. I was a surety in the Canterbury as well as in this Pontefract case. I did receive a letter from Mr.. Beavan, stating that he wished me to become surety to the amount of 500*l.*, in the case of an election petition. I believe that my name had been inserted as one of the sureties before I received that letter. I cannot say, whether that letter from Mr. Beavan related to the Pontefract or to the Canterbury case.

On the motion of Mr. AGLIONBY, this letter was then read by the clerk; but it did not state the name of the case in which the witness was requested to become surety.

By Mr. HARVEY. — If I had been asked by Mr. Beavan to be surety in two cases, to the amount of 500l. each, I would have consented to his request. I am known in Exeter Street in the Strand, to have a house at South Bank, Regent's Park; and at South Bank, Regent's Park, I am known to be a shoemaker at Exeter Street in the Strand.

By Mr T. DUNCOMBE. — I allowed Mr. Beavan to use my name; of my own knowledge, however, I cannot say who gave my name in.

By Mr. MACLEAN. — Since I received the letter which has just been read, I have shown it to Mr. Stanley, the Member for Cheshire. He was speaking to me at his own house about my being a surety, and I told him that I had become so, at Mr. Beavan's request. I think it was about Saturday last when Mr. Stanley sent for me. I did not go to him voluntarily, or of my own accord. I did not know why I was going to Mr. Stanley's house. I was sent for.

How did you first know Mr. Stanley? — I have known Mr. Stanley before, because I am his bootmaker.

Did Mr. Stanley send for you on this occasion, then, to measure him for a pair of boots? — No, no.

On what business did you go to Mr. Stanley's house? — I did not know. I was sent for.

Did you tell Mr. Stanley you were a surety in this case? — I did.

But how did that happen? — I did not know when I went to Mr. Stanley's house, that he wished to speak with me on this matter. I happened to have the letter with me, because it was in my pocket-book, which I always carry. I showed him the letter, and told him, that it was at the request of Mr. Beavan I had become security. I produced that letter voluntarily.

Did you take your letter away with you? — I did.

Did Mr. Stanley take a copy of it? — I believe he did.

Do you know why Mr. Stanley copied that letter? — No; I do not. I did not know the business about which I had come to Mr. Stanley's.

Who introduced the subject of sureties?

The witness was then ordered to withdraw on the motion of Mr. LEADER, who said: — I protest against that question as irregular. My only object in moving that the witness do withdraw was, to interrupt a course of examination which, I think, is bringing the House into contempt. I have no interest whatever in this case. If Honourable Gentleman on the other side of the House can make out a good case against these, or any other petitioners, I shall vote with them; but, in the mean time, the examination conducted by the Honourable and Learned Member for Oxford has been altogether so irrelevant, that it seems as if it was intended to bring us before the country as persons desirous of amusing themselves with the repetition of trivial conversations that may have passed in perfect confidence between Members of this House and other individuals who may happen to be brought to its bar.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I certainly must object to this witness being ordered to withdraw one moment sooner than may be agreeable to the Honourable and Learned Member for Oxford, who, on proceeding a little further, will satisfy himself, I am confident, that he has discovered a mare's nest.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I think that observation was quite uncalled for. I say, I have found no " mare's nest."

[Laughter.]

But that is a production which will be discovered on the other side of the House. I conceive I was fully justified in the course of examination I adopted, and that it was by no means irrelevant. I do not know Mr. Proctor; I heard him speak of Mr. Stanley; and I inquired if it was the Member for Cheshire? There is this evidence, then, of what is termed a " mare's nest," that an individual known to be a surety in an election petition, had this interview with the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury — told the House that he was sent for by that Honourable Gentleman — that he knew not for what — that this letter was produced, and that a copy of it was taken. Now, I think, it is for the Honourable Member opposite himself to say what was the object of this interview with the bootmaker, and why did he copy the letter?

Mr. JERVIS. — It may be a difficult matter to make out this question one of a moral fraud. The question we have to consider, undoubtedly, is, whether Mr. Proctor's name was put in, in this case, for purposes of fraud. Let it be remembered, that time is the essential ingredient in all these cases of election petitions; and can it signify at all, as to time, whether or not some days after the witnesses name was given in as a surety, and long before he was called on to appear at this bar, he should have produced this letter to an Honourable Member of this House, to which the Honourable and Learned Member attaches so much importance? This letter was in the witness's pocket-book. That book, he says, he had with him, according to his usual custom. He waits upon his customer, the Under Secretary for the Treasury. That Honourable Gentleman asks him how it happens that his name has been given in, as surety in two cases of election petitions? The witness explains the nature of Mr. Beavan's letter to him, and the subject having thus been mentioned, he produces that letter, of which the Honourable Member for Cheshire naturally takes a copy.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — If any Honourable Gentleman conceives that any information which he may wish to derive in this case can be elicited from Mr. Proctor, I hope he will allow me to second the motion for the recal of that witness.

Mr. LEADER. — To do anything like justice to the Honourable and Learned Member for Oxford, and to show the House what is the course of examination into which he is dragging them, it would be necessary for the short-hand writer to read the last eight or nine questions.

Mr. ORMSBY GORE. — I am not surprised that the Honourable Member for Cheshire should be desirous to have the witness recalled. From the tenour of the examinations which have taken place, considerable doubt does seem to arise as to what may have been the real object of this interview between the Honourable Under Secretary for the Treasury and the bootmaker; and still more so as regards the fact of the Honourable Gentleman's so " naturally " — as a Learned Member considers it — taking a copy of a letter addressed to his bootmaker, in this case. The Honourable Member for Cheshire (Mr. Stanley) ought to feel most anxious to have the witness recalled; or, if there be any objection to that course, let the Honourable Gentleman, himself, state to the House what the motive and the object of his conduct on the occasion in question really were.

Mr. HARVEY. — As I take it, this witness has been challenged upon two grounds; namely, that he is a party incompetent to become a surety, either by reason of pecuniary incompetency, or by fraud occasioned by some misdescription of his identity. There may be one or both of these ingredients in the case. The question of pecuniary incompetency has been pretty well abandoned; for not a tittle of evidence has been adduced to support it. With regard to the inadequate description, I think it is impossible to attribute anything like fraud in the present instance. Can any one doubt, from the evidence of this witness himself, that there can have been no attempt at fraudulent misrepresentation? He has been a respectable tradesman in the Strand for the last eighteen years; and in that neighbourhood, as the Honourable Member for Cockermouth has elicited in his own examination of the witness, the witness is known to possess a private house at South Bank in the Regent's Park.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I rise to order. The question before the House is, whether a certain question which has been propounded should be put to the witness? I submit that my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Southwark is going into the statement of another part of the case, which is totally irrelevant to the matter in hand.

Mr. HARVEY. — I humbly beg pardon of the House; but I really think that I am as much in order as those Honourable and Learned Gentlemen who have been eloquent and diffusive, for two evenings together, on this subject. I was going on to say that this ground of non-description altogether fails. On the other hand, there are some points in the case not without their significance. Here is one gentleman, at least, whom it is amusing to find expressing his astonishment on discovering that his bootmaker is actually a surety for two election petitions. He is so astonished that he is induced to send for that individual; and I can imagine the Honourable Under Secretary to the Treasury saying to the witness, — "Why Proctor, how is this? I understand you are surety to some election petitions. Do you know what you are about? Are you confident in your friend? You ought to be upon your guard. Are you aware that your liability is for 500*l.* in each case?" Why, I can imagine Mr. Proctor, — who, from what I have witnessed of him, seems to be a very straightforward, plain-dealing man, — I can imagine Mr. Proctor saying to the Honourable Member for Cheshire, — "God bless you, Sir, where Mr. Beavan is concerned, I would as soon give my security for 500*l.* as I would take your order for five pair of boots." And yet, here is the Senate of England squabbling, for hours together, about the testimony of this boot-closer; the one party contending that he has put his foot into his own case, the other that he has done nothing of the sort.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE. — I am much inclined to agree with the Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark, and also with the Honourable Member for Westminster, that the character of this House is very little consulted by such proceedings. But, in vindication of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Oxford, I must say that, considering the discussion which took place on Friday or Saturday last, and that, on Saturday, this person (Mr. Proctor) had had an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury, who took a copy of Beavan's letter to him, — and that, on the very same day, a petition was presented to rescind the decision of this House on Friday, — I do think that my Honourable and Learned Friend was amply justified in pushing the inquiry to the extent that he did. At the same time, I, for my part, am perfectly satisfied that the Honourable Member for Cheshire acted from no other than honourable motives, and therefore it seems now unnecessary to take any further notice of the circumstance. On the whole, I do not think that there can be the slightest doubt of the competency of Mr. Proctor as a surety. At all events, the House is now in a condition to come to a determination on the evidence, and to close the discussion, without further delay.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Then, if no other Honourable Gentleman means to call further witnesses, the first thing is, to order that the witnesses in attendance be discharged; and the next thing is, to come to a decision on the original question.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I do not wish to oppose the motion; but, in point of form, I object to the discharge of the witnesses without notice.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — My object really was to forward the motion of my Honourable Friend behind me; who, himself, suggested the discharge of the witnesses.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — It is all very well for the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite to say that Mr. Proctor is a very respectable man; and, indeed, his pecuniary responsibility seemed to be the principal reason for moving to discharge him and the other witnesses, — if I understand the Right Honourable Gentleman correctly.

[Loud cries of "Question, question!"]

It is really hardly fair in the Honourable Member for Southwark to cry, "Question, question!"

Mr. HARVEY. — I cried "Question!" because I saw the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair was endeavouring to speak.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I have been placed in a very painful situation. I must own, with regret, that the practices which we have heard exposed in these cases have a tendency to demoralise and corrupt the whole constituency of the country. I am at a loss to decide whether this case partakes more of the ludicrous or the indecent. I intend to test the principles for which I am arguing, by going to a vote. After the very unsatisfactory accounts which we have heard of this transaction, and the extraordinary manner in which, upon the showing of the witnesses themselves, this case has been conducted, it would be very useless to affect indifference to the character of suspicion which it presents. I think that this case of the petitioner is based in fraud, built up in fraud, and finished in fraud, the most gross and scandalous. You have shut me out from the point I wished to push the case to, and that was, to discover, if possible, why he should select this man from the purlieus of a gaol? When Gentlemen tell me that they will not consent to my motion, unless I can produce direct evidence of fraud, I beg to tell them, in reply, that no man has a right to expect direct evidence of fraud. I said, that the whole case (passing over the original transaction, and speaking, now, of the circumstances connected with the agency sureties) presents a tissue of fraud and falsehood, such as I never before witnessed in this House. The Honourable and Learned Member for Southwark,—whom I am happy to see now in his place, and who came down a short time ago and made a little speech full of his usual sarcasm and sharp humour,—mistook the issue in this matter, when he put it on the question of the competency of the sureties. I contend, also, that the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman (Sir H. Hardinge) was wrong, when, in a former stage of this discussion, he said, that a Noble Lord (Lord Ebrington) had spoken to the respectable character and competency of Mr.. Proctor, therefore Mr. Proctor ought to be discharged. The fact is, that the responsibility or veracity of that individual was no substantive part of the issue at all. The legal remedy of Gompertz is now at an end. I stated before, and I now repeat, that Gompertz came before this House having been, himself, already rejected by the proper tribunal, namely, that of the examiners, as incompetent. I say, again, that before a man claims relief from us, from the stringent application of the law, he must show himself, here, with clean hands. Now, first, as to the candidate. Here is Mr. Gompertz, who, although placed in the painful position which I have alluded to, was actually brought forward before the committee as a candidate and petitioner. I appeal to every Member of the House, I appeal to the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman himself,—whether, on Friday last, his own impression was not that Moss was put forward by Gompertz? That was what Moss said at the time. But, since then, I think Honourable Gentlemen would find it very difficult to contend that a state of things altogether different has not been made out. Whether all this be so, or not, it is clear that Mr. Moss put himself forward as the agent, and it has since been shown that he was not so. Does Mr. Benbow stand in the same light before the House? No; not at all. It has been proved, that he is a very respectable gentleman, who does not put himself, nominally, in a position which he does not occupy. He interferes for the legitimate purpose of assisting a client, by what I must presume would have been legitimate means, in the object of getting returned to Parliament. Does he say, that he would have interfered in this business if he had known that a person, in the situation of Mr. Gompertz, had been the confederate of Moss,—whose scheming conduct, throughout the affair, I leave the House to form its own judgment upon, from what he himself has stated at the bar? I do consider that Mr. Benbow, had he been aware of the mode in which Moss was proceeding, would not have had anything to do with the transaction. Throughout these circumstances, it is clear that the sureties themselves, originally, knew nothing of the petitioners, or of the two elections spoken of;—in short, that it has been, from beginning to end, a mere juggle. Then comes the witness, Mr. Beavan, of whom I must say, without desiring at all to inpugn his respectability or character,—for I know nothing of that gentleman, except in so far as regards his conduct in the main facts of this transaction,—that here has been a gentleman, who has been for a long time a member of the profession, yet has allowed himself to be betrayed, I dare say unwillingly, into a connection with what, I must repeat, is an absolute juggle. Then, there is Mr. Proctor. I am bound to admit that that witness gave his evidence at your bar frankly, fairly, and candidly. I beg to say, that I have no doubt of his respectability, of his general character, of his willingness to speak to facts, and of his pecuniary responsibility; but he, too, has been juggled into a transaction, in which the witness Moss has declared that he is the agent of Gompertz, whilst the witness Florence has deposed, and proved, upon Gompertz's authority, that he is not. Now, I contend that here has been shown a case of fraud, calculated to give great anxiety to the sitting Member. No other party could have raised a question upon the return of that Member but Mr. Gompertz himself; but Gompertz rips it open, by presenting a petition for relief, forsooth, from the strict exigency of the Grenville Act in his case. When I find a case bottomed, as this is, in falsehood and in fraud, where the only party whom we are called upon to give relief to is a party who stands in the degraded position of the petitioner,—I declare that, if I am to stand alone in a division, I shall give my support to the sitting Member, as I would to any other respectable person, and as the House would be bound to do to any other respectable person, who has been guilty of no misconduct, and against whom no charge, on that head, has been brought. What astonishes me is, what can have induced the petitioner to appear through Mr. Moss; or rather, Mr. Moss to state that he appeared for the petitioner. He was bound to appear, by himself or his agent, and, in any case, to satisfy himself of the facts upon which his petition was introduced to the House. Did he meet this case fairly? No; he did not do so: but he appeared by Moss, who pretended to be his agent, but who was not his agent; and I say, that Moss himself was forced to admit, that he had an impropér motive in giving in the name of Florence as agent. He admits, I say, a motive of this indefensible description; he had his reasons, it seems, at one time, for not wishing to appear as the agent, in a petition relating to a borough for which he himself meant to be a candidate; and therefore he, in the first instance, authorised Mr. Florence to appear for him. I say, this is no case whatever for the House to interfere in, on behalf of the petitioner, and certainly not one in which to grant the species of relief now prayed for. I shall, therefore, move that the order of Friday last, "That the time for entering into recognisances in the case of the Pontefract election petition be enlarged till Thursday, the 20th day of this instant December," be discharged.

SIR ROB. INGLIS. — The Honourable and Learned Member for Cockermouth has put the question before the House upon this issue,—namely, whether relief should be given to a party whose conduct he has described as being based, built up, and finished in fraud? Whether or not this be so, does not perhaps appear, from the evidence we have heard at the bar; but the real question, with submission to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, is, — whether this House, having agreed to grant that relief on Friday last, anything has occurred since Friday, to make it proper or expedient that the House should recal or rescind that relief? Has anything occurred, does the Honourable and Learned Member mean to say, or does he call upon the House to say, in the evidence which has been given in since Friday, when it was agreed to grant the relief which the petitioner prays for, that has so altered the character of this case, or raised so irresistible a presumption of fraud, that we should, this night, deny and withdraw the relief which, on that former evening, we agreed to give? Sir, I put the whole question upon that short ground. Has there been such a variation in the address or designation of the surety, upon any of the evidence which has been given to-night, as should induce us to revoke that decision, founded upon our opinion of the absence of fraud, in that particular, to which we came on Friday? The truth is, Sir, that the question before us to-night is, not whether Mr. Gompertz is, or is not, a prisoner, in the rules of the Queen's Bench; not whether Mr. Moss is, or is not, a parliamentary agent, acting for Mr. Gompertz; not whether Mr. Benbow or Mr. Beavan have acted in a bonâ fide capacity; but the question simply is, whether the House finds any reason to alter its opinion of Friday, that there was no intended fraud in the misdescription or erroneous designation of Mr. Proctor as a surety? The whole point is, has anything occurred, as to that matter, which would justify us in withdrawing the indulgence we agreed to grant, on Friday last? Much has been said of late with regard to the unsatisfactory nature of proceedings before, and the defective character of decisions given by, our election committees. The experience of the last three nights, however, has quite satisfied me, that whatever may be the defects, in the constitution of these election committees, this assembly, at least, is a very imperfect tribunal for the adjudication of cases like the present, where all are advocates, parties, jurymen, judges, and all brought together and acting under the constant stimulus of eloquent appeals or denunciations, from various parts of this House, without any controlling power to modify the influence of that stimulus. Whatever objections, then, I say may exist, as to the decisions of those committees, the decisions to which this House has come within the last few weeks, do not appear calculated, to my mind, to raise the character of this House with the public; and I am fearful that the result will be, that the little progress which it has made in the estimation of the public, by such proceedings as those to which I allude, will speedily be sacrificed.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I do not at all agree with the Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford in his definition of the question before us. The real question is, whether certain representations which were made to us in this case on Friday last were, or were not, satisfactory? and if, after the evidence which has been offered to-night, it should be considered that they were so, there can be no doubt that we ought to confirm our decision of a former evening. On Friday night last, Mr. Moss was examined, and so far as his evidence was concerned, the case was favourably entertained, and if you please, was proved most fully. The case, then, regarded only this issue, — whether, or not, the misdescription of Mr. Proctor, the surety, could, under the circumstances, be cured? But, since then, evidence has been opened to us, from which what my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Aglionby) so properly calls "a parliamentary juggle" appears to have been concocted in this affair, at least between the witnesses Moss and Florence.

[Hear, hear!]

Why do not Honourable Gentlemen who cry "Hear, hear!" exculpate their witness Moss, whose conduct is, I think, at the least, most suspicious? The witness Florence denies, in great part, the assertions as to him and his agency, which had been made by Moss. Then there is the sham candidate, who appears, under still more melancholy circumstances. Thanks to Mr. Moss, we have seen the book in which the poll for the last election at Pontefract is published; and will it be believed, that there is not in it one word about Mr. Gompertz, nor one vote tendered for him?

The House then divided on the question, that the order of the day made on Friday last, "That the time for entering into recognisances in the case of the Pontefract Election Petition be enlarged till Tuesday, the 26th day of this instant December, be discharged."

DUDLEY ELECTION RECOGNISANCES.

On the motion of Mr. PRYME, Mr. William Meryweather Turner, the petitioner against the return for the borough of Dudley, was called in.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have a question to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which, as it is an extremely important one, I could desire now to be put.

The SPEAKER.—Order, order! The Honourable and Gallant Officer should be aware, that all these election petitions have precedence.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I beg pardon. I did understand, however, that the Civil List, and then the vote to the Duchess of Kent, were to be proceeded with to-night. If I am out of order, I will only express my hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not, upon the important question I allude to, throw me over for to-night.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — No man can be more anxious than myself that the Civil List, and the vote in question, should be proceeded with. I should be very glad, indeed, if I could get the order for considering these brought on at an earlier hour.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — At least the Right Honourable Gentleman will not bring the Civil List on at three o'clock in the morning?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Certainly not.

The examination of the witness, Mr. M. Turner, was then proceeded with.

By Mr. PRYME. — I am a barrister-at-law, and am the petitioner in respect of the return for the borough of Dudley, for which I was a candidate. I was informed, last night, that the time for entering into recognisances had been enlarged until the 26th of this month, and that the same period was allowed for giving in sureties. I have not entered into my own recognisances. I have stated why I did not apply last night in the proper quarter. I did apply, this morning, to the Speaker's secretary, and I was informed by him that I was too late. I applied this morning, because, from what I had heard just before, I feared that the application ought to have been made last night.

By SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I did not say that such an order, for so extending these recognisances, was made last night; but that I was so informed. My informant was an Honourable Member of this House. I have no parliamentary agent. I conduct this business myself. I did not ask to see the order which I had in the first instance understood to have been made for extending the recognisances. I prepared and drew up the petition which was presented on the 15th instant to this House. I sent it to a law stationer's to be engrossed, and am aware of the nature of its prayer. I think it was, "to grant further time for my sureties to come in, or for such other relief as the House might think fit to grant." My impression was, that I should not apply for further time to enter into my own recognisances. I thought it would be of no use for me to do so. I understood that the indulgence which it would be proper for me to apply for was, for leave to have the recognisances of my own sureties extended. I had no particular reason to suppose that the House would extend to me a further indulgence than it would give to other sureties, beyond my own impression on the subject. This application could have been made, and this step taken last night, had I been aware of the necessity for it. There is no reason why this should not have been done. That it was not done was owing entirely to a mistake.

The witness was then directed to withdraw.

Mr. PRYME. — Under the circumstances which the House has heard stated by the witness who has just left the bar, my motion will now be, Sir, "That the time for William Meryweather Turner, the petitioner against the return for the borough of Dudley, to enter into his recognisances, be enlarged till to-morrow."

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — It is with very great regret that I rise to say, I feel it to be my duty to vote against this motion. Had I, indeed, been induced to concur in supporting the previous motion, I might have been disposed to go a little further, and to support this. But the House must see that there ought to be some end put, by us, to these mistakes. To what end was the Grenville Act passed at all, if, day after day, we are to be granting the indulgence of this House to parties to enable them to cure the mistakes they may have committed as regards their non-compliance with the requisitions of that Act? When we were arguing this sort of case on a former night, many Gentlemen did say, "We feel inclined to show indulgence in this instance, without scrutinising the facts or the merits too strictly." And in the case of the Pontefract petition, the relief was prayed for expressly as matter of indulgence. But because on Friday you were lenient, on Tuesday you are determined to do nothing but strict and even justice; and I very much regret that you should have thus rescinded your vote. That a man should merely say at the bar, that he thought to-morrow would do for taking such or such a step under the Act, and that he had intended to do so and so, but did not, never can be accepted as a sufficient excuse for neglecting to comply with this request. The omissions of the party in this case are aggravated by the circumstance of his having declined to employ a parliamentary agent. He draws his petition himself; he will conduct the whole business himself; and this gentleman is a barrister, forsooth. Why, in that capacity, he ought to know better than any one of us the exact course of proceeding; and yet, being himself in the law, with a full cognisance of what he ought to do under the specific provisions of an express Act of Parliament, he absolutely allows the fourteen days limited by that Act, for the performance of a certain duty, to elapse before he acts in the business.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I am very much surprised at the speech we have just heard from the Honourable Baronet. He founds his objection to the prayer of the petitioner for relief in this case on what occurred in the Pontefract case. One of his arguments was, that we have just now rescinded the vote of last week in the Pontefract case, and therefore we ought to come to a similar decision on this. I am one of those who heard the witnesses at the bar in that case, and believing, with the Right Honourable Member for Cambridge University, that, as the time for amending the description of the surety was on the point of expiring, and no intention of fraud could be presumed, on that evidence, to have been intended, in the mode which had been adopted of designating the surety, Proctor,—I recommended Honourable Gentlemen not to deny the prayer of the petitioner; and I voted accordingly. From the evidence I heard last night and to-day, however, I have been induced to concur in rescinding that vote which I considered to have been obtained by false pretences, and those only. Putting out of the question the grounds on which I founded my judgment on the Pontefract case, I come now to the consideration of its analogy with the present. The facts which have been elicited, I understand, go entirely in favour of this petition. When I heard from the gentleman examined at your bar, that he went home last night conceiving that by the vote of this House he was precluded from the necessity of putting in his application for further time to enter into his own recognisances, and consequently that he suffered the time limited by the Grenville Act to elapse, and by a single day, as it should seem, — I felt convinced, and shall certainly now vote that further time be allowed, as prayed, and in conformity with the motion of my Honourable Friend.

Now, what was the motion which the House confirmed in the case of the Pontefract election petition? It was, that the time for entering the recognisances be enlarged to the 26th of December. This was the order made by the House, and it applied as well to the petitioner as the sureties. Then, in what took place last night, the intention was to grant the same indulgence as in the former case; but the motion, it appears, was worded so as to include the sureties only; the only difference being, that in the one case the time was enlarged for perfecting the recognisances generally, while in the other it is made to apply only to the sureties. I say, then, when the petitioner comes here, and tells us that he understood the indulgence of the House was extended to himself as well as to his sureties, and that, in not entering up his own recognisance, he acted under a mistake as to what were the intentions of the House, I think we are bound, in consistency and justice, to extend to him the same indulgence that we have extended to others. I admit that all deviations from the strict rule of the House must occasion great inconvenience, and I regret that such questions should be brought forward; but I contend that the House, having set aside their rules and granted indulgence in one case, cannot, in justice, refuse to extend the same measure of relief in another. The House has decided that they will not inflict the strict rule, and they are bound to deal justly to all parties.

Mr. MACLEAN.—I am quite as much astonished at the argument of the Right Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, as he expressed himself to be at the observations of my Honourable Friend the Member for Buckingham (Sir T. Fremantle). The argument which the Right Honourable Gentleman has used, if pushed to its full extent, would go to this, — that, however negligent and regardless parties may be in conforming to the rules which this House has laid down,—let them make just what omissions they please, — the House is bound, because it has extended the time in the Pontefract case, to overlook these, and to grant them the indulgence they may require. Now, what is the case? The petitioner is his own agent; he is a barrister, and therefore must be supposed to know something of the law, and of the application of the Grenville Act, in such cases. He comes and asks the House to remedy a specific grievance; his brother's name not being correctly stated, the House grants him the relief for which he prays; and now, having neglected to enter up his own recognisance, he comes here and says, that he understood the indulgence which he asked for the surety was extended also to himself. Can the House believe that the petitioner, who cannot be presumed to be ignorant of parliamentary law, could have committed such a mistake as not to know, when the extension of time for which he asked was granted, whether it applied only to himself or his surety, or to them both? If we are to go to this extent, we had better cancel the Grenville Act at once, and say, that in all cases where a sufficient reason can be shown, the indulgence of the House will be granted without any reference whatever to the law on the subject; thus the time of the House, which is now occupied in these discussions, would be saved.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I well recollect that it was said, last night, when this case was under discussion, that the same indulgence ought to be granted as had been granted in the Pontefract case. I know that it is not so in the words of the order; but when the House extends the time, and does so upon the grounds of a similar extension having been granted in another case, what is the inference? Honourable Gentlemen have said that we ought not to interfere with the Grenville Act. But are we doing so? I think we are acting in perfect conformity with that Act. Honourable Gentlemen will recollect that it is a provision of the Grenville Act, that, on sufficient cause being shown, and proved by affidavit, it is legal for us to extend indulgence, and to do justice to the parties; and if ever there was a case of mistake in which the interference of the House was necessary, this is one. At the same time, if any Honourable Member considers there is anything like fraud in this transaction, he will do well to oppose the motion.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I have no intention of arguing the point with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, however much I may differ from him in opinion; but I will merely say that, according to my memory, it was not clearly understood that the same course was to be taken in this as had been previously pursued in regard to the Pontefract case. On putting the question, last evening, the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair asked the Honourable Member for Cambridge for the terms of his motion, and it was ordered accordingly; but in the Pontefract case the motion was for an extension of time, generally, to all the parties.

Mr. PRYME. — With respect to what took place last evening, I beg to observe, that when I made the motion, I had not prepared any form in writing; and when you, Sir, called upon me from the chair, for the terms in which the question should be put, a form of motion was handed to me from the table, which I read and put into your hand. After the division had taken place, I saw the petitioner, and told him that the House had agreed to extend the time for entering the recognisances till the 26th of December. I told him this in general terms, and according to my own impression of the order. It now appears that a mistake has arisen, in consequence of my not giving the petitioner a copy of the motion. The petitioner, therefore, could not know of the error until he saw the Votes published this morning, when it was too late for him to enter up his own recognisance, without an extension of time being granted. Here, evidently, is no fraud, but a bonâ fide mistake, and the parties are perfectly willing to give good and sufficient security for the payment of costs, in the event of the petition being declared frivolous and vexatious, and thus the object of the Grenville Act is attained.

Mr. COURTENAY. — The Honourable Gentlemen opposite are putting their case upon the ground of absence of fraud — we oppose it upon the ground of gross negligence. We have been told by the Honourable and Learned Solicitor General, and by the Honourable and Learned Member for Cambridge, that, in granting the indulgence, in this case, we do not interfere with the Act of Parliament. I, on the contrary, contend that we do. The spirit of the Grenville Act is to give relief only where the necessity is proved, but not to annoy the sitting Member by a series of motions of this kind. I believe, also, that these words will be found in the Act in question, "provided always that the time, in no one case, be enlarged oftener than once, and that the name shall be but once changed." Now, these words may not, perhaps, exactly meet the present case, because it never could have been supposed that such a case would ever arise. I say, that it could not have been supposed, by the framers of that Act, that a lawyer, acting as his own agent in an election petition, would come here and say, "I have not complied with the law because I did not know it, and I therefore claim your indulgence on account of my ignorance." The Honourable and Learned Member for Cambridge has said, that the petitioner did not know the terms of the motion till this morning. Why, the resolution of the House is in exact accordance with the prayer of his own petition, and what right had he to conclude that the House had granted him more than that which he asked at their hands?

SIR H. HARDINGE. — I will not enter into the legal points which are involved in this question. I may, however, be permitted to say, that I think the House ought to have come to a different conclusion from that of last evening. But what are the facts? The petitioner, having obtained his prayer, in the first instance, has committed a second error, and asks the House to grant him its indulgence again. Now, if this be allowed, we shall, no doubt, have many such cases brought forward; and I have already heard it said, in consequence of the decisions of Friday and Monday last, that no petition, however absurd its prayer, would be refused by this House. The opinion of the Chair has already been most decidedly expressed, and we ought to adhere to it. We ought to have rescinded the order in the Pontefract case, and to abide by the strict letter of the law in all others. If there be any doubt in the case before us, I will put it to the Chair, to say whether it is either usual or proper for a petitioner to come twice to this House to remedy his own errors? In the first instance, the petitioner committed an error in the name of his own brother, and then, in neglecting to enter up his own name. If we agree to this motion, we shall not only infringe the law, but make ourselves the laughing-stock of the whole country. Sir, I should be glad to hear your opinion.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Sir, it appears to me that you are improperly called upon to address the House on the question before it.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Chair, chair! Order, order!

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Sir, upon a point of order nothing can be more proper than to request your decision; and knowing, as we all do, the great ability with which you decide in such questions, I am sure that we shall at all times be ready to bow to your opinion. But the present case is, Sir, I apprehend, one purely of opinion, as to the propriety of the House exercising a particular power, and upon which the House itself is much divided, and on which you ought not to be called upon to decide.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Chair, chair!

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Sir, with all respect for you and the high office which you fill, I must protest against the Chair of this House acting in a judicial capacity; and I protest against the Chair of this House being called upon to give an opinion on a point with respect to which various Honourable Members may entertain various opinions, and which is calculated to draw forth the excited feelings and animosities of party.

SIR G. SINCLAIR. — I wish to state the grounds upon which I shall give my vote upon this occasion. I last night voted for extending the time for entering the recognisances in the Dudley case, because I thought an error had been committed; but I conceive that the petitioner ought now to bear the penalty of his own inadvertency, inasmuch as he has only himself to blame. If any one ought to have the benefit of this second mistake, it is not the petitioner, but the sitting Member.

The House then divided: —

SLIGO COUNTY ELECTION RECOGNISANCES.

MR. MAULE.— Sir, I will shortly state the grounds upon which I am about to make application to the House, to enlarge the time for entering the recognisances in the case of the Sligo county election petition. You, Sir, have reported that the recognisances have not been entered into in due time, according to the Act of Parliament; and, by the terms of the statute, I am aware that the order which the House has made in reference to this petition must be discharged, if no special matter can be shown to the House to justify it in granting an extension of time. The effect of the Act of George IV. is, that the recognisances shall be entered into within fourteen days, or such further time as the House shall think proper to direct. If the recognisances be not so completed, it becomes the duty of the Speaker of this House officially to state the fact from the chair; and if the parties should still be desirous of proceeding with the petition, they must then be prepared, on sworn testimony, to show that a case has arisen to call for the exercise of the power of the House to grant further time: there is, however, a limit to the power of the House in this matter, the Act confining the extension of time to thirty days. I am not, therefore, calling upon the House to set aside the provisions of the Grenville Act, but to decide according to its strict letter. The Act further provides that the sureties to election petitions shall, if residing within forty miles of London, enter into their recognisances before the Speaker of the House of Commons, or the officer appointed by him; but if residing beyond that distance from town, the recognisances are to be entered into before a justice of the peace. It must, however, be remembered that the Act gives no express form in those cases where the sureties enter into their recognisances separately, and not generally.

In this case Mr. Nolan, one of the sureties, binds himself to pay the costs of this petition, in the event of its being declared frivolous and vexatious; that is, if the petitioner himself neglect or refuse to do so. There being no particular form stated in the Act, he has used a form which he considers fully binding upon him. The form, however, which he has so adopted has been disputed. It is, doubtless, natural that a correct form should be used, in order to give security to the sitting Member that the costs will be paid, should he succeed in proving the petition to have been frivolous and vexatious. If the form of the recognisances be incorrect, the Speaker will not feel himself justified in granting his certificate, and it will then be necessary for the sitting Member to apply to the Court of Exchequer, and to obtain the decision of that court as to whether or not such form is that which the Act intended should be binding upon the parties?

The recognisances in the Carrickfergus case, to which you, Sir, have called the attention of the House, were, I understand, prepared by Mr. Cullen, a most eminent and skilful practitioner. He considered that there might be some doubt upon the subject, and he, consequently, prepared two forms, in order that if objection should be made to the one, the other might be substituted. In the Sligo case, the form of recognisance was prepared by a solicitor of considerable practice in Dublin. He adopted this particular form, being of opinion that it was perfectly binding upon the surety, and was a sufficient security to the sitting Member. The error, if it be one, is certainly one that might be committed by the most skilful lawyer. Instead, however, of proceeding upon recognisances, with respect to the form of which some doubt may be entertained, we apply to the House, under the clause of the Act to which I have referred, to grant us an extension of time, in order that we may put in new recognisances in the proper form. I move that the petition (presented yesterday) from James Potter be read, and that Mr. Potter be called in and examined.

The petition was then read accordingly.

Upon the question, that Mr. Potter be called in, being put, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — I think it would be improper to proceed with the investigation at this hour of the morning; and I will move, as an amendment, that the debate be adjourned to this day.

Mr. MAULE.— I wish only to examine one witness.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I will not consent to the examination of half a witness.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I wish to know whether, if we now delay to call in the witnesses, it will be competent for us to entertain the question at another time?

SIR H. HARDINGE. — Sir, I think Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House ought to have some information as to what has passed before the examiners. Honourable Members opposite who come down prepared with their briefs on the question have a great advantage over Gentlemen who do not possess the same sources of information; and, Sir, when I hear you state to the House, that in one case the ostensible agent in this petition gave in recognisances which were informal, and, if accepted, would have been no security to the sitting Member for the costs incurred, and that when those recognisances were objected to, he put his hand into his pocket and drew forth proper and correct recognisances, it does appear to me that some most extraordinary proceedings have taken place. When, Sir, I find that you consider the circumstances so tainted with suspicion that you deem it necessary to take an extraordinary step and to communicate that to the House, which but for you they never would have known, — and when I hear you, Sir, express your opinion in the most decided manner (although, I am sorry to say, that opinion has not been regarded),—I trust that the House will not, without much consideration, step out of their way to grant indulgence in other such cases. If such a system is to be tolerated, there will be no end to the inconvenience, and no security whatever for any Honourable Member against whose return a petition may be presented. As I recollect the custom of older times, it was usual for the examiners appointed by the Speaker to consult with him upon any doubtful matters. I do not know whether that practice is now continued. But, Sir, as there is a very strong suspicion of fraud in this case, if I am not asking too much, I would respectfully request you to give the House the benefit of your opinion?

The SPEAKER. — I will not give any opinion in this matter; but will state the facts. The recognisances were entered into in Ireland, and transmitted to my secretary; he discovered an error; and it was in consequence of this that the other recognisance was put in. I do think that if the witness is called he can show no more than I have stated to the House. The circumstance made so much impression on my mind that I could not avoid stating it to the House.

The question was then put, that this debate be adjourned to this day.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I entirely agree with the Honourable and Gallant Member for Lincoln, that if this question is likely to lead to a protracted debate, it would be better to adjourn its further consideration. We may have an opportunity of discussing it in the course of the afternoon sitting; but it would be most inconvenient to do so at this late hour of the morning.

Mr. MAULE. — By the remark of the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Hardinge) about briefs, it might be supposed that I do not stand in the position of an independent Member of the House in this case, but that I am retained, in some sort, as an agent for the petitioners. I beg to say that I am incapable of voting here as an advocate, or of stating any opinion that I do not feel; and I assure the Right Honourable and Gallant Member that my vote on this or any other question will be given as independently, and as free from bias of any kind, as his own, or that of any other Honourable Member.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has misunderstood me. I did not say that he was interested in this question. What I did say was, that Honourable Members on his side of the House came down prepared with information which we, on this side, do not possess, and that therefore they had an advantage over us in these discussions.

The SPEAKER. — In answer to the question which was just now put to me by the Honourable Member for Bridport, I beg to state, that the House adjourned the debate on a former occasion in a similar case.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I would suggest to my Honourable and Gallant Friend near me (Colonel Sibthorp), the propriety of allowing the witness to be called in and examined. So much time having already been occupied in this discussion, the general convenience of the House would, I think, be best consulted by deciding the question at once.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I am ready to do anything for the convenience of the House.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I, for one, am prepared to go on with this question. I will not say whether there is fraud, or not; but, Sir, from what you have stated, it appears that there are circumstances which lead to that inference. I say, then, that the mere suggestian of fraud is sufficient to induce the House to proceed at once with the examination, as in all such cases it is expedient that the parties should not have the means of preparing themselves.

The motion of adjournment was then, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Potter was then called in, and examined, upon oath, —

By Mr. MAULE. — Is a solicitor, and resides at Dulwich. Is engaged in the Sligo, Portarlington, and Carrickfergus petitions. Sent the printed form of the recognisances, after having received them from the proper officer, to his partner in Dublin, requesting him to fill them up. In the cases of Sligo and Portarlington, the forms were filled up in precisely the same terms; but in the case of Carrickfergus, separate recognisances were returned, as well as the joint recognisances; this arose in consequence of a doubt that prevailed in the mind of the agent in Dublin; therefore, in the one recognisance the petitioner and the surety were united, and in the others they were separate. Had no design in having the two different forms. Did not know that there was informality in any of the recognisances until he was informed of it on Monday by the Speaker's secretary.

By SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — Did not, in the first instance, put in all the recognisances he had received from Carrickfergus; put in only the separate ones. Is aware that, at the end of the Act of Parliament, there is a form given as to the mode in which recognisances are to be drawn. The joint recognisance corresponded with the form prescribed by the Act.

Why then, did you prefer to hand in the recognisances which were informal?— I made inquiry upon the subject, and understood that when some of the parties were resident in London, and others in different parts of the country, separate recognisances were received.

By HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Cannot undertake to say that he read the recognisances through. Did not thoroughly examine them. Was aware that there were single and double recognisances. Was not aware of the error in the separate recognisances until it was pointed out to him by the Speaker's secretary. Was of opinion that the separate recognisances were binding upon the surety.

Mr. MACLEAN. — If you were aware of the forms prescribed by the Act of Parliament, and which you acted upon in the cases of Sligo and Portarlington, how did it happen that you sent a different form to Carrickfergus? — The form was in every respect the same, but it was irregularly filled up.

By COLONEL PERCEVAL. — On Friday, the 15th, upon justifying bail, had not read over the recognisances. Did not communicate with his partner as to the way in which the recognisances should be filled up. Received the recognisances of Patrick Nelson yesterday morning. Does not know Nelson. Does not know John Gallaher; but believes him to be one of the petitioners. Witness is the agent of the petitioners. Will not undertake to name them all. There are four. Never saw either of them before he undertook the case for them on their petition against the return for Sligo. Presumes Nelson sent him the petition. Knows nothing of the arrangement made by his partner in Dublin as to who is to pay for the expenses of prosecuting that petition. Has read the petition of Mr. Jones, who is also a petitioner. Witness's partner communicated with him on the subject of the petition. Is also agent in the Carrickfergus and Portarlington cases. Has justified bail in those petitions. Is not aware that the petition of Mr. Jones has been disposed of by the Speaker. Is aware that the time for entering into the recognisances is past, unless the House should grant further time. Has not petitioned for farther time. Is aware that the case of John Kelly has been discharged.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. MAULE. — It cannot be at all necessary for me to detain the House with any lengthened observations, after the very satisfactory examination which the witness who has just withdrawn has gone through. He has, I think, entirely confirmed the statement which I had previously made to the House; and there cannot be the smallest doubt that there was every desire on the part of this gentleman to justify the recognisances, and that it is from the merest accident in the world that he has not done so; not only in the Carrickfergus and Portarlington, but also in the case of Sligo. I will therefore move, "That the time for entering into recognisances by the petitioners and sureties in the case of John Gallaher and others, complaining of the Sligo county election, be enlarged till Saturday, the 30th day of this instant December."

Upon the question being put, —

Mr. MACLEAN said: — I object to this motion on more than one ground; first, because I think that the example which the House would set, if they countenanced such negligence and laxity of principle in regard to the construction of an Act of Parliament, would become, as to subsequent cases, a very bad precedent; and, secondly, I object because the case now before the House is that of an agent, and not of a petitioner. In the last case the petitioner acted as his own agent, and, in ignorance of the Act of Parliament, he stated that he believed the indulgence granted to the sureties was also intended to include himself. But here we have an agent, who is a responsible person, coming to the House and telling us, that he has not even read the recognisances, although he perfectly well knew what was the proper form to be observed. If the House were to consent to the motion of my Honourable and Learned Friend, they would just read this lesson to all agents,—that, however gross their negligence might be, they need only come to the House and state that they had totally neglected the duty which they owed to the House, as well as to their clients, and the House would immediately excuse them. Nothing can be plainer than the words of the Act of Parliament. The Act states that the petitioner as well as the sureties must enter into such recognisances according to the form thereunto annexed. Here there is a distinct declaration of the Act itself. There is no difficulty in the case, either in the petitioner's complying with the proper form, or in the agent's obtaining the information from the proper source, and communicating with the petitioner as to what form of recognisances ought to be adopted. But in this case not only does the agent neglect to do this, but he does not even condescend to read the recognisances. The House is called upon to set aside the rule upon the application of an agent, who, I believe, by his own statement, is occupied in working four election petitions in this House, without any knowledge of the petitioners, and who comes here for the purpose, only, of showing how singularly ignorant he can be, not only of the law of Parliament, but of the very forms.

in which the recognisances are required to be given; for he tells us that he did not know of the error in the recognisances until, on presenting them to the Speaker's secretary, his attention was first called to it by that intelligent gentleman. I believe the opinion of the Chair will be in accordance with mine as to the construction of the law, — that it is perfectly clear as to the manner in which the recognisances shall be entered into. The fifth section of the Act of Parliament states what shall be the legal recognisance, and the eighth section empowers a justice to certify in certain cases. But there can be no doubt that the same form must be used as though the recognisances were taken in the usual manner before the Speaker in London. The justice must certify that proper recognisances have been entered into. But how can the recognisances which were so certified in this case be termed proper recognisances? Will it be contended that the person becoming surety is not to say for whom it is that he is about to become surety? By the form of recognisance that has been adopted, the party has entered into a surety for only 250*l.*, while in fact he is surety for the whole costs of the petition. He binds himself to pay to the extent of 250*l.* only; and he states at the same time that he undertakes to pay all the costs. This cannot be the intention of the Act of Parliament. I think that the justice before whom this recognisance was entered did wrong in giving the certificate. Then what security has my Honourable and Gallant Friend (Col. Perceval) for his costs in the event of his proving this petition to be frivolous and vexatious (of which, from what I have heard, I entertain not the slightest doubt)? The agent has told us that he knows none of his clients. He knows not whether the petitioner is worth one farthing or 1000*l.* Again, if the intention was not fraudulent, how happened it that the agent should think it necessary to be provided with two sets of recognisances, the good to be substituted if the bad was refused? The whole of the proceedings have a most suspicious appearance. And is the House to be called upon, under such circumstances, to give its sanction to conduct which it ought to deprecate, and, by granting this application, throw the whole of the onus of proof on the sitting Member, and put him to the expense of costs without a prospect of recovery? I trust the House will not confirm the motion that has been submitted to it.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I move that this debate be adjourned till this day.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the Honourable Member who has just spoken had confined himself to the question of legal construction, I should not have said one word on the subject; but as, after hearing the evidence of the witness, as to these two petitions, the Honourable Member has thought it necessary to draw inferences to the prejudice of the case and of the witness, by saying, that the witness went before the examiners with a fraudulent intention, with two sets of recognisances in his pocket, one bad, and the other good,—I must say that, in my opinion, if ever any case was clear of fraud, this is that case. The Honourable Gentleman has said, that this petition has been got up by unknown persons. So it might have been said with respect to the Pontefract case, in which Mr. Gompertz petitioned. And have we never heard of other cases in which the House has been imposed upon? That, however, is not relevant to the point at issue. I look to the chief point, to see whether there is any fraud in the matter, and finding nothing that can justify me in imputing fraud to any party, I must vote in favour of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, for I can find no circumstances connected with these two classes of recognisances from which, even as a juror in the case, I can possibly infer fraud. I therefore am prepared to affirm the motion of my Honourable Friend.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I think I must, in justice, leave the House; but, before I do so, I hope the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair will state his view of the law of the case.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no!

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I must press my motion, that this debate be adjourned till this day.

Question put, and House divided: —

Ayes	. . . .	26
Noes	. . . .	58

The original question again stated.

Mr. H. FITZROY. — I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. J. YOUNG (Cavan) said: — I think, after examining the witness, and arriving at this stage, we should not act justly by either party to adjourn without coming to some decision in this case. At the same time, I feel bound to say that, in my opinion, nothing has been stated which can justify the House in granting an extension of time in this case. The evidence of the witness did not, in any way, show the absence of gross and reprehensible negligence; and, on this ground alone, I say, the petitioner has no title to the indulgence of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I would suggest to my Honourable Friend, that we are here acting in a judicial capacity; and if we postpone the case till to-morrow, Honourable Members then may be present who are not now in the House, and be forced into a division without knowing the facts of the case, not having heard the evidence. I hope, then, my Honourable Friend will see that we shall act with greater consistency and justice by coming to a decison now, than by deferring it till a future occasion.

Mr. FITZROY. — I hope I shall never differ from the general feeling of my Honourable Friends near me. I am therefore perfectly willing, at their suggestion, to withdraw my motion of adjournment.

Motion was then, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. COURTENAY. — I will not offer any remarks as to the question of fraud, further than these: I think the witness has explained to the House that there was none; but, having a decided opinion as to the intention of the Grenville Act, I will, as a lawyer, state what it is to the House. I consider that the statement that has been made does not bring the case within the operation of that clause of the Act of Parliament which, under certian circumstances, authorises this House to grant indulgences to petitioners. The Act says, you are to exercise the jurisdiction in those cases only where sufficient grounds are stated, and confirmed upon oath, to the satisfaction of the House. On this the power of the House depends; and what construction would be put upon this clause by the judges in a court of law? They would say, that the intention of the Act was, that certain circumstances should be proved — not neglect — but that circumstances, over which the parties had no control, had intervened, and prevented their acting up to the rules laid down by the Act. The fact, that the statement must be confirmed on oath, is sufficient to prove to the House that something more than neglect was contemplated by the framers of the Grenville Act. But, in this case, the witness has proved nothing that would justify the House in granting indulgence. He has proved only that which needs no proof — his own negligence. I assure the House, that I would not have obtruded any observations upon the subject, if I had not felt that this case does not come within the provision of the Act of Parliament which authorises the House to grant relief.

Several Honourable Members. — Divide, divide!

SLIGO COUNTY ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. Speaker's Report upon the recognisances in the case of the petition of Daniel Jones, complaining of the Sligo county election. — Order for consideration of petition on Thursday, 29th of March, read, and discharged.

PORTARLINGTON ELECTION.

Upon the motion of an Honourable Member, the House resumed the consideration of Mr. Speaker's Report on the recognisances in the case of the Portarlington election petition; petition of Mr. Potter (presented yesterday) read.

Motion made, and question put, "That Mr. Potter be called to the bar."

Mr. KEMBLE. — It is now a quarter past two o'clock, and I would appeal to the House whether a case of this description can be properly considered at this late hour?

Mr. WOULFE. — The facts in the Portarlington case are precisely the same as in the last.

Several Honourable Members. — No!

Mr. WOULFE. — The House is not called on to go into a new discussion: the case ought to be decided by the last division.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no!

The SPEAKER. — For the sake of form, and the maintenance of precedent, it is essential that the witnesses in the Portarlington case should be called in and examined. How far that examination shall extend, will depend on the pleasure of the House.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I trust that in the case just decided, with reference to the Sligo petition, the House will extend to me the same indulgence that has been granted to the petitioners, namely, that I may be allowed time till the petitioners complete their recognisances before I hand in the qualification which I hold in my hand. If this is not agreed to, I must, of course, hand in the qualification.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am quite sure that the House will not place the Honourable Gentleman in a more disadvantageous situation than that to which he would have been exposed if a prolonged time had not been granted to the petitioners to complete their recognisances. With respect, however, to the proposition before the House, I should say, that if the Portarlington case is the same, or ruled by the same principle, as that upon which the House has just decided, we might come to a decision at once; but if any Honourable Gentleman opposite is of opinion that it is not so, then I do not think that we should be justified in going into the question at this late hour.

Mr. KEMBLE. — My opinion is, that we cannot now proceed with this case. If witnesses are again called to the bar, it will be impossible to say to what length the examination may be extended.

Mr. ORMSBY GORE. — I beg to say that I know that some Honourable Members on this side intend to examine the witnesses at length.

Mr. MACLEAN. — There is, I think, one other consideration which should weigh with the House, namely, the absence of the sitting Member for Portarlington, against whom the petition has been presented. I think the House cannot but agree with me, that it would be most unfair to proceed with the examination in the absence of the Honourable Member.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I have examined a paper which has been put into my hands, containing a statement of this case, and having compared it with the evidence which has been adduced at the bar, I think I can undertake to pledge myself that the two cases are exactly similar.

Mr. MAULE. — The House has evidence in both cases before it, as both cases are exactly similar; and the former having been decided, we are in a condition also to decide in the present.

Mr. TALFOURD. — After the statement which has been made by the Honourable Member for Oxford (Mr. Maclean) I think the House cannot proceed further in this matter. I quite agree with that Honourable Gentleman, that it would be most unfair to proceed with the examination in the absence of the Honourable Member most interested. I would recommend, therefore, that this debate be adjourned till this day.

SLIGO COUNTY ELECTION.

Mr. ORMSBY GORE. — I will now move that the time for Colonel Perceval to deliver in a particular of his qualification be enlarged till Tuesday, the 2d day of January next.

Upon the question being put, —

The SOLICITOR GENERAL said: — If it should afterwards appear that the Act of Parliament does not sanction such a proceeding, we shall create confusion by acquiescing in this motion. I have otherwise no objection.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I rather think the matter does not depend upon the Act of Parliament, but upon the rule of the House. I am sure that every indulgence will be extended to the Honourable and Gallant Member; but in order to guard against the possibility of after inconvenience, it might perhaps be better that notice should be given.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I want only to guard myself against any advantage that might be taken in the event of the petition being declared frivolous and vexatious, and I trust that the House will not place me in such a situation as no sitting Member was ever placed in before, and from which I may not be able to recover myself.

Mr. WOULFE. — I must decidedly object to this motion. The question is not as to any qualification the Honourable Gentleman may have at present, but he must stand or fall by the qualification which he had at the period of the election, and when he took his seat. He cannot give in a new qualification.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I never thought of taking such an advantage as has been hinted at by the Honourable and Learned Attorney General for Ireland. I assure him that I have no qualification to give in which I have not been possessed of for thirty years. I do not, however, choose, unless the House compel me, to subject my qualification to the scrutiny of those persons who have petitioned against me, whom I know to be paupers, and to some of whom I have often given sixpence in the streets of Sligo, until they have completed their recognisances.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I think this question ought to be adjourned. I fear that by deciding hastily, we may do that which afterwards may turn out to be wrong.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I have no objection to the debate being adjourned, provided that I am not prejudiced by such a course.

Mr. ORMSBY GORE. — The object of my Honourable and Gallant Friend is, that he may be placed in the same situation as he would have been in had no extention of time for putting in the sureties been granted. I will now move that this debate be adjourned till this day.

Debate adjourned till this day.

LIMERICK ELECTION.

House resumed the consideration of Mr. SPEAKER's Report on the recognisances in the case of the Limerick election petition.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That Edward Hallows Plumptre be called to the bar."

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — The debate on the Portarlington case having been adjourned, it would not be proper, now, to go into the Limerick case. I move, therefore, that the debate be adjourned.

Debate adjourned, accordingly, till this day.

LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I beg to say that I will postpone the motion of which I have given notice respecting the law of landlord and tenant till after the recess.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

On the motion of VISCOUNT DUNCANNON, this Bill was read a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow, and the Lords summoned.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I have to acquaint the House, that her Majesty, having been informed of the contents of the Civil List Bill, and being desirous, at all times, to give the strongest proofs of her attention and regard to the ease and welfare of her people, has commanded me to acquaint your Lordships, that her Majesty has been pleased to give her consent that your Lordships may proceed upon the said Bill in such manner as you shall think fit.

The message having been read,—

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE said:—I now beg leave to move that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, "To return our most grateful thanks to her Majesty, for graciously acquainting us with her Royal consent that this House may proceed upon the said Bill, as now framed, in such manner as they shall think fit; to assure her Majesty that this early attention to the ease and welfare of the people, expressed in a manner so gracious, and founded on principles so generous, must strengthen in the mind of every British subject the most loyal and ardent affection towards her Majesty; and that this House begs leave most humbly to express their entire conviction, that the same considerations which have led her Majesty to make this most gracious communication, will invariably direct her in the promotion of the happiness and prosperity of an affectionate and loyal people."

Address agreed to.—To be presented to her Majesty by the Lords, with white staves.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I now rise for the purpose of moving the second reading of the Bill to provide for the better support of her Majesty, and for the due maintenance of the dignity of the crown, according to the notice which I gave to your Lordships yesterday. With respect to the settlement of her Majesty's Civil List, the same course has been pursued as that which was adopted at the commencement of the late reign. In the House of Commons a committee has been appointed, with powers similar to those which were given on the former occasion. That committee has sat, has made its Report, and on that Report has been framed this Bill which has been sent up to your Lordships, and to which I have to request your Lordships' attention. My Lords, this Bill, as I said before, follows exactly the precedent of the Civil List Act of the last reign. That Civil List Act not only proceeded on, but carried much further, a principle which had been already adopted in the constitution, and which, in fact, is a right constitutional principle, inasmuch as it gives the greatest possible amount of benefit and advantage both to the Crown and the people. Your Lordships know very well what this principle is — that it is the entire separation of the whole of the charges which belong to the civil government of the country from those which appertain to the personal dignity and convenience of the Sovereign. On the former occasion, to which I have referred, many Noble Lords in this House — censured I will not say, for that, perhaps, is too strong a word, but—expressed great doubts as to the prudence, wisdom, and propriety of acting on that principle. Though, however, there might be reason, then, for questioning its prudence, wisdom, and propriety, your Lordships, having the precedent before you, would not think it either prudent, or wise, or proper, not to follow it on the present occasion.

I beg your Lordships' attention, for a certain portion of time, while I attempt to show the progress of the principle on which this Bill is founded. That it is a wise principle, in my opinion, cannot now be questioned, experience showing that it sacrifices none of the real dignity, comfort, and power of the Crown, while it tends, in a great measure, to the satisfaction and to the advantage of the country. My Lords, the ancient revenues of the Sovereign of this country, before the Restoration, — not, probably, from contrivance, not from arrangement, but as having grown up from the state of affairs, having, in fact, grown up with the growth of society in this country, — I say the ancient revenues of this kingdom were partly territorial, partly feudal, and partly, I apprehend, arising from the personal property of the Crown. But that revenue, so composed, was entirely the property of the Crown, out of which the Crown was bound to provide for the civil and military service of the country; and it was only on extraordinary occasions, when the Monarch had not been improvident, that when he was desirous of making aggressions on his neighbours, or when the country was threatened with danger or difficulties, he came to Parliament; and he then did so for the pupose of obtaining parliamentary grants. Now, my Lords, whatever were the advantages of this system, it is impossible not to see, à priori, that there never was one worse calculated to secure constitutional liberty in this country. Under such a system there was no security for that without which there can be no constitutional freedom — namely, the free, the regular, the periodical meeting of those representative bodies by whose active and vigilant superintendence alone constitutional freedom can be preserved. Your Lordships know very well that there were, indeed, plenty of Acts of Parliament directing that Parliament should meet once in every year; but, my Lords, what are Acts of Parliament without the means of enforcing them? Your Lordships are aware that even now merely preceptive and declaratory Acts are not apt to be very strictly observed, and, if inquiries were not occasionally made, if vigilance were not exercised, would be of no value whatever.

In ancient times, as I have before stated, the only security for the meeting of Parliament was in the improvidence of the Monarch, in his desire to make war on his neighbours, or in the dangers and difficulties of the country. Fortunately for the liberties of the country, these securities, though very imperfect, were found sufficient to maintain its constitutional rights. But what would have been their fate if there had been one or two prudent monarchs, who had kept within their incomes, as, for example, Henry VII., who called only two Parliaments in his whole reign of, I believe, twenty years, and established such a tyranny as, undoubtedly, had never been known in this country before; — a tyranny that required protracted efforts, torrents of blood, and years of contests, in order to vindicate those principles and those rights which, from the disuse of Parliaments, appeared to have fallen almost into oblivion? This state of things continued, with more or less alteration, until the restoration of Charles II. At that period the increasing liberality of the times, the anxiety to obtain popularity, and, I believe, what had taken place during the fifteen previous years, which had, to a certain degree, shaken the power of levying those rights on which the revenue of the Crown greatly depended, — those various considerations induced the Crown to give up its great feudal rights—its lordship rights, even as to the property of the country—its rights of preemption, and many others; and to accept from the people, in place of is the least evil of the two. There is no possible security against abuses which so easily and so naturally creep into an arrangement of this nature,—there is no other mode of guarding against this, except that it should be known what the pensions are, to whom granted, and upon what grounds and for what reasons such grants were made. The last head in this schedule is 8040*l.* unappropriated. This is proposed to be given in order to meet any of those unforeseen demands which, under all the circumstances, it is impossible for any one to know will not arise, and which sum, considering that her Majesty is about to give up what, in addition to that which was given up by her royal uncle and preceding Sovereigns, would have amounted to about 70,000*l.*,—I do not think unreasonable or exorbitant; indeed, I am sure, from practical knowledge and experience, it is highly expedient that such a fund should be placed at her Majesty's disposal.

This is the general scheme for the Civil List of her Majesty which is proposed to the House. I do not know that there is anything else material to call the attention of your Lordships to, except that there is this difference between the present and other Bills,—that by other measures the Civil List has expired at the death of the Sovereign, whereas it is proposed by the present Bill that it should continue for six months after the demise of the Sovereign. The object is, that those duties which constituted a portion of the revenues of the Crown, but for which a substitute is given in the Civil List Act, should not become chargeable, as they have, on former occasions. Hitherto, on the demise of the Crown there has been a necessity for taking a most laborious account of all those revenues which become collectable; this occasions great inconvenience to the parties whose business it is to take the account, and great alarm to those who are liable for the payment. For instance, there is a clause in this Act relating to the duties on beer and cider. Your Lordships may remember that in the reign of George IV. the duties on those articles were repealed; but there were taxes on beer and cider, given either by an Act of Charles II., or by one of those other Acts which provide a revenue for the Crown; and on the Civil List Act expiring, which repealed the duties, the former Act to which I have alluded coming again into effect, it has become necessary for the excise to begin gauging the stock of the brewers of cider and beer. These individuals have conceived that the Government were about to levy duties on them which they imagined had been repealed; and the result has been that a great deal of unnecessary trouble has been given and alarm excited. To avoid this we propose that the Act shall continue in operation for six months after the demise of the Crown, taking, as the analogy, the continued sitting of Parliament after that event. We thus provide for the repeal of the duties on beer and cider during the continuance of this Act, and before it expires Parliament will have the opportunity of passing another Act with the same object. My Lords, this is a general statement of the Bill which I have the honour to lay before your Lordships, and which I now ask your Lordships to read a second time. I call on your Lordships to do so, not on the ground of any particular feelings you may entertain of duty, liberality, or affection towards the illustrious personage for whom the measure is intended to provide—I call on you, not on that ground, however deep those feelings of duty, liberality, and affection may be,—but as a branch of the British Legislature interested in the preservation of the laws and institutions of the country—I call on your Lordships, in asking you to support this Bill, to show your determination to support the hereditary monarchy of England—to support that hereditary monarchy which has been so long established. I will not enter into any frivolous disputes as to whether it is the wisest and best form of government that ever was put in motion in any country; but this I will say, that, in my opinion, it would be the height of insanity and the worst of criminality now to attempt to alter it. I call, then, on your Lordships to affirm this Bill in support of the hereditary monarchy, and of the rights, liberties, laws, and prosperity of the country.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Although I do not rise with the desire of opposing my Noble Friend's (Lord Melbourne's) motion, so as to take the sense of the House upon it, I am, nevertheless, desirous of calling the attention of your Lordships to the manner in which this Bill has been framed, and has passed through the other House of Parliament, with the view of ascertaining how far a due consideration has been given to so important a subject, and of seeing whether there do not exist, at this hour, substantial reasons for adopting a course different from the one that has been pursued. Against the concluding remarks of my Noble Friend, I will neither waste your Lordships' time, nor degrade myself, by making any defence. I am sure he did not mean to throw out anything against me, personally, or against those who may agree with me; as if, by taking a different view of this measure, we showed ourselves less attached than himself to the established constitution of the country; and were, to use his own expression, "insane" enough to put in hazard the benefits which it bestows, by seeking after some other untried form of government. There is no question of the kind raised by the present discussion; all are agreed that a limited monarchy, such as ours, is better adapted to the present state of society in this country, and the existing circumstances of the European world, — more calculated to secure the great end of all government, the happiness of the people, — than those commonwealths which have been established in other regions, where they are greatly preferred even to our Constitution, as being better suited to the wants and opinions of the community. Thus much my Noble Friend's somewhat needless observations have made it necessary to say, lest any one should fancy that they conveyed, against those who disapprove of the present scheme, an insinuation of fondness for revolutionary doctrines, or a disposition to seek changes of a sweeping and dangerous kind.

I will now come to the matter before us, from which I have been drawn aside; and I begin by assuming that your Lordships are consulted upon the present occasion, with the intention of really asking your opinion, and not as a mere form and empty ceremony; that you are appealed to as a deliberative body; that you are called upon to exercise your judgment; and that you have the duty laid upon you of exercising your unquestionable right to give the whole subject a full consideration. Now I am under the necessity of declaring, both that I can discover no sufficient reason for adopting the principle of this Bill, and making, prospectively, an arrangement of the Civil List, which may last, as we all hope it will, fifty or sixty years; and that, even if the principle were a sound one, and it were fit to make such an arrangement, we have not before us the information which might have been communicated, to which we were clearly entitled, and without which it is utterly impossible to deny that we must, upon every view of the matter, be legislating in the dark. Nor has my Noble Friend urged a single argument to the contrary. I agree in all the argumentative part of his speech; I dispute not one of his historical details: but neither his reasonings nor his facts have any bearing upon the question before us. Thus, I nowise doubt, nor do I believe any one can be found who will doubt, that a very beneficial change was effected at the Restoration, when the Monarch, instead of bearing the whole expense of the government, and enjoying the feudal and other hereditary revenues of the Crown, gave up these to the country, and received, as an equivalent, an income out of the taxes. No one has ever doubted, for these last 150 years, that this was an improvement upon the former usage; and I cannot help thinking that my Noble Friend gave himself an unnecessary trouble, when he laboured to dissuade your Lordships from recurring to the ancient feudal method of supporting the monarchy. So, too, of the change in our financial arrangements, introduced after the Revolution, and which led to the necessity of Parliament being regularly held every year, so that the whole business of the government must be transacted there. That this, like the former, was a great improvement, I take for granted nobody will be inclined to dispute. Then, again, as to the third of those changes, dwelt upon by the Noble Viscount, the plan of separating the expense of the royal household, from the other charges of the civil government, first adopted at the accession of his late Majesty, — I am not aware that there exists, in any quarter, the least disposition to deny that this, too, was an improvement upon the old method of mixing the whole expenses together, and classing them all, how various soever their nature might be, under the name of Civil List; a method equally inconvenient, and indeed detrimental both to the Crown and country. Upon all these points, I must profess my entire acquiescence in every thing that has fallen from my Noble Friend; and to these points his speech was wholly confined; but the matter in dispute between us, namely, the proposed arrangement, is left altogether untouched by him. I have heard not one word in support of the sums allotted by the Bill; nor in answer to the demand of information upon the amount of the royal income; nor in defence of the proposal to grant a Civil List for the Sovereign's life; and, in the absence of all explanation, and of all reply to what I urged nearly a week ago, — with no one fact stated, no one argument adduced in support of the measure in any point, — I remain of the opinion which I then expressed, and which all the attention I have since devoted to the subject has only confirmed, that it is a most unwise, unbecoming, unstatesmanlike course of proceeding, to legislate upon such a subject prospectively for a period of perhaps half a century or more.

What man can foresee, — what being, with our limited understanding, can pretend to foresee, — what audacity, let me ask, can inspire any one to foretel anything, however trifling, touching the state of affairs forty, thirty, ay, even ten years hence? Yet here are we, about to lay down a rule, by which the expenditure of the Sovereign is to be governed, and the contributions of the people towards it fixed, as long as the reign shall endure. We are to ascertain, at this moment, for all that period of time, how much of each article that enters into the Royal expenses shall be required for duly supporting the dignity and splendour of the Crown; and how much each article shall cost in monies numbered, we being, of necessity, in the dark — absolutely in the dark — as to any one of the circumstances in which this prospective arrangement must be carried into execution. Utterly ignorant of all that must determine whether too much or too little, or only enough, has been allotted, — not pretending to know, or even to have the power of guessing at any portion of the details which must decide this great matter from time to time. Here are we taking upon ourselves to form an estimate, wholly depending on these unknown details; and, by that estimate, fixing a Civil List for ages to come! In 1837, we are deciding what shall be a proper court establishment, in all its branches, for the Sovereign of England, in the year 1880 or 1890. Am I to be told that we can now have the means of divining anything about a court in those distant days? But are we in a condition to fix, in all its details, what that court shall be in an age to which the eye of fancy alone can pierce, so as to give objects their weight, and form, and colouring? Yet this is what we are about doing; we are acting as if we could tell what, in an unknown age, — an age of which we can know nothing, except that we do not even know how far distant it may be, — what shall be required for the comfort of the Monarch, —what the establishment shall be which the unknown habits of that uncertain time may render necessary, and no more than necessary, for the dignity of the Crown, — what shall be the cost of that establishment, decorous and needful, nor more than decorous and needful. And on such conjectures as these, or rather giving up all attempts at conjecture as utterly hopeless, and blind as to the future, and shutting our eyes with our own hands as to what we are about, we sit down to legislate as though men were not subject to change, as though time made no alteration in human affairs, or as though courtly state and circumstances, alone, were exempt from its inroads! What must be the inevitable consequence? In a little while, — to take only the most obvious possibility, — money may fall in value, and prices rise; then will come down the Minister of the day, and remind us of the regard which is due to the maintenance of the Royal dignity, perhaps deprecating that "niggardliness of Parliament" to which my Noble Friend alluded in his retrospect.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I did not allude to the niggardliness of Parliament; my reference was to Parliament before the period of the Revolution.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I understood my Noble Friend to have made the allusion generally, and in connection with a later period; although, certainly, whatever might be said of the period before 1688, I am not aware of any ground for charging with niggardliness the Parliaments which have sat since that time. But I was about to say, that no sooner shall any change in prices take place, than down will come the Minister of the Crown, armed with a gracious message, and feelingly represent the necessity of providing additional income to meet the increased expenditure; and if the country should complain, pleading the bargain made by Parliament at the commencement of the reign, — if the people should presume to say, "It was contracted and agreed to in 1837, that during your Majesty's life a fixed yearly sum should be paid, without any deduction on account of prices falling, or any reference whatever to any other benefit which you might receive from change of times; and therefore, although the change has turned out to be in our favour, or at least against you, you must keep by the bargain, as we should have been obliged to do had the event been the other way;" — what will be the answer instantly given to such a remonstrance? Why, that were Parliament to listen to such things, it would be niggardly, unmindful of the dignity of the Crown, indifferent about the decent support of the Royal Family, disposed to leave the necessary expenses of the Monarch unprovided for; and the result would be, if there is any trust due to experience — if from the past we may now reason to the future — that the country will be overcome in the contest; give way, as it always has done, open the contract, make an entirely new arrangement in compliance with the new demand, and in accordance with the novel circumstances, and suffer no one to set up against it the final and conclusive nature, which is now, as it always has been before, ascribed to the proposed arrangement. All this happened again and again in the reign of George III.; and if it did not take place also in the reigns of George IV. and William IV., this was, in all probability, owing to the short duration of their reigns; the former Prince having only lived ten years after his Civil List was settled in 1820, and the latter, unhappily, not much more than six years after the arrangement of 1830.

But, it is said, that any departure from the course recommended of a contract for the Sovereign's life is wholly without precedent. Be it so: there is nothing in the plan I propose, of voting a Civil List for a limited time, more unprecedented now, than those far greater changes which my Noble Friend eulogised so lavishly. I recommend no departure from former usage, nearly so wide as the change which he justly described as most beneficial to all parties, at the Restoration, when the feudal revenues were commuted for a fixed sum, and the expense of the government defrayed by the country. I recommend nothing like so great a change as that which my Noble Friend most justly praised, the entirely new manner of transacting all financial, and, indeed, all parliamentary business, introduced in the reign of King William. The change I recommend, approaches more nearly the one to which he and I were ourselves parties, in 1830, and which though objected to at the time by some, appears now to have gained general approbation, since I hear not a word said against it, nor anything urged to show, from the experience of those six or seven years, that we should return to the former practice upon the present occasion. But when men speak of the precedents, and refer to the former Civil List arrangements as always having been for life, they ought to be sure that the circumstances are the same. Can anything be more different than those of the present, and the two last Civil Lists? The late King ascended the throne at the age of sixty-eight. George IV. was sixty at his accession. The present Sovereign is eighteen. So that we must go back to George III. before we can find anything like a parallel case. But I confidently appeal to your Lordships, if there be any real similarity between the circumstances of the country now and in 1760? Instead of a public debt of less than a hundred millions, we have one approaching to a thousand; the expense of the peace establishment has risen from five millions to two and twenty; and the revenue extracted from the people is no longer under ten millions, but above fifty; cramping their industry in every direction in which it is possible for taxation to be felt. In every particular, the case of 1760 offers a contrast, rather than a parallel, to the present. But, even if we were now in 1760, and had to make the arrangement for a Sovereign in the prime of life,—with the experience of that arrangement, and our knowledge of the manner in which the plan worked, I ask, should we be tempted to repeat the experiment? What happened after the settlement of 1760? The Legislature said, then, as the Legislature says now, that they were making, for the life of the Sovereign, a conclusive, unalterable arrangement with him. They told the people, as the people are now told, that the Sovereign was to have, by the year, so much, and no more, than was fixed, all the days of his life, happen what might, as to prices, one way or the other; and men flattered themselves, that at least, with the reigning Monarch, a final settlement had been made. What followed this perpetual bargain? In less than ten years—I believe in the ninth year—after its date, a message comes from the Throne, setting forth that, in consequence of the change of times, the income settled had proved insufficient, a debt of above half a million had been contracted, and an appeal to the liberality of Parliament had become unavoidable. In short, the arrangement was found inapplicable to the altered circumstances of the court or the country, and the debt was paid of course. Well, in nine years more, at the most disastrous period of the American war, the year when France took part against us, it was discovered that a second series of changes had taken place; another load of debt, but larger in amount, had been incurred; another message was sent down, the final and binding contract of 1760 was a second time opened for the benefit of the same party—the Crown, to the detriment again of the other party—the country; the new debt of above 600,000*l*. was paid off as before, and a new income settled on the Monarch. In the subse-years, deficiencies were again and again supplied by payments, though to a smaller amount. New arrangements were made under Mr. Burke's Bill, and afterwards in the early period of the Regency. All the changes thus freely made in the contract were for the advantage of the same party; while, as often as the other party claimed any relief from its provisions, the constant answer was, "The bargain cannot be touched; it is made for the King's life." And yet, in the face of all experience, and in disregard of all the dictates of reason and of common sense, we are going to commit the same mistakes that were committed in 1760; and, being now as completely in the dark as those before us were then, we are about to make a compact which is to bind the country for half a century, and to bind the Crown only while it proves a benefit.

But if, at some future time, Parliament should be charged with having made an improvident bargain for the country, let it not be said that they received no warning in their course. Let it not be said that no warning was given in the House of Lords, nor any attempt made to arrest such imprudence. And let this be borne in mind, that notice was in this place fairly and explicitly given of the consequences which may be looked for in a few years. And what are those consequences? If the arrangement now made shall turn out to be unfavourable for the Crown; if prices rise; if from an altered state of society, or from any other cause, an increased splendour is deemed necessary to the royal dignity, little will it avail the people to plead the final character of the settlement of 1837. That character will go for as little as it has done in former cases of the same kind; it will go for absolutely nothing. But if it shall be found that money goes further than it does in the present day — if the quantity of the precious metals is increased — if in the progress of manufacturing industry the great staples of luxurious expenditure become cheaper — or if the necessaries of life themselves are more abundant from improvements in agriculture — if, and I trust your Lordships will suffer me to contemplate such a possibility, if it shall be found that, do what you will, you can no longer hold by the Corn Laws; if it should happen that the people of this country, among whom, of course, your Lordships are to be included, will no longer allow those Corn Laws to oppress them, will no longer submit to buy wheat or eat bread at the rate of 62*s*. by the quarter on this side of the channel, when as good or better may be had for between 30*s*. and 40*s*. on the other side; if your Lordships should be compelled, whether you will or no — by the force of reason — to yield; if you should find yourselves unable any longer to resist the demands of the country, when backed by the strength of argument; if your assent to the repeal of those laws should be extorted by the hourly accumulating power of the resistance, which all sound principle offers to their continuance, and you should at length give way, unable any longer to maintain the struggle against your own conviction and your patriotic feelings, and should repeal the law which keeps up the price of bread, and of labour, and of every one article that labour is concerned in providing; if, from the combined effect of all these very possible changes, the altered value of money, improved manufacturing skill, increased agricultural produce, abrogated restrictions upon the corn trade, to say nothing of accumulated capital, all prices should fall a third or more, and every one thing which money can buy should become cheaper in that proportion, and the sum now bestowed as absolutely necessary for the Royal expenditure should thus be really worth so much more, and consequently should really be so much more than it now is, and, therefore, so much more than is required for that expenditure,—I ask any man, capable of reflection, candidly to answer this short and plain question, — what chance would there be of the Crown, or the Ministers of the Crown, or the Parliament itself, coming forward with a proposal to reduce by a third, ay, or by a thirtieth, the income now fixed, so as to give the country any benefit from the alteration produced upon its value by the course of events? Let any proposition, bearing upon the present settlement, be but hinted at, and what would be the instantaneous reply? The contract would at once be set up as being conclusive; and the argument so often used during George the Third's long reign would be again urged, that it was a bargain for the life of the Sovereign, not to be broken, or opened, or touched — a settlement conclusively binding upon the people — a bond which they never could shake off,—irrevocably their law, and absolutely their fate. In short, this is a bargain which, if the Crown finds it advantageous, must be adhered to through all times and all changes, with equal tenacity; but if any benefit should accrue to the country from keeping it, and the Crown should find its interest in breaking it, then it may be broken over and over again, just as often as is convenient for one of the parties; and for the protection of the other its value is that of waste paper.

But, my Lords, even if it were fitting and were prudent to follow once more this course, and pretend to fix the Civil List for the whole reign, I entreat your attention to the imperfect information which we have upon every matter the most necessary to be known before we can form any estimate of the income required. This much, I think, will at least be granted me, that the longer the duration of this arrangement is likely to be, the more it behoves us in common decency to know, at the least, all the facts which can at present be ascertained, and which bear upon the subject matter. But will it be believed that upon the most important part of the whole we are utterly in the dark? — that upon the amount of the income we are settling, we are all totally without information? Incredible as this may appear to be, it is yet strictly true. The whole question before us is, how much shall be bestowed upon the Sovereign for the due maintenance of the Royal dignity. But, in order to ascertain this, it is absolutely necessary to know how much the Sovereign has already, independently of our gift. The measure of our gift is to be the necessities of the Crown; more than is required for the state and splendour befitting a limited monarchy we have no right to grant — more than that, there is no one thoughtless enough to dream of. If the Crown had nothing wherewith to meet the expenses, we might be said to know what we are doing when we fix a certain sum to meet the demand; but as the Crown has other revenues, all that we are now about, is fixing a sum, which, in addition to these, shall be adequate for the Royal occasions. Well, then, the amount of these revenues we know nothing whatever about. No one is disposed to make a niggardly provision; all are agreed that the income which the exalted station makes necessary shall be given; but more than is necessary no one pretends to call for; and the question being, how much shall be added to a certain income, in order to make the sum total as much as is required, we are desired to answer that question without being told what the income is which is to be thus increased. We are only asked to do the impossible thing, of finding out how much must be added to an unknown quantity in order to make a given sum — nothing more nor less. It is no question whether 385,000*l.* shall be given or not, or rather, 395,000*l.* for the sum proposed is 10,000*l.* more —than was found enough for the two last Sovereigns: one of them no very rigid economist, and the other having heavy expenses which the country could not provide for, and yet it was found that his income, though 10,000*l.* less than is now proposed, exceeded by 20,000*l.* what was required:—but that is not the question we are upon, nor are we asked to consider whether any of these sums, 395,000*l.* for example, is sufficient to maintain the dignity of the present Sovereign;—but the question is this: — the Sovereign is possessed of an income with which this arrangement is not to interfere; by how much is that deficient? — how much must be added to that income in order to give the Sovereign a revenue such as her station requires? — and of that income we know nothing at all. It never surely can be contended that the revenues of the two duchies are private property, or anything like private property. I should like to hear such a proposition advanced in this age and in this House — I should like to see the man endued with the courage to maintain it — I should like to see the man among your Lordships, whether on the Ministerial or on the Opposition benches, gifted with the confidence which must be exhibited by him who would affirm that Cornwall and Lancaster are private and personal property, and not public funds, vested in the Sovereign only as such, enjoyed as Sovereign, and, in right of the Crown alone, held as public property, for the benefit of the State, and as a parcel of the national possessions. These revenues are just as much public property, bestowed by former laws upon the Monarch for public purposes, as the sum we are now adding to them, wholly in the dark as to their amount, is public property bestowed by this law. Now respecting the amount of these revenues we are utterly ignorant, as, indeed, we are of every one particular relating to them. The debate upon my motion to produce a return of the sums really received by the Crown from these sources comes on to-morrow, and to-night we are to fix what addition it is necessary to make, in order that the Crown may yearly have enough to defray its necessary expenses. To the produc- of this information, now, can there possibly be any objection? You ask for money to make up a deficiency, and you won't tell us what you have got already, by which, of course, the deficiency is to be ascertained. I heard, indeed, the other night, some difficulty raised, certainly not by the Government, as if there were oaths taken by the duchy officers which bound them to secrecy. My Noble Friend (Lord Holland) near me knows more of the obligations under which they are in the Lancaster department; but as to Cornwall, by far the most important in every respect, I know that there is not the least pretence for such a statement. The officers who take an oath of secrecy are the members of the duke's council, and no others; but the officers who alone know anything about the revenue take no oath of the kind, and from them it is that the councillors must obtain their information. They, the councillors, only swear to keep secret the duke's counsel; but supposing they are bound not to tell what the unsworn officers have told them, all we have to do is to pass by the sworn councillor, and seek for information from the unsworn officer. Indeed it so happens, that when there is no Duke of Cornwall, and the duchy is in the Crown, there is no council, and the affairs of the duchy are invested in commissioners, my Noble Friend (Lord Duncannon) the Lord Privy Seal, and others, who none of them take any oath at all, and yet they must be in possession of the information we want; for as their commission is to look after "the better management of the duchy," they must needs know its revenue before they can see to its improvement. However, there is not a pretence, nor even the shadow of a pretence, for this concealment; information has been communicated in courts of justice; bills have been filed to set aside duchy leases; the duchy has called upon its own officer, its Surveyor General, at the very head of the revenue department, to answer on his oath touching the affairs of that department; and the legal advisers of that officer have been furnished with information by the other officers, in order that they might use it in the conduct of his cause. The objection from a supposed oath is therefore wholly groundless; and I must add, that even if there were such an oath, unless there also were shown a clear legal warrant for taking it, no such obligation of secrecy could stand in the way of the high authority of Parliament, any more than it could prove an obstacle to the inquiry of the courts of the realm upon matters within their jurisdiction. We must, therefore, dismiss all consideration of oaths from our view, and then the question remains,—why we are left without the necessary information, and yet required to decide as if we had it before us?

I will now state a few particulars respecting the duchy of Cornwall, in order to show your Lordships how important the subject is, and how entirely we are mistaking our way in legislating hastily and partially on the present important occasion, instead of waiting till the facts are before us, and then making one general arrangement of the whole crown revenues, for the benefit alike of the Crown and the country. I think you may rely upon the accuracy of my information, as far as it goes; for I have taken pains to draw it from authentic sources, without, I do assure you, having asked any one to violate the obligation of his oath.

There are, belonging to the duchy, between thirty and forty manors in the county of Cornwall; ten having been sold to redeem the land-tax upon the whole estates. There is, beside the manorial rights, a considerable extent of demesne land; and independent of all surface property, there are very extensive and valuable mineral rights all over the county. This is exclusive of the possessions of the duchy, which are most valuable, in many of the other counties — Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Surrey, Norfolk, Herts, and as far as Lincolnshire. There may be, in all, upwards of a hundred parcels of property of various kinds, manorial and demesne, besides the mineral rights. I mention this to meet the doubt expressed by the Noble Baron opposite (Lord Ellenborough), whether a return of the fines received for the last seven years would be any test of their amount in future. It is clear, that in so many estates, the fines will be renewable at various times, and thus that an average may easily be obtained.

Now, the property to which I have adverted is let upon lease, for lives and for terms of years, and in either case upon a moderate rent; sometimes raised, indeed, but with large fines upon renewal. For the twenty-five years between 1783, the late Duke's majority, and 1808, the average rents were from 3000*l.* to 4000*l.*, the average fines from 5000*l.* to 6000*l.* a-year; but these were years of comparatively small receipt. During the minority, there had been received considerably more than 10,000*l.* a-year, for about 225,000*l.* was paid out of the net revenues for the Prince of Wales's expenses, and it was never pretended that this was anything like the net profit upon the whole estates. Between 1808 and 1813 there were received, in fines only, no less than 129,000*l.*, in the space of five years. For a renewal of the lease of that valuable but small piece of ground called Prince's Meadow, which adjoins Waterloo Bridge, on the Surrey side, no less a sum than 55,000*l.* was taken; and for a renewed lease to the corporation of the ground called Sutton Pool, at Plymouth, a sum of 12,000*l.* The term of years in each case was ninety-nine; but there was a rent reserved of 4000*l.* in the one, and 1000*l.* in the other, both to commence in 1841; so that, whatever may be the unknown amount of the present duchy income, we know that in three or four years it must, on these two parcels of the estates, be increased 5000*l.* a-year. But let us consider the fines: on these two parcels they amounted to 67,000*l.*, leaving of the whole sum of 129,000*l.* received, 62,000*l.* raised by fines upon the other leases renewed during these five years. Now, these other leases were not for years, but for lives, all of which will drop in about three years. They are almost all comprised in four leases of valuable mineral rights, which will enable the Crown to raise, almost immediately, a sum of at least what was paid at the last renewal, namely, 62,000*l.* But the Crown will inevitably be enabled to gain a very great deal more; for since 1810, the value of mining property has greatly increased, from the improvements in machinery, in the scientific knowledge and mechanical skill brought to bear upon the management of all underground property, and also from the general accumulation of capital. It would, therefore, by no means be too sanguine or too bold a calculation, to estimate the sum of money which the Crown, that is, the reigning Sovereign, may immediately after this Civil List is settled, obtain upon these four leases, at 80,000*l.*, 90,000*l.*, or even 100,000*l.* I have conferred with persons to whom the subject is familiar, persons themselves largely engaged in mining pursuits; and I will venture to affirm, that I speak within the mark very considerably when I put the least sum which can be expected to accrue from this source, at 80,000*l.* It is said, indeed, that the Sovereign may, instead of taking fines, raise the rents, which would only effect an increase of the royal income we are now settling blindfold. But what security have we that any such thing will be done? How can we know that the improvident mode of fines will not be again resorted to? All we know is, that every thing is left unprovided for by this Bill; that it depends upon the will of the Monarch, whether large sums of money shall be taken at once, and the duchy revenue impoverished for years; or whether the just and prudent course shall be adopted, of permanently raising the rents of the estates: and we also know that this Bill, so far from affording the least security against the bad, or for the good, plan of management, does not in any manner or way touch the subject, or so much as mention the duchy, from beginning to end. How, indeed, could the Bill make any provision respecting these things, when we see in what manner it has been, I will not say hurried, but carried through Parliament, in all its stages, and in both Houses? Not only has it been absolutely impossible that it should contain any settlement of this important affair, satisfactory to the people, and becoming the station of the Prince, but any settlement at all — nay, any reference to those ample revenues; nay, time has not been allowed, in the extremity of our despatch, for making a mere statement of their net amount. That was to have come to-morrow, and we are assembled on this unwonted day (Wednesday) to pass it, in order that no time may be lost, or rather given, to put us in possession of the necessary information. The income of 395,000*l.* a-year is to be given to the Sovereign, who may on any day raise a vast additional sum, by anticipating the rich revenues of the duchy; that is, of the future provision of the Duke of Cornwall, for whose support, as heir apparent, the Constitution has provided them. And here, my Lords, when I speak of the Sovereign, I must be understood only to adopt that expression for shortness' sake, meaning always the responsible Ministers of the Crown. Nothing can be more reprehensible than the constant introduction of the Sovereign's name, and the constant allusion to the Sovereign as an individual — of late so much in vogue amongst us. My Noble Whig Friends have carried this Tory practice to the utmost extent; the Ministers are hardly any more alluded to than if there existed no such persons; and yet the old doctrine of the Constitution, — the Whig doctrine, of which we have got so wide under Whig auspices, — used, in my younger days, to be, that of kings and queens we knew nothing in Parliament, but only of their servants and advisers. I therefore, if I might be permitted such an old-fashioned liberty, would venture to name the Minister of the time being; and remind your Lordships that there is nothing whatever to prevent him, whoever he may be, my Noble Friend, or the Noble Duke, or some one as yet not known amongst us, from taking fines to the amount I have mentioned, and advising the Sovereign to spend the whole in any way he chooses, and for any purposes however extravagant, or however unconstitutional. None of these parties are bound by anything in this Bill, from adding near 400,000*l.* to the fixed Royal income, — or by any pledge given upon passing it, — or by any promise made here or elsewhere, — or by any statement, or intimation, or by any hint or understanding; none of them are in any way bound to have the duchy revenues providently and honestly managed without anticipation; the Minister of the day may help the Sovereign of the day to such fines as will impoverish the duchy for half a century to come, and no one will have a right to say, it is against the faith of any treaty, in breach of any contract, in contravention of any understanding whatever. The four mineral leases, to which I have alluded as worth 80,000*l.* or 100,000*l.*, for converting future revenue into ready money, are not by any means all; there are other sources of as abundant supply to the royal purse. For instance, there is the Kennington estate, in the near neighbourhood of this House; it is duchy property, and the lease has actually expired. The fine for renewal was, I know, some years ago, assessed at 100,000*l.*, but the lessee declined to renew. That he would have given 80,000*l.* or 90,000*l.* there cannot be the least question; — but I make no kind of doubt that the duchy officers were well advised respecting the value, and that the full 100,000*l.* will, if wished for, be obtained. Upon these five parcels of property, then, now, and during the next two or three years, a sum of near 200,000*l.* may be obtained for the Sovereign, if the course hitherto pursued shall be persisted in, and the reigning Prince be advised to enrich himself at the expense of the duchy. No provision upon this branch of the revenue is made by the Bill; nor any information at all given to us upon the subject. Nothing, however, can be more clear, than that the present arrangement should not only be made with a full knowledge of that subject, but that the arrangement should comprehend the settlement of the duchies on a right footing, by the transfer of Cornwall as well as Lancaster to the public, and the placing their administration under the ordinary departments of the public service, making fair compensation to the Crown, or the Duke, for the surrender. What do your Lordships think is the charge of managing these duchies, as their affairs are now administered? Of Lancaster I am not able to form so accurate an estimate; but I know that the gross revenues of Cornwall for the years from 1810 to 1819 inclusive, amounted to 333,000*l.*; and what, think you, was the net revenue—for the proportion of the net to the gross is the test of good management? Why, only 228,000*l.*, — so that 1*l.* in every 3*l.* was taken — absorbed —for the cost of collecting and managing the whole. Match me that, if you can, in the worst managed estate in any part of the United Kingdom! Show me the man who submits to 1*l.* being retained in the country, or lost by the way, for every 2*l.* that are paid into his account at the banker's! Another striking instance of mismanagement is afforded by the encroachments which are made everywhere upon the duchy domains. What think you of an estate of forty-five acres, having, within the period of two or three generations, extended to 200 acres of good arable land, without any miracle, or any fresh grant, without any gain from the sea by embankment, or the deposit of any alluvial soil? The extension was effected by the address and industry of one party, the proprietor, and the carelessness of the other party, the duchy authorities. When asked by one who recollected the old bounds of the farm, how all this increase had been effected, the party now in quiet possession of the extended domain, answered, innocently enough, in his Cornish dialect, "That it was all owing to his grandfather being a careful màn, and good at hedging by candle-light." Such care, and such skill, never could have succeeded in adding one acre to the possession, had the neighbouring property belonged to a private individual, or been under the management of my Noble Friend (Lord Duncannon), at the head of the Woods and Forests. A course of encroachment which increases men's estates tenfold, within living memory, at the expense of the public, never could last six months, after the affairs of the duchy were brought under the superintendence of that vigilant department.

But the other encroachments of which I have been speaking are still more deserving of reprehension,—I mean those of the reigning Sovereign upon the duchy revenues, by fines and other means of anticipation. Your Lordships are aware that the eldest son of the Sovereign, who is always created Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, is born Duke of Cornwall. For his support, and the maintenance of his state and dignity, as heir apparent to the crown, the revenues of the duchy are provided. While there is no duke, and during his minority, those revenues are vested in the Crown; and although it is very possible that, if well managed during the abeyance of the title, they might suffice for the purpose when a duke came into existence, this is altogether hopeless if the Sovereign be suffered to exhaust the sources of regular income by anticipation. What is the consequence? The nation settles what is supposed an adequate income on the reigning Sovereign; the duchy estates are appropriated to the support of the heir apparent; and the reigning Sovereign being allowed also to exhaust and pervert all the revenue of the duchy, the nation has afterwards to support the heir apparent also. I have, indeed, heard of a very different account of the matter being given in another place. It has come to my ears, irregularly enough I admit, that a Right Honourable Friend of mine (Chancellor of the Exchequer) has there painted things in far other colours. If I could at this moment, without greater irregularity still, address myself to him, aware that what I speak he is now hearing, I should add, that he confounded some present on the occasion I allude to, almost to suffocation, by affirming that the duchy revenues were for the Prince of Wales's support, and that therefore he never came to Parliament for any grant of money. Was ever yet witnessed such profound ignorance of financial history? Was ever yet displayed such astonishing unacquaintance with princely natures? The heir apparent live upon the reduced Cornish revenue! The Prince of Wales never come to Parliament for money! Why, within seven years of his birth, the expenses of the King's family were given as a reason for debts of half a million having been incurred, which the country immediately paid; and in nine years more, the same plea obtained a still larger sum, with an addition of 100,000*l.* a-year, to the final settlement of 1760! But grant, that on the Prince of Wales's coming in esse, and during his minority, there was no specific application made to Parliament on his behalf, — the instant he came of age a message was sent down, and a sum of 50,000*l.* a-year granted, over and above the revenues of the duchy, — those revenues which we are told preclude all occasion for an application to Parliament. From the hour that he became of an age to be capable of spending money, the public treasure was lavished in providing for his support, and in enormous sums from time to time to pay his debts. What, then, can be more wild than the pretence that the duchy revenues should be withheld from the public, because they are a provision for the heir apparent, unless it be the yet more extravagant inconsistency of pretending that you are keeping them for this purpose, and all the while suffering the reigning Sovereign to use them at pleasure, anticipating the income as often as money is wanted for any purpose, and reducing the amount to be afterward enjoyed by the prince?

I think, my Lords, that I have said enough to demonstrate the absurdity of proceeding in the present arrangement without having before us all those heads of information; the great impolicy of making a partial and perpetual settlement of the royal revenue; and the improvident, unstatesmanlike precipitancy with which we are hurrying through this measure, instead of laying on the present occasion, the foundation of a general and systematic plan which may comprehend all the branches of the Sovereign's income, and secure to all of them an efficient and beneficial administration for the future. But there is another part of the Bill upon which I feel it necessary to make one or two observations: I mean the project for new-modelling the Pension List, and enabling the Crown to grant so many pensions yearly as amount to 1200*l.* in the whole. This is a matter of great moment, and it is beset by no ordinary difficulties. That the power of rewarding merit, whether displayed in the immediate service of the State, or towards mankind at large, should exist somewhere, cannot be questioned. If that high and peculiarly delicate discretion is vested in the Sovereign, perhaps upon the whole the most unexceptionable arrangement, I yet am well aware of the abuse to which its exercise is liable. I have no fear of corruption, or of any gross abuse, so long as Parliament shall be informed of the grants made from time to time. It is rather the careless use of this patronage that I am apt to dread, arising from ignorance of the subject, and from indolently yielding to importunity. There must also be admitted to exist some risk of giving men of letters that habit of looking for court favour, so fatal to independence, and so often turned to a bad account in the monarchies of the Continent. Yet all this may be practised without any Pension List, practised in corners where the eye of scrutiny cannot pierce, or the finger of reprobation point, by the abuse of other ample funds vested in the Crown, should the disposition to corrupt learned men exist, and be met by a willingness on their part to stoop from their proud eminence, and degrade themselves into the servile creatures of a court. Then I must look at the other side of the picture, and that leaves me no room to doubt that the evils which beset the steps of genius demand relief; nay, that there must be the means provided of removing the actual obstruction to its career. I know so much of the struggles which are so often made by those great men — the lights of the world, born to exalt human nature, to stretch the views and the power of man by the conquests of science, and whose lowest title to our gratitude is, that their immortal labours polish, and multiply, and enrich all the arts of life. Following at an immeasurable distance, and, as it were, only with the eye, their bright path,—slaking my thirst at the sources which they have opened, or humbly bearing into darker regions the sacred light which their genius has kindled,—I know how often it has happened that their course has been impeded by craving wants; that they have been fain to quell within them the desire of original investigation, to tame down their lofty spirit, and quit the congenial pursuits that were leading them on to extend the empire of science, or giving them to enchant countless ages with the inspirations of their fancy, for the humbler occupations that minister to the wants of frail humanity. Aware of this,—having present to my mind such necessities as these, and the inevitable consequences of their not being relieved,—can I hesitate in agreeing to some provision being made for removing such obstructions, and enabling the greatest benefactors of mankind to prosecute their highest vocation?

But even this part of the arrangement is liable to the objection I have urged against all the rest. We are legislating precipitately, and without the requisite information. In what position is the question at this hour? A committee has been appointed by the other House to investigate the whole subject. Has its Report been approved? It has not even been considered. Has it been made? It is not yet drawn up. Has the committee agreed upon any Report? It has not examined a person, paper, or a record. Has it proceeded to business at all? It has not yet met. It is barely appointed; it is only called into existence, after a stormy birth, and many a struggle for life;—it is just alive, and no more. No man can divine what it may do when it comes to mature strength, and can act. No conjecture is offered of what may be the result of its labours, or so much as what course they shall take. And yet we are called upon to settle the Pension List upon a very hasty and crude suggestion thrown out in quite another committee. The committee appointed expressly to consider pensions has done nothing; all men are anxiously awaiting its proceedings. The committee on the Civil List having no particular commission to consider pensions, makes a Report as meagre and scanty as possible on the Civil List, and throws in a hurried and ill-considered remark upon a subject not belonging to its inquiry. We are desired to legislate irrevocably touching pensions upon this remark of the Civil List Committee, and not to wait for the Report of the Pension Committee. If we had been about making provision for the pensions, during a life of sixty, as in George IV.'s case, or of sixty-eight, as in William IV.'s,—even then such thoughtless haste would have been indecent. But we are providing for a life of eighteen; and such is the impatience, not only of a day's delay, but of all inquiry and all discussion, that in the absence of the information which a committee has been appointed expressly to obtain, we are to catch at and grasp a chance expression in another committee's Report; and, sitting on unwonted days, and assembling at unaccustomed hours, we hurry through the Bill which is to make law for half a century in breathless impatience, for fear that by the least delay we should postpone our decision until the materials for making it are before us. But if all this haste was necessary, and not an instant of time was to be lost, why, let me ask, were we not called together earlier in the season? In 1830, we met at the beginning of November instead of the end. In former years, when the war raged, we were assembled in September. I ask my Noble Friend at the head of the Colonies (Lord Glenelg), why did we not meet as early now? Would it not have been expedient to profit by the wisdom of Parliament, for adopting some definite course upon the great question that now agitates our principal settlement in America? Ought we not betimes to have resolved at least upon some principles of conduct, and steadily pursued them, instead of letting our precipitancy in one thing rival our slowness in another, and our vacillation of purpose where decision was required, maintain the strife with our pertinacity when the truest wisdom was to retrace our steps? Ought we not to have so early met the great council of the nation, as to give time for correcting, by the help of experience, the fatal errors of last May? If those who preceded us could aforetime meet in the autumn, that the work of slaughter might be done, ought not we to have been early convoked for the more blessed labours of conciliation and peace? Then there had been no occasion for that hurry which has marked every step in this measure, and must for ever sink its value to nothing in the eyes of all reflecting men. As many months and weeks would have been given as we have now had days and hours for considering all its provisions; and the same wise foresight and deliberate prudence which presided over the whole settlement for supporting the Crown, would have preserved the brightest of the jewels that it still retains.

But I have done my duty,—I have unburthened my conscience, — I have relieved my own mind. It remains that I render my thanks to your Lordships, which I sincerely and respectfully do, for the patience with which you have had the kindness to hear so many things in which you disagree with me, and which are not listened to without uneasiness, any more than they can be delivered without pain. It has, indeed, been my irksome task to obstruct you in the course all seemed most anxious to pursue with little reflection and no delay, and to obstruct you by a recourse to principles now, I fear, out of date,—the principles of legislation sanctioned by the spirit of former precedent, and the analogy of constitutional law. This unwelcome office you have suffered me to perform, and my humble thanks are your due. Will you indulge me with your attention yet a moment, while I advert to the singular predicament in which the Sovereign is placed, for whose high estate the provision that we are making is destined? It is wholly unnecessary that I should profess those sentiments of dutiful attachment which bind all of us to the Illustrious House, called by the choice of the people to preside over the destinies of these realms. Nor does any one among you all rejoice more sincerely than I have done in the enthusiasm of affection which has burst from all her subjects, to greet the accession of the reigning Monarch. They have generously let expectation usurp the place of gratitude. They have taken counsel with hope, rather than experience. For as memory scatters her sweets with a cold and churlish hand, it has been found more pleasing to array the object of the general love in the attire of fancy; and as fervent a devotion has been kindled towards the yet untried Ruler, as could have glowed in her people's bosom after the longest and most glorious reign, in which she should have only lived and only governed for the country's good; by some chronic miracle, escaping all error and all failure, and only showering down blessings upon mankind. I heartily rejoice in this enthusiasm, and I do not complain of it as premature. I rejoice in it because it must prove delightful to the royal object of it. I rejoice still more because I know that it will stimulate the Queen to live for her country, in order to earn the affections which have already been bestowed, and justify the opinion which has been formed and is so fondly cherished upon trust. But most chiefly do I rejoice, because it extinguishes for ever all apprehensions of the English people's loyalty and trustworthiness; puts to shame all who would represent them as disaffected towards monarchical institutions; demonstrates the safety of entrusting them with an ample measure of political rights; and teaches to statesmen this great practical lesson, that the more we extirpate abuse from our system, the more searching we make our reforms, the more we endear the constitution to the people by making them feel its benefits, — the safer will be the just rights of the Monarch who is its head, and the stronger will be the allegiance of the subject who cheerfully obeys. So that, far from dreading the policy which would strengthen the people's hands, by confirming their liberties and extending their rights, we ought to pursue this course for the sake of the monarchy itself, which we shall thus better entitle to the people's affections, and render, because more beloved, more secure.

The Bill was then read a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow; and the Lords summoned.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT ACT.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE. — I beg leave to present a petition from the president, council, and members of the Provincial, Medical, and Surgical Association, assembled at the fifth anniversary meeting, at Cheltenham, signed by the secretaries, Charles Hastings, M.D., and Mr. James P. Sheppard, complaining that under the provisions of the new Poor Law Bill sufficient medical assistance is not afforded to the poor; and stating that the attendance, now, is not equal to what it was under the former system. With respect to the latter representation, I have very considerable doubts, indeed. As to the attendance having been inadequate formerly, it is no answer whatever to say that the medical assistance afforded to the poor is better now than it was under the old law. If that assistance is not now sufficient, an alteration ought to be made.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The comparison is important.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE. — Upon comparison the attendance may now be better, and so far it may be satisfactory, but still that is no answer to its being insufficient, even now. The petitioners pray that your Lordships will appoint a select committee to inquire into the matter. I beg to say that I differ from the petitioners on the subject of their prayer. I do not think, under the present circumstances, it would be expedient to engage in that inquiry. There is a committee appointed by the other House to inquire into the operation of the new Poor Law Amendment Act, and those who complain have an opportunity of going before that committee. The petitioners observe, that a sufficient opportunity of that sort is not afforded to them by the committee of the House of Commons, inasmuch as that committee is so constituted as not to give those opposed to the new system a chance of being impartially heard. I do not know how that is; but if it be so, I can only say that it is unfortunate and impolitic. I am sure that most persons who have given their attention to the operation of the new system, especially in those parts of the country where the poor law is in most extensive operation, must be satisfied that essential good has been done by it, and that the internal management of workhouses is infinitely superior now to what it was. I feel persuaded that the working of the new system has been most beneficial — that great improvements have taken place — and that it soon will be considered, universally throughout the country, that the change has been most useful.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I must say, that the petitioners have attacked the least vulnerable part of the Bill. Under the law, the pauper receives medical assistance gratis, which a man in full employment can scarcely command. The sick pauper is allowed broths, porter, and other comforts, I will not call them luxuries, which are denied to the working labourer.

The EARL of RADNOR. — In my neighbourhood an opportunity is given for a report to be made to the board of guardians as to whether individuals under medical care are or are not satisfied with the treatment which they have received. I understand that, whenever the new poor law has been carefully introduced, even in the northern parts of the kingdom, it has given satisfaction, and that objections are raised against it only in those places where they have no experience on the subject. I know that a great many petitions have been presented to the House from respectable medical practitioners, complaining that the Bill will have a tendency to degrade the profession by the system of competition. But there are also a great many respectable men who have since entered into that competition.

The petition was then read; and ordered to lie on the Table.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT BILL.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I hold in my hand a petition from a most unhappy class of her Majesty's subjects, namely, debtors in the gaol of Bath, who pray for some alteration in the laws relating to imprisoment for debt. The petitioners, most of whom are chiefly labourers, state that their families are reduced to great destitution and misery, in consequence of the long confinement which they have endured. They mention two instances of the harsh and cruel operation of the law. One is that of a person who has a wife and seven children, and has now suffered an imprisonment of two hundred days for a debt of 7*l.*; the other, that of a person with six children, who has been imprisoned for a similar number of days, for a debt not exceeding 7*l.* 13*s.*

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

BISHOPRICK OF SODOR AND MAN.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I have now to present a petition from the Reverend Charles Aldridge, who states that he is a clergyman of the Established Church, that he was canonically ordained by the late Bishop of Sodor and Man, and that for more than two years he has been a witness of the great good and benefit conferred upon that diocese by the personal exertions and superintendence of the late bishop. He then refers to a statement made in this House by a Right Reverend Prelate as to no injury resulting from the union of that diocese with Carlisle, and proceeds to say, that from his experience he is of opinion that it would be productive of much mischief.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

LICENSING PUBLIC HOUSES.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a petition for alteration of the law relative to the licensed spirit dealers, victuallers, and tavern keepers in the city of Glasgow. — Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—In proposing that your Lordships should go into committee on the Civil List Bill, I have a few observations to make in reference to a subject which is in some degree connected with that proposition. I see on the order book a notice of motion for the production of the accounts of the net proceeds of the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster for a certain number of years. It was certainly stated, on a former occasion, that there would be no objection on the part of the Government to the production of those accounts; but we have since found that this information has not been laid before either House of Parliament, and that there exists a certain degree of objection to its production. I admit it is competent to your Lordships to call for any intelligence you may think necessary; but I beg to observe that it is a very unusual course on a Bill of this nature to ask for information which has not yet been laid before the other House of Parliament; and I put it to your Lordships whether you will run the risk of being thought to act with anything like disrespect to the Crown, by calling for that which has not been laid before us as a voluntary act of grace on the part of the Sovereign? I have already stated that it is the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce some new regulations with respect to these duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster; it is their intention not to observe that system of secrecy that has been observed heretofore, to remove every objection to the administration of the duchies, and to lay all that relates to them open to the consideration and investigation of Parliament and the country. In bringing forward these measures some accounts must be laid before Parliament, and are intended to be laid before it. On all these considerations, then, I submit to my Noble and Learned Friend whether it is expedient that he should persevere in his motion?

LORD BROUGHAM. — I can assure your Lordships that there is no man in the universe less disposed than I am, after the appeal which has been made to me by my Noble Friend, to persevere in the motion of which I have given notice. It appears from what my Noble Friend has stated, that to move an address on this subject would be at once unfitting and disrespectful to the Crown. If your Lordships think that this motion ought not to be brought forward, I feel that to persevere in it would be useless. It would only be leading to a debate, or rather to the renewal of the debate of last night. Looking to the support which I am likely to obtain in this House, I see that I have no chance whatsoever of obtaining the account which I am anxious to procure; and I feel that I have still less chance — indeed I may say that I have not the most remote possibility—of achieving my object, without the assistance of my Noble Friend, who, for the reasons which he has stated, would most unquestionably join in the opposition against my motion. I must, however, say a word or two in vindication of the course which I have adopted, as it is asserted that such a course would not be fitting, as it is declared that such a course ought not to be taken, because it would be wanting in due respect to the Crown. I must say, if this were so, that I am not the only person who labours under a mistake in supposing that it is neither unfitting, nor unprecedented, nor in opposition to that respect which is due to the Crown, to adopt the course which I have pursued. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships, that when I gave my notice I was requested to postpone it till the night after which I did; in the interval communicating a copy of my motion, in the very words in which I made it, and in which it was entered on your Lordships' orders, to my Noble Friend, for the purpose of its being communicated to my Noble Friends the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Lord President of the Council, and the Noble Lord who presides over the Woods and Forests department. I did this that it might be considered — yes, that it might be maturely considered — whether it would be right or not to comply with the terms of the motion. That paper was given to my Noble Friends — they had it in their possession for twenty-four hours — and then a communication was made to me, that there was no possible objection to the production of the papers — that they had communicated with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, — the proper officer, no doubt,—and that no opposition would be made to my motion. I put it to your Lordships whether, under these circumstances, I can be said to be chargeable, as the only person chargeable, with having pursued a course that is manifestly unfit, that is wholly unprecedented, and that betokens a want of due respect to the Sovereign? I certainly do not deem that I am guilty of any of these offences, nor that my Noble Friends were accomplices in the conspiracy. I hold that I have committed no offence under any one of these three separate heads of charge; and there being no principal offender, there can of course be no accomplices. I considered myself free, and I considered my Noble Friends free, from that imputation, which I think they have very unnecessarily cast on themselves, as well as on me; and I appeal to them whether I do not stand abundantly acquitted of any such charge? Now, how stands the case? We are called on to vote hundreds of thousands a-year on account of the Civil List, for perhaps half a century; and the question now is, or ought to be, "What is the amount of the revenue of the Crown derived from other sources?" And in order to ascertain that point before it is too late, in order to arrive at that information which ought to influence your Lordships' vote, I call for certain documents. Now, however, it turns out that that is not the proper course of proceeding; the proper mode, it appears, is to vote the money first, and to make calculations on the information which we may receive with reference to the necessity that exists for the vote, afterwards. My Lords, it appears, too, that we have to countenance us in this proceeding—in this preposterous proceeding —I say expressly preposterous proceeding—in which we put that last which ought to be first, and that first which ought to be last—it appears, I say, emphatically, that in this preposterous course of legislation, we have, to countenance us, the authority of the Commons' House of Parliament—the guardians of the public purse—the jealous watchmen over the finances of the country—those who are sent to represent the people in the people's House of Parliament—whose voices are the people's voices sounding through them, and which I hope I shall never live to see stilled in that House by any juggle between the Chair and the Treasury bench, by any stifling of it, whether on petitions or in debates on petitions, by which debates on petitions it is that there has been obtained every one of the victories ever gained by the people in their struggles against the corruption of a boroughmongering Government. I trust I shall never live to see that House less zealous hereafter than heretofore; but, for the present, a cloud has come over their vision—for a moment a cloud has passed over them, which has blinded their senses, which has charmed their accustomed activity, which has put to sleep their watchfulness, their wakeful care over the purse of the Commons, intrusted to them, the people's faithful representatives. And when we are charged with too much attention to the purse of the people, it is said, "Why should you take so much care? why should you, the Lords, be more watchful than the people themselves, speaking through their representatives in the Commons' House?" To that appeal I have no answer to give, only this: I believe that before long the House and the people may awake, and that they will ring a peal in the ears of the present guardians of the public purse, which will be remembered, not to the last hour of the official existence of the Government, but to a much later period—to the last hour of the public life of the youngest public functionary in the country.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I am aware that within the last four or five years numerous instances have occurred in which this House has asked for information respecting public expenditure, which the House of Commons has either not asked for, or which, if it has been asked for, was refused. In my opinion, it is essential that we should obtain all the information it may be possible to acquire, in order that we may be enabled to legislate safely. On these grounds, I do not think that the Noble and Learned Lord is justified in withdrawing his motion:—to which, however, there is one objection, which is, that from the nature of the thing, it ought not to be a motion, but an address.

LORD BROUGHAM.—It was changed into that. If the Noble and Learned Lord is going to argue the question, I shall go on with my motion.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I do not mean to argue the question, as it was argued last night, at very great length, by the Noble and Learned Lord, when there were very few Peers present. I beg to observe, in reference to the statement made by the Noble Viscount opposite, that a Bill is about to be introduced for the regulation of the revenues of the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, that it is absolutely necessary that such an Act should be passed, because the Crown cannot grant a single lease of that property without an enactment enabling it so to do. On the accession of William IV., an Act was passed on the subject, and therefore it must now come under the notice of Parliament. An opportunity will thus be afforded for making, as I think there ought to be made, an entire change in the whole system of the duchy of Cornwall. I see no reason why a full inquiry should not be made into the enjoyment and application of the revenue of that duchy. In my opinion, an end ought to be put altogether to the renewal of leases on fines. All that ought to be required for the buying in of a new life is a fixed annual rent. In one point of view the system of fines may not be objectionable, because the fine may be fairly equivalent to a certain rent; but in another point it is bad — it is morally ruinous that a Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, on coming into possession of this property, should, at the age probable of 19, have to receive 90,000*l.* or 100,000*l.* There is no likelihood of a Prince of Wales coming into possession of it for at least twenty years; and advantage ought to be taken of that circumstance to place the property upon an entirely new footing. I do not object to information on the subject; on the contrary, I wish to have it; and my objection to the Noble and Learned Lord's motion is, that it will afford no sufficient information. Valuations ought to be taken.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The information which I call for would have answered the object which I have in view.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — The Noble Lord's motion only requires information for a short period of years. It would by no means throw a light on the whole subject.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I repeat, that I am perfectly satisfied that my motion would have afforded as much information as would have been necessary for my purpose; but I am disposed to withdraw it chiefly from the hopelessness of its being agreed to.

On the motion for going into committee being put, —

The DUKE of WELLINGTON said: — My Lords, I have to apologise to your Lordships for troubling you on the present occasion. The practice of late having been for your Lordships not to do any important business on Wednesday nights, I did not expect the Noble Viscount's statement, and an engagement obliged me to leave the House before I heard the whole of it; what, however, I did hear, afforded me great satisfaction.

My Lords, I will now say a few words on the principle of the measure. The Noble Viscount opposite stated, yesterday, that I had made some objection to a similar measure on a former occasion. My Lords, it is certainly true that I did so, and I have the same objection to the measure now before your Lordships. I recollect that at a former period I differed in opinion with many Noble Lords, on account of a provision not being made in the Bill, or in some other measure, for the office of First Lord of the Treasury, and other great officers of state, to make them independent of an annual vote in the Committee of Supply in the other House of Parliament, and I feel an objection to the present measure on the same ground. My Lords, I likewise confess that I feel very strong objections to the system established respecting pensions during the pleasure of the Crown. It is my opinion that a sufficient provision has not been made for the exercise of the royal bounty. The Noble and Learned Lord, last night, went into considerable detail with respect to the inconvenience likely to result from the long period of time during which provision is about to be made for granting pensions. Now, I beg leave to call your Lordships' attention to this period of time in respect of certain pensions, and to ask you to consider the service for which these pensions are usually granted. These were not granted to persons who have not given great services to the country. There are now many officers, both of the army and navy, who are on the list for rewards, to which they are entitled for services rendered during the late war. But, my Lords, it is not only officers of the army and navy, but there are a number of families, also, to be provided for by pensions on the Civil List; and, if we are to look forward for thirty or forty years, is it possible that your Lordships can believe that you have made sufficient provision for those demands upon the bounty of the Crown — demands in which the public interest is materially involved — by giving the Sovereign the power of granting 1200*l.* in pensions each year? I have also another objection to the Bill,—I allude to that clause by which the Crown is to be obliged to state the grounds on which those pensions are granted. There are many claims, many well-founded claims, on the bounty of the Crown, nay, on its justice, which a Minister cannot successfully defend either in this or in the other House of Parliament. I could state some arising out of certain public events, which I am sure that every one of your Lordships would admit to be well-founded. But it is not only claims of this description for which provision ought to be made. It is desirable, in considering a question of this nature, that both Parliament and the public should be distinctly informed what the amount of the property is which the Sovereign gives up when this bargain of the Civil List is made, and, also, that Parliament and the public should consider whether there are not claims on the justice and generosity of every individual having large property, and whether it is fitting that the illustrious personage filling the throne should be the only individual in the country who cannot perform an act of justice and generosity, but must come down to Parliament to have the propriety of it discussed in a public assembly. I could have wished that before this subject came under the consideration of your Lordships, we had had a distinct statement made to us of the amount of the revenues which the Crown has given up; for then we should have been able to decide whether it is fitting that the generosity of the Crown should be limited as it is in the first instance, and that afterwards every act of that description should be laid before Parliament, and that a Minister should be then called upon to get up in his place to defend it. I cannot let an Act in which I see so much to disapprove, pass without protesting against it. I will not, however, take up the time of the House further in discussing the objectionable parts of the Bill, nor will I delay the passing of it by stating any further arguments in opposition to it.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I stated at so much length, on a former occasion, the grounds on which I thought that the arrangment made for the Civil List in 1831 was the best that could possibly be adopted, that I will not further enter into them on the present occasion. I differ widely from the view which the Noble Duke has taken of this subject. I think that the present arrangement, which settles the revenue to be appropriated to the personal convenience, comfort, and dignity of the Sovereign, and which leaves the other points to be provided for by an annual grant of Parliament, is the best and most convenient plan that can be acted upon. No inconvenience has been found to result from the arrangement of the Civil List which was made at the commencement of the last reign, and I certainly cannot see that there is any reason to apprehend inconvenience, if your Lordships act upon that arrangement, during the present reign. The Noble Duke has also complained of the provision made in this Bill with respect to pensions. He has contended that the fund at the disposal of the Crown is insufficient for the purposes of generosity and charity, which the Crown may think it fitting and proper to exercise. That is a question on which great difference of opinion prevails, and that difference of opinion arises from a difference of principles. The Noble Duke has adverted with much feeling to the number of widows and children of officers whose names are upon the Pension List; and it is manifest, from his observations, that he has made up his mind to a much larger system of pensions and superannuations than that which exists at present. Now, my principle is opposite to his. In my opinion nothing is so dangerous and so prodigal for the country as a general system of pensions and superannuations. The finances of no country can stand it. If it be carried out, far, the finances of no country can survive it, any more than the revenues of a private individual can survive it. We have already carried it out to a large extent — we have already given large allowances, as the Noble duke knows much better than myself, to individuals both in the army and in the navy; and, in addition to the pensions on the Civil List, there are settled pensions for the widows and families of those officers who have fallen or suffered in the service of the country. I must say, for myself, that I know that this allowance of 1200*l*. a-year for pensions is a smaller sum than that which was before placed at the disposal of the Crown. If the Pension List had been voted to her present Majesty in the same way in which it was vôted to his late Majesty, there would have been pensions to a larger amount at the disposal of the Crown than there are at present. The former system, however, was uncertain, for many pensions might fall in during the course of a year, or none might; whilst the present system is fixed, regular, and certain. As far as I have seen of the government of the country, and of the fair demands of individuals upon the bounty of the Crown, I think, considering that there are other funds for the relief of those who have become destitute, or have suffered in the service of the country, that the sum now granted, if it be properly administered and wisely distributed, — and its proper administration and its wise distribution can only be secured by the publicity established by this Bill, — will be amply sufficient for all the purposes for which it is intended. The Noble Duke has adverted to what would have been by this time the amount of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, and to what was given up by the Sovereign in assenting to the bargain. Whatever may be the fate of this Act, whatever may be given up by the Crown, this question ought not to be considered on the grounds of its being a claim of compensation, but on the grounds of public policy — not as a question of how much the Crown is entitled to receive, but as a question of how much the Parliament, in justice and liberality, is entitled to grant. For my own part, I think that what is given to the Crown is sufficient. It should also be recollected, that the restricted amount of funds leads to a more prudent and enlightened administration of them, while a profuse amount of them too often leads to a profuse expenditure in their management. I was happy to hear the Noble Duke in the conclusion of his speech remark that, although he had expressed his disapprobation of several parts of this Bill, he did not intend to give any further opposition to its progress.

The House then went into a committee on the Bill. Bill reported, without amendment, and to be read a third time tomorrow; and the Lords summoned.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

The EARL of RADNOR.—When I gave notice, a few days ago, that I should on the present occasion draw the attention of your Lordships to circumstances connected with the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, I said that I should probably direct your attention chiefly to occurrences in the university of Oxford, though a few of my observations might also apply to occurrences in the university of Cambridge. I cannot help alluding to what passed in this House some months ago, respecting both those universities, and to the measures which the authorities of them have professed their intention to take in consequence of them. Though little appears to have been done as to those measures in either university, yet it is only fair to state that I have received a letter from Lord Cavendish, stating, that he has reason to believe that, in Trinity College and some of the other colleges, progress is making and will be made by the appointment of committees to revise the statutes of their individual colleges, and also of the university at large. With regard to the university of Oxford, I have likewise been informed that committees for similar purposes have also been appointed in one or wo colleges; and that a hope is entertained that, after they have ascertained what the statutes of those colleges are, an attempt will be made to consolidate and amend them. I shall not further allude to these matters at present, although I think it right to say that, after the recess, in the course of the Session, I may think it necessary to adopt measures to ascertain what the committees of these colleges are doing. In the university of Oxford, it is stated that something has been already done; that an alteration has taken place, and that great improvements are going on. I cannot, however, congratulate either myself or the country on the extent of reform which has hitherto taken place. Though the heads of houses have applied themselves, with great apparent zeal, to revise the statutes of that university, the sum total of their labours and of their reforms is of the most ridiculous and ludicrous character. That sum total consists in this,—that the tutors are no longer prohibited from reading lectures to their pupils in Lent; that an English sermon will be substituted for the Latin sermon, preached at the commencement of each term to the university; that certain prayers, hitherto recited in Latin, will in future be recited in English; and that the oath taken by students upon their matriculation, to observe all the statutes of the university, is to be abolished. I beg pardon: I am not certain that I am correct in saying that an English sermon is to be substituted for a Latin one. No, I am wrong about that point. I see that the Concio ad Clerum is still to be in Latin. It was proposed that it should be in English; but, on a division, it appeared that the placets were 81, and the non-placets were 102. The only real alteration of the slightest importance which has been made, is the abolition of the oath taken by students on their matriculation, to observe all the statutes of the university. I think that nothing can be more objectionable, than to call upon young men of seventeen or eighteen years of age to swear that they will observe a set of statutes which they know nothing about. The getting rid of that oath is certainly an improvement; but it is the sum total of the reforms made at Oxford, after incessant labour for a long time. I believe that, if the Noble Duke were to look into the matter, he would think that this alteration has been most accurately described in a paper which has been published in the university, and from which I will read a single extract:—" It is merely an affectation of doing something, when nothing is really intended to be done."

I have been told, however, that the university is now doing something on the 15th chapter of their statutes, which affects the discipline of young men in statu pupillari. I do not, however, anticipate much benefit from that. No one who is acquainted with that university will deny that there is a great aversion to all change in those personages from whom any change in the discipline of the university must originate; and when we know that every change proposed must be assented to by the convocation, and when we see the members of that body voting as they usually do, what hope can we entertain of any great and salutary reform? I will give your Lordships a specimen how some of the suggestions as to things proposed to be reformed have been received by that learned body. A proposal was made to abolish the obsolete custom which gave to the proctors the power of appointing two masters of arts to chaunt the litany, and of imposing on such masters of arts as refused a fine of 5s. This proposal was opposed by sixty-eight persons. I mention this to show that there is no chance of any great improvement emanating from such a quarter. Forty-eight members of the convocation have also voted against a proposition to abrogate a rule which has fallen into desuetude for the last 150 years. These are, however, minor matters. The principal object for which I now rise is, to complain of the illegality of the proceedings of the University of Oxford against one of its most learned and pious members — Dr. Hampden. I will not enter into the question, whether alterations of the statutes ought to originate with the hebdomadal board, or with the house of convocation; for I am prepared to argue the total illegality and incapacity of the university to alter the statutes without the consent of the Crown. The code of statutes by which the University of Oxford is now governed, was passed in 1636, and is called the Laudian or Caroline Code. The circumstances under which that code was passed were these: — About two centuries ago, from the variety of charters which had been granted to the university by several of our monarchs, and from the variety of statutes which had afterwards been grafted upon them, all the rules and laws of the university had got into a state of great confusion. In the year 1631, the then Chancellor of the University was anxious to reform its statutes, and get them consolidated into one code; and delegates were appointed, at his instigation, for that purpose. The Earl of Pembroke died soon after; and, on his death, the celebrated Laud was appointed Chancellor. He set about the work commenced by his predecessor with great zeal, and after the labour of two or three years completed it. Few of the statutes which he provided for the university were newly drawn up; they consisted principally of the old statutes, arranged so as to form one code. Charles I. was very anxious that they should be adopted. They were therefore tried for twelve months, and having been approved by the university at the end of that time, were formally sent down to it with great form, the great seal being attached to them. A Secretary of State and several other officers of high rank were sent to Oxford with them, and were received with great ceremony by the authorities of the university. I ought to have mentioned, that previously to this an Act was passed, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, incorporating the members of the university under the title of the masters, fellows, and scholars of the University of Oxford, confirming to them all their previous charters, and all their former rights. On the Laudian statutes being sent down to them, they surrendered all their former charters, and received the Caroline Charter as the charter by which they would, in future, be governed. Now, if this be so, if this be the governing codex of the university, the next point to be settled is, whether there is, in that codex, any power reserved to the university to alter its statutes. I find, in the body of the statutes, many expressions forbidding any such alterations. In an original letter which Laud sent down to the university with the statutes, in 1636, there is a paragraph in which he stated, that they were to have legitimam vim, the force of law, for all legal purposes apud posteros, perpetuò, for coming generations for ever. Again, there were expressions to the same effect in the letter which Charles I. sent to the university on the same occasion, and it was therein stated, that all former statutes, contrary thereto, were repealed. These terms, I repeat, were sent down to the university, and were accepted by it with great form. It was expressly provided, that there should be no power of altering any of the statutes without a special licence from the King himself. There was also a whole chapter on matters which were called indispensable, in which it was expressly stated, that no dispensation or change should be prayed for, with respect to any statute or decree which had received the Royal authority.

I know it has been contended, that those provisions of immutability relate only to some particular statutes — the Caroline statutes, as they are called. But such is not the fact. The prohibition of making any alteration is not confined to those statutes; and the natural construction is, that it must apply to the whole. But it will be said, that there are certain provisions in the statutes for making necessary alterations; and it does singularly happen that, in the Caroline statutes themselves, which have always been held to be unalterable, there is a similar power given to different persons of setting matters right, if there should be any "dubitatio" on the subject. It is important also to observe what has been the feeling of the university itself. The statutes were passed in 1636, and for 120 years from that time only seven new enactments, or supplements as they were called, were made, and every one of them came literally within the permission given for making necessary alterations. Now, in 1640, a new statute passed for regulating the Arabic lecture, which had just been founded; in 1662, another supplementary statute was passed — the only one which affords any justification of the modern practice — and the object of that statute is to require two declamations, instead of one, before taking a degree. In 1708 there was another statute for regulating the poetical lecture, then first founded. In 1738, another for extending to the sons of Scotch and Irish peers the same honorary indulgences enjoyed by the sons of English noblemen: — another, in 1757, for regulating the appointment and remuneration of the officers of the press; and another, in 1758, for regulating the Vinerian professorship. In 1759, some dispute having arisen with respect to these statutes, the opinion of Blackstone, who had just been appointed the first Vinerian Professor, and of two counsel, Morton and Wilbraham, was taken; and it was supposed, from their opinion, that the university had the power to make statutes. Up to 1758 only seven alterations were made, which really and truly were no violation of the statutes, without the Royal licence. These seven were placed as an appendix to the corpus statutorum; but, from that period, a body of alterations, almost as large as the statutes themselves, was introduced in the nature of additions. In the next thirty-six years there were no less than fifteen additions; and so the university has gone on up to the present time. I should have mentioned, as a strong confirmation of the opinion I have given, that, in 1637, the very subsequent year to the passing of the statutes, Laud gave a body of laws to the university of Trinity College, Dublin, containing an express prohibition to make any alterations, and the consequence is, that from that time to the present they have continued the same absurd forms which were in use in those days.

There appears very good ground to suppose, that up to 1759, the university felt that, under what I contend was a proper understanding of those provisions, they had no power to alter any essential part of those statutes without the Royal assent. It may be said, it is wholly absurd to suppose that a corporation of this nature would accept of statutes which bound them so stringently against the adoption of any alteration; but this happens, in fact, every day; and in petitions presented last year on this very subject, it was contended, in accordance with this view, that neither the universities themselves, the heads of houses, nor the visitors — nor even Parliament itself, had the power to make any alteration. This, I am certain, affords a complete justification of the view I take upon the matter. The steps which were adopted last year against Dr. Hampden were, therefore, perfectly illegal. There was a statute passed, some time ago, without any authority from the Crown, which repealed two chapters of the statute, stated in the margin as being part of the addenda. One of those chapters directed that the Regius Professor of Divinity should be one of those to appoint the select preacher, and the other directed that the Regius Professor of Divinity should be one of the persons appointed to try matters of heresy, in case any heretical doctrines were preached in the university. It is said both of these statutes were in the addenda. I contend the whole of the addenda are irregular and illegal, inasmuch as they are additions to the original statutes; and therefore I see no harm in repealing them. It seems to have been customary for the university, in altering parts of any statute, to repeal the whole, and transfer any portion of it they wished to retain, to the addenda, word for word as they appear in the original statute. Now, the section of the chapter which enacted that the Regius Professor of Divinity should be one of those appointed to choose the select preacher, was only to be found in the addenda, and I do not complain of its repeal; but the other, depriving him of the power to sit at what is called the board of heresy, was transferred from the original statute to the addenda, and the university had no power to repeal it. The university have, therefore, I contend, violated that statute in the insult they have offered to Dr. Hampden. Without any accusation having been made, they acted as, at once, the accusers, the judges, and the executioners. Dr. Hampden was living quietly in Oxford as Regius Professor; a convocation was called, a great stir was made, the greatest activity was used to get up the people from all parts of the country, and coaches drove into Oxford with men to give their votes, who, to my certain knowledge, knew little about the matter, and never read a single word of Dr. Hampden's works, save and except the extracts which his enemies circulated against him. I believe I can prove that at the bar. Those men came up to the convocation and passed the statute, by which they declared that some of Dr. Hampden's writings contained such theology, res theologica, that the convocation had no confidence in him,—Dr. Hampden never having been summoned nor heard in his own defence. Indeed, one of the speeches at the convocation, made by the Warden of Merton, concluded thus:—"Where is the accuser? Where is the accused? What is the accusation?" Dr. Hampden was not only excluded from being one of those to appoint the select preachers, but also from sitting at the board of heresy. The conduct of the university, in that respect, was illegal; nor are their late proceedings less illegal in reference to a general revision of the statutes.

But I may be charged with inconsistency; first, in urging the university to undertake the work of self-reformation, and then complaining of them when they do so. The whole difficulty might easily have been removed if the University of Oxford had applied to the proper quarter. But they have proceeded in an irregular, illegal, and most improper manner; and I conceive it is the duty of her Majesty's Government to take some steps in order to vindicate the prerogative of the Crown with respect to Dr. Hampden, as having been appointed by the Crown to an office of so much importance and dignity. No doubt, it may be said, if Dr. Hampden has suffered any grievance, he should seek redress for himself; but the remedy is so cumbersome and so expensive, that, with limited means and a large family, he does not choose to resort to it. After the statute passed, no notification was given to him, and although he sent his protest to the Vice Chancellor, no notice whatever was taken of it; but the Vice Chancellor thought proper to stick up an advertisement in Brasenose College, of which he was principal, that no candidate for orders, however well conducted or meritorious, should have a testimonial if he attended Dr. Hampden's lectures. Luckily, this conduct has been counteracted by the determination of two of the bench of bishops, their rule being to require testimonials of having attended the lectures of the Regius Professor of Divinity. Those are the grounds on which I found my motion. But there is another point of view in which the proceedings of the university, if not technically, are morally, illegal. I have felt it to be my duty, on more occasions than one, to animadvert on the way in which oaths are taken at Oxford. They would rather, it is said, be turned into the world houseless and penniless than break an oath. Well, the observance of the statutes is enforced by repeated oaths. Up to the other day, every matriculated member of the university swore to observe them; every B.A., and M.A., and D.D. bound himself by repeated oaths to observe them; and yet those repeated oaths were violated by the proceedings to which I have alluded. In consequence of some observations on this topic, the most singular statements on the subject have been put forth in the university. In a paper which has been published at Oxford without the name of the writer, who, however, is well known there, it is stated, that I have accused the members of the university with violating these oaths; but that I referred to statutes which have become obsolete. Thus, it appears that, although they have sworn to obey them, their becoming obsolete, in the opinion of the writer, is a sufficient ground for not observing them. It appears, however, that in many parts of the statutes, it is declared, that if any leading persons in the university suffer any statutes or laws to become obsolete from not observing them, they shall be considered as guilty of perjury. On this subject I will also refer to an article in a recent number of the Quarterly Review, on the subject of these oaths. By whom this has been written I do not know, but any one who has read the letter of Mr. Whewell will be struck with the similitude of style and argument between the two. In that article there is the following extract:—

> And they should understand, also, the nature of an oath. We cannot here point out all the errors prevalent just now on this important subject; but, in the case of a trust requiring the constant adaptation of fixed rules to changing circumstances, under the necessary promise of adherence to those rules themselves,—if one thing more than another can relieve the conscience, and remove the difficulties of the trustee, even where the greatest changes may be required, it is an oath. A promise to man ties us down to one fixed act, from which we cannot swerve, because man cannot see our heart, or provide for contingencies, or judge us with discretion; but an oath restores us at once to that Christian liberty which, in all cases of difficult conduct, is absolutely necessary—but most of all amidst the multitude of duties and relations involved in the functions of the universities. In very, very few cases is the administration of an oath anything but an error and an evil; but in the commission of such a trust as this it is absolutely necessary, to enable men to act as they must act, sometimes even in opposition to the verbal will of their founder, but at all times under the eye of God.

That is the language of the Quarterly Review, the organ of the Church and the Universities. Talk of popery, indeed! it is nothing to this! The pope is said — I do not know how truly — to release a man from his oath; but at Oxford, according to this doctrine, every man is his own pope, and may release himself from any oath whenever he thinks fit. Apologising for detaining your Lordships at such great length, I beg leave to move that there be laid before this House a copy of the protests delivered by Dr. Hampden to the Vice Chancellor of Oxford, on the 8th day of November, 1836, and the 28th day of November, 1837. I hope the Government, having had their attention called to this subject, will take some step to vindicate the prerogative of the Crown, and set Dr. Hampden right.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I feel myself bound to object to the motion of the Noble Earl. In point of form, that motion cannot be made, and I do not know to what end it can be directed. But I do not solely object to it in point of form, — I object to it also in substance. The object of the Noble Earl's motion is to bring this subject under the consideration of the House, with a view to a prosecution by the authority of her Majesty's Government of the University of Oxford. That is the object of the Noble Earl's motion. If the Noble Earl had given notice of his intention to address the Crown to direct that Dr. Hampden, as an individual, should be prosecuted, his motion might be more in form; but the intention avowed by the Noble Earl is that the University of Oxford shall be prosecuted on account of these transactions. That is an interference, not only with the affairs of the university, but with the Crown, which, in my opinion, this House ought not to move in. Your Lordships ought certainly not to take such a step upon a subject of this description. If you were to take such a step with a view to a prosecution of the University of Oxford, and there should afterwards be an appeal to this House in consequence of such prosecution, I should like to know in what situation the Noble Earl would stand in this House when such appeal came before it? Under these circumstances, I am quite sure your Lordships cannot adopt the motion on the grounds stated by the Noble Earl. I cannot help thinking that the last part of the Noble Earl's speech is almost an answer to the first; because, if the Noble Earl contends, as stated by him in the latter part of his address, that the university has no right to alter these statutes, upon what ground, I should like to know, does the Noble Earl blame the university for not having made the alterations which he is of opinion it ought to make in the statutes and conduct of the university, as stated by him in the commencement of his speech?

Before I sit down, I trust I shall be able to show that the university has the power of altering its statutes; and on the part of that university I must say, that, for a long time, the convocation have had under their consideration the alterations which ought to be made in those statutes; that the work of alteration was commenced by them in the course of last term; and that they are proceeding with that work as fast as they can proceed with propriety, and at the same time with attention to the other duties they have to perform. Besides, I can tell the Noble Earl, in answer to the first part of his speech, that, in all the colleges in which it is in the power of the governing body, — whether assisted by the visitors or not is not essential, — but that, in all those colleges where it is in the power of the governing body to make alterations in the statutes, they have those statutes under their consideration, with a view to make in them such alterations as may be considered just or requisite. They have had the subject under consideration during the few months that have elapsed since the close of last Session; and, at the expiration of a few months more, during which there will be comparatively much more leisure to devote to it, I hope I shall be able to inform the Noble Earl that some progress has been made in the work of alteration The Noble Earl has entered into a long detail upon the subject of the statutes of the University of Oxford, in order to prove that the convocation of that university have not the power of altering those statutes. Now, I believe that there is no corporation in this kingdom which has had the power of making its statutes for a longer period than the University of Oxford. It is perfectly true that, in the reign of Charles I., a revision of those statutes became necessary; that a commission was employed to revise and consider them; that they agreed upon what course they should adopt in the year 1634; and that, in the year 1636, — and not immediately after, as stated by the Noble Earl, — the King sent down a letter confirming those statutes, and containing the clause adverted to by the Noble Earl, and which he contends has the effect of preventing any alteration in those statutes, although they create expressly a power of enacting, interpreting, or altering statutes, but at the same time forbidding the exercise of that power in case the statutes were sanctioned or confirmed by Royal authority. The Noble Earl pretends that these words referred to the whole code of statutes passed, as he has said, in 1634, and confirmed in 1636. But it is well known in the university that the prohibition of altering statutes extends solely to those statutes which have been sent down to the university by the King himself, which, in fact, have been made by the King, and which are directed to be carried into execution under very different circumstances, and in a very different form of words from those statutes which form the subject of the code in general. This is a matter perfectly well understood in the university, which always has been understood and acted upon in the university, from the year 1630 up to the present time.

The Noble Earl has stated that, in the year 1640, a statute was passed respecting the establishing of an Arabic professorship by the Chancellor Archbishop Laud. But surely, if it were understood, at that time, that a statute could not be altered, abrogated, or interpreted, excepting with the consent of the King, Archbishop Laud would have asked his Majesty's consent to the enactment of this statute, passed at so early a period as 1640,—that is to say, within four years after the period at which those statutes were confirmed by his Majesty, and as the Noble Earl has said, under the great seal. It happens that the Caroline statutes were confirmed under the great seal; but the general code of statutes was not so confirmed. There is one general letter applying to the whole, which I hold to be under the great seal, though not in the same form as the Caroline statutes. There were other statutes subsequently passed, and by those who were perfectly well acquainted with the transactions of 1634 and 1636; but there never was heard expressed a doubt of the power of the University of Oxford to make alterations and promulgate statutes until a very late period, when the subject came under the consideration of Mr. Justice Blackstone and certain other judges, in the year 1759. Mr. Justice Blackstone said, that—

> The great corporate body of the university (which is a thing entirely distinct from our private eleemosynary collegiate foundations) has the same rights and powers, and is subject to the same regulations, as other bodies politic are. All corporations have an inherent and inseparable right (included by law in the very act of incorporating) to make by-laws or statutes for their own domestic government, provided such by-laws are not contrary to the charter of incorporation, or the general law of the land. . . . With respect to any prohibitions contained in the former statutes, it is certain that no corporation has power to make a statute or by-law abridging the legislative power of their successors, who have the same right to repeal as the predecessor had to enact, any more than one Parliament in being can make an effectual Act to abridge the power of a future Parliament. Therefore any academical statute or by-law which seems to assume such a power, is either void in itself, or at least voidable, and subject to repeal by any subsequent academical legislation. "Et cum lex abrogatur, illud ipsum abrogatur, quo non eam abrogari oporteat."—Cic. ad Attic. III. 23.

"The consequence," he goes on, "of these positions, pursued to their full extent, is clearly this,—that such a prohibition as is contained in Tit. x. sec. 2. § 2., against repealing former statutes, or explaining them, without licence from the Crown, is contrary to the first principles of law and reason, and therefore void; or, at least, is itself liable to be repealed in general, or suspended in any particular instance. If it be contended that the Royal confirmation of June 3, 1836, made the whole body of statutes from that time unalterable, let it be considered that this confirmation was superadded at the request of the Chancellor, only (see the letters patent) two years after the publication of the statute of which the prohibitory clause is part, and therefore never could be referred to by the makers of that clause. And if successors cannot be precluded from their right of legislation by any act or consent of their predecessors, nor by any other means, unless by the authority of Parliament (which every lawyer will allow), much less can they be precluded by the mere voluntary supervenient act of the Crown, without the concurrence of the body."

The EARL of RADNOR.—In what capacity was that opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Blackstone? Was it in a case of law?

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—I am not able to inform the Noble Earl. It has been put into my hand as the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone, and the Noble Earl can refer to it himself. I have no doubt whatever the opinion was given; at all events, I rely upon it, and I believe it to be law, or, at least, the law upon which the university has been acting. I admit that, at the period when this opinion was given, there must have been some doubt with respect to the right of the university to alter or make their statutes; but, at the same time, there can be nothing more clear, nothing more reasonable, nothing more just, than the opinion to which I have referred, and upon which I rely as being the law of the case. I must say, that the Noble Earl himself, the House, and the public generally having called upon the universities, both of Oxford and Cambridge, to consider their statutes with a view to their alteration, and having before them such opinions as those of Mr. Justice Wilmot and other judges, it does appear rather extraordinary on the part of the Noble Earl, now to come forward and say, that they have no right whatever to make any alteration in their statutes; that, obsolete though they may be, — inconvenient and unreasonable though they may be, — yet, that alter them they must not, because certain words in the Caroline statutes contain a prohibition against their alteration. The Noble Earl, having made that assertion, then addressed your Lordships respecting a gentleman, in reference to whom I am anxious to say as little as possible. The late King was advised to appoint that gentleman to be Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford. There can be no doubt that the general opinion of the university was, that that gentleman's theological tenets were not exactly orthodox or consistent with the articles of the Church of England,—an opinion which the publication of certain works by that gentleman has tended to establish.

Several persons in the university considered it their duty to petition his Majesty, praying, if the appointment had not been completed, that he would not make it. I believe that another address was presented to his Majesty, entreating his Majesty not to sanction that appointment, which, however, was made, contrary to the views of the university at large; and a short time afterwards, Dr. Hampden thought right, in his inaugural lecture, to state that he then felt it his duty to explain the opinions which had been complained of. I do not pretend to be a judge either of those opinions or that explanation; but this I will venture to say, and I believe your Lordships will concur in the opinion, that in proportion as Dr. Hampden found it necessary to give an explanation of his sentiments, in the same proportion were those justified who thought proper to disapprove of them. I believe it will be admitted that, if a clergyman who published certain opinions, not being orthodox, thought proper to come forward and explain those opinions, at least they who were opposed to such opinions had some justification, on their being repeated, for the course they had taken in disapproving of them. This is all I wish to say respecting the opinions and explanation of Dr. Hampden. His appointment having been made, notwithstanding the petition of a vast number of the clergy of Oxford, and the general opinion expressed there that it should not be made, a request was preferred to the heads of houses that they would propose some measure to the convocation which would have the effect of marking the disapprobation on the part of that body of the opinions and appointment of Dr. Hampden. The Noble Earl has alluded to the act of convocation excluding Dr. Hampden from being one of those to appoint the select preachers, and also from sitting at the board of heresy. I am not disposed to say any thing against Dr. Hampen; but this I must say, that, considering the whole transaction, my opinion is, the convocation did as little upon that occasion as it was possible to do, consistently with the necessity which existed of taking some notice of that gentleman, his opinions and conduct. Since that period, I really believe that the university, and the bishops of the Church of England, and all the persons who have any influence on this question, have done every thing in their power to put it down and prevent it becoming a subject of discussion, even in the university or elsewhere. For myself, I can say, I have invariably pursued that course, it being my object to prevent any discussion on the matter; and I never should have mentioned it, here or elsewhere, publicly, if the Noble Earl had not forced it upon me on the present occasion. I certainly lament the transaction, principally because I consider it is likely to produce a schism in the church; and I have been as anxious as any man can be in my situation to prevent the university from proceeding upon the subject in such a manner as may, by possibility, lead to that result.

The Noble Earl adverted to the conduct of a gentleman who is now Vice Chancellor of the university, and who has, in his capacity of head of a house, prohibited the attendance of the students in divinity upon the lectures of the Regius Professor. I do not at all pretend to be competent to mark the difference between the private and public lectures of the Regius Professor; but I certainly do not approve of the course taken by that gentleman. In my opinion, the question is not one to be considered by the head of a house; for, in fact, no ordination can be conferred by him or the Regius Professor of Divinity. Ordination can only be conferred by the bishops of the Church; and whether the students attend the lectures of the Regius Professor of Divinity, or those of the Margaret Professor, or of any other professor, I will say, it is the duty of the bishops of the Church to consider who are the persons coming for ordination, and whether they are qualified or not, without taking into consideration the certificates of the Regius Professor of Divinity, the head of a house, or any other individual. It is, I contend, the duty of the bishops to examine into the subject themselves, without reference to the certificate of any individual whatever. I must observe, however, with regard to the course adopted by the Vice Chancellor, that I am thoroughly convinced, not only from what that gentleman has stated to me, but from my own knowledge of that gentleman's conduct, and his character for candour and fairness, that he had the very wisest motives in pursuing that course from which he departed as soon as he found that the bishops of the Church had determined upon observing a different line, conceiving that he was then relieved from all charge and responsibility in the situation which he held. Such is the history of that transaction; and I have only to say, with respect to that gentleman, and with respect to others of the University of Oxford, that it was their anxious wish and desire to avoid taking any step in reference to Dr. Hampden, lest it should, in any manner whatever, lead to what they would consider the greatest possible misfortune — a schism in the Church.

I think I have answered the greater part of what has fallen from the Noble Earl. He thought proper, at the end of his address, to read a letter, and likewise an extract from a magazine, neither of which, I can assure the Noble Earl, I ever heard of. It is impossible for me to say, whether I concur or not in the opinions they contain; but, if I conceived they were at all of the nature which the Noble Earl has described, they certainly could not be more abhorred by him than by me. Without meaning any disrespect to the Noble Earl, I think the proper course for the House to pursue will be to reject the motion.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg leave to say a few words, by way of protest, against that part of the Noble Duke's statement with regard to Dr. Hampden, in which he asserted that the explanation given by that gentleman, of the opinions previously put forward by him, afforded a justification of the charge which has been made against him on account of those opinions. As well may it be said that I, in giving the fullest and most direct contradiction to a statement which has been put forth of my having committed a breach of good manners in suddenly quitting the royal dinner table, and in declaring that there was not a shadow of foundation for that statement being made, — that it was the coinage of the imagination of some person who had attempted to justify that allegation, ——

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!" from several Noble Lords.]

This only shows the truth of what I alluded to the other evening in reference to my Noble Friend (Viscount Melbourne), — the utter inutility of any explanation, or any denial of a calumny which it suits the purposes of any party to circulate.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA. — In reply to the observation of the Noble and Learned Lord, I beg to say that what was said by Professor Hampden was stated only in explanation, and not in contradiction, of the opinions contained in the pamphlet which had called forth animadversion on the part of the university. Moreover, that explanation did not satisfy the great body of the university, who originally took the matter up. With regard to that gentleman's appointment, it was well known at the time that his religious opinions were about to be made the subject of public animadversion in the university of Oxford. The university has, in my opinion, acted with great leniency towards the learned doctor, under the circumstances; and, as it appears to me that the object of the Noble Earl is to bring that individual's conduct before your Lordships, I sincerely hope you will coincide in the opinion expressed by the Noble Duke, that it is inexpedient on the part of this House to entertain such a proposition, and reject the motion of the Noble Earl.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I certainly do not think that there is anything to be condemned in the writings of Dr. Hampden. They are upon points of extremely recondite and difficult scholastic learning. Very few of your Lordships, indeed, have the means of forming any sound opinion upon such extremely nice, abstruse, and obscure points as those.

With respect to an intimation that was made to me upon the subject, from the university of Oxford, it seemed to me to have been made by persons who were utterly ignorant of the writings of Dr. Hampden. I know very little upon the subject, and yet I believe I know more than those who have opposed the doctor's nomination. I do not, in the slightest degree, conceive that there is anything to be understood in the writings of Dr. Hampden which is contrary to the doctrines of the Church of England. The Noble Duke has expressed the unfavourable opinions entertained at Oxford of Dr. Hampden; but I considered that he was the most worthy gentleman in the university to fill the vacant chair,—both from his learning, and his extent of knowledge. Upon his appointment, he gave, in an inaugural lecture, a statement of his opinions; but whether that statement contained a retraction or explanation, it is undoubtedly not for me to say. I believe it to have been an explanation of his opinions, entirely doing away with the charge which was brought against him; I believe it to have been a complete explanation, showing that those opinions were entirely consonant with the articles and doctrines of the Church of England. But, then the Noble has Duke said, that they were contrary to the opinions of a majority of the University of Oxford. But I cannot admit that that majority possesses any power to settle such disputed points, for the opinions of reformists are contrary to those entertained by a great majority of the University of Oxford. If these latter opinions had been generally entertained at the period of the Reformation, I believe that the Protestant religion would never have been established in this country. The opinions of Mr. Locke are contrary to those of the majority of the University of Oxford; and I beg leave to say, that if the opinions of that majority had alone been consulted, everything liberal, everything noble, everything free and ingenuous in this country, would undoubtedly not have been established in it. It was not my intention to take any part in this debate, and I have now only to say a word or two respecting the motion of my Noble Friend. It is, as I understand, for the production of a protest delivered by the Vice Chancellor of Oxford against the opinions of Dr. Hampden. I will not say whether it is within the competency or power of the House to grant this paper, or any paper of the same nature. I will not say that circumstances may not render such a thing expedient, but it is very unusual to ask for such a document, inasmuch as we have no way of enforcing its production, if refused, except by treating the refusal as a breach of the privileges and authority of this House. Conceiving, then, that my Noble Friend only makes this motion for the purpose of bringing the subject under discussion, I would submit to his discretion, whether it would not, under the circumstances, be better to withdraw it?

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.—I should not have risen to say one word upon the motion, were it not for an observation which has fallen from the Noble Viscount the First Lord of the Treasury. I am certain that the Noble Viscount did not mean any disrespect to certain persons who waited on him relative to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the Regius Professorship, when he stated that they appeared totally ignorant of the subject. I will not say whether I am ignorant of theology or not, or whether I am more ignorant of it than the Noble Viscount professes to be; neither will I now allude to the opinions of Dr. Hampden. Those opinions were announced in several publications, and I believe they gave dissatisfaction in various quarters. They were, however, of a totally different character from the opinions which produced the Reformation and the views of Mr. Locke. The question was, were the opinions maintained by Dr. Hampden consistent with the doctrines of the Church of England? Upon this point I will abstain from making any observation, now. I will not attempt to go into the subject. But I felt it my duty to make some representations to the First Lord of the Treasury upon the appointment; and I appeal to those Ministers who were in power previous to the present Ministry—I appeal to the Noble Duke and to a Noble Friend of mine who has just left the House, if I ever, upon any occasion, stood in the way of any man's preferment in the Church? Nothing but a sense of duty could induce me to remonstrate against this or any other appointment; but Dr. Hampden having against him the great majority of the university, many also of the ablest divines, I do not think that my conduct ought to meet the ridicule of the Noble Earl. There is so much contradiction in the Noble Earl's observations in his complaints respecting facts, that I feel much difficulty in understanding him. He says, that on some points there was a majority in the university for Dr. Hampden, and complains at the same time that he was in a minority. The Noble Earl at one time insists that the statutes must be altered, and then declares that they cannot be altered, because there is a statute that makes them unalterable. Then he proceeds to the case of Dr. Hampden. Had I known such to have been his intention before coming into the House, I should have endeavoured to dissuade the Noble Earl from such a course. Is it likely to do any good? Would it not be better to pass it over in silence? For my part, I have done every thing in my power to soften the matter in the university. The Noble Earl read a passage from a review. What right has he to assume that that review is the organ of the Church? What right has he to assume that certain sentiments must speak the feelings of the University of Oxford, because he has found them expressed in a publication? Similar sentiments may be entertained in an Oxford newspaper, or in some church magazine, of which there are many; but are such publications therefore to be called the organs of the Church? The Church has very different organs, and I hope it will adhere to them. I will not trouble your Lordships further than by again disclaiming and utterly protesting against that justly celebrated publication, the Quarterly Review, being considered the organ of the Church.

The EARL of RADNOR. — I beg just to observe, that it is generally understood that the review from which I have quoted speaks the sentiments of the Church. The truth is, that the doctrine laid down in the review is adopted in practice by the university. That doctrine is, that by an oath a person binds himself to God, and not to man. It is all very well to say that it would be more discreet to observe silence on the case of Dr. Hampden; but it should be recollected that he is the party injured, traduced, and insulted. I believe him to be as honest, as virtuous, and as honourable a man as any living. I have no doubt that all the hostility to him in the university arises from his having advocated the admission of the Dissenters. His theology was never censured before. On the contrary, he was appointed to the Professorship of Moral Philosophy. With respect to the alterations made in the statutes, I think that getting rid of the oath is a great advantage, but the subscription as now insisted upon is more objectionable than it was before; because persons even under the age of twelve are called upon to subscribe, and that as to matter of faith, not merely as to opinion or reason. As I have said my say on this subject, I will for the present rest satisfied, and will, by leave of the House, withdraw my motion.

The motion was then, by leave, withdrawn.

WEST INDIA SLAVERY.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Seeing my Noble Friend the Colonial Secretary in his place, I wish to ask him when it is likely that he will be able to lay upon the table of the House the Returns for which I have moved?

LORD GLENELG. — I am happy to be able to answer satisfactorily the Noble Lord's question; for, having the Returns in my hand, I will now lay them upon the table.

The Noble Lord then laid on the table an Account of the value of all Exports to the British colonies in the West Indies, and to the Mauritius, for ten years, ending the 5th of January, 1837; distinguishing the years and the colonies. — Delivered (pursuant to an order of the 12th instant), and to be printed.

On the motion of the DUKE of WELLINGTON, an Account was ordered, showing the amount of monies which would have been applicable to the Civil Government in England if the hereditary and temporary revenues of the Crown enjoyed by his Majesty King George II. had been enjoyed by succeeding Sovereigns, distinguishing their reigns; that is to say, by his Majesty King George III., from the 25th of October, 1760, to the 29th of January, 1820; by his Majesty King George IV., from the 29th of January, 1820, to the 26th of June, 1830; and by his Majesty King William IV., from the 26th of June, 1830, to the 21st of June, 1837; and in each reign distinguishing the receipts of each year, and distinguishing, also, the hereditary and the temporary revenue of the Crown respectively; showing, also, first, the amount of the annuity received by their late Majesties in lieu of those revenues; secondly, the amount of monies granted by Parliament for the discharge of the civil list debt during the said period; and, thirdly, the difference to the nation upon the balance of the said account, in respect to each reign, so far as the same can be ascertained.

Copy of warrant granting compensation to John Munro, ordinary macer of Court of Session (Scotland): and, also,

Saltash Floating Bridge. — Petition for Bill referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. SPEAKER, acquainted the House that John Wood, and the other electors, who petitioned this House upon the 6th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Sligo, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of an Act passed in the ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty, King George IV., intituled, "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Trial of controverted Elections, or Returns of Members to serve in Parliament."—Order for considering petition on Thursday, the 15th day of February next, read, and discharged.

Mr. SPEAKER also acquainted the House, that Samuel Hart, and the other electors, who petitioned this House upon the 6th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Belfast, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act. — Order for considering petition on Tuesday, the 13th day of February next, read, and discharged.

Mr. SPEAKER also acquainted the House, that James Stewart, and the other electors, who petitioned this House upon the 6th day of December instant, complaining of an undue election and return for the city of Waterford, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of the said Act. — Order for considering petition on Thursday, the 8d day of May next, read, and discharged.

EVESHAM ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. GODSON. — I beg leave to give notice that, on the 6th of February, I shall move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the unparliamentary and fraudulent manner in which the petition against the members for the borough of Evesham was concerted, and the sureties became bound in their recognisances.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I object, Sir, to the terms in which the Honourable Gentleman has framed his notice, because I hold them to be highly informal and improper. The notice assumes the fact, that the petition referred to has been got up in an unparliamentary and fraudulent manner; and I apprehend that no notice ought to be given which, at once, prejudges the question on which it bears.

SIR JOHN HOBHOUSE. — I certainly think that the terms in which the notice is given are very unusual, and admit of modification. It would answer every purpose which the Honourable Gentleman has in view if he would strike out the words which go to attach a certain character to the Evesham petition.

Mr. GODSON. — I beg leave to say, that I should not have given such a notice had I not known the facts to be as I have stated them; and therefore I do not see why I should alter the terms of my notice.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I quite agree in the view which has been taken by the Honourable Member for Finsbury (Mr. Wakley), and by my Right Honourable Friend the President of the Board of Control (Sir John Hobhouse). I would, therefore, suggest to the Honourable Gentleman the propriety of striking out the words "unparliamentary and fraudulent."

The SPEAKER. — The feeling of the House always has been that, with reference either to election petitions or any other matters, it is highly improper to adopt any proceeding or to use any language the effect of which may be to prejudge a pending inquiry before a committee of the House. It is, therefore, for the House to decide upon the admissibility of the words now objected to.

Mr. GODSON. — Seeing the feeling of the House is against me, I will withdraw the notice, and will reframe it in the course of the evening.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

MUNICIPAL BOUNDARIES BILL.

"To settle the boundaries and wards of certain cities and boroughs in England and Wales," presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Friday, the 16th day of February next, and to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have agreed to Municipal Officers' Declarations Bill, with amendments.

ANNUITY TO HIS R. H. THE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND, NOW KING OF HANOVER.

MR. HUME. — I beg leave to give notice that, on the third Tuesday in February, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill to suspend the payment of the annuity of 6000*l*. granted by 46 Geo. III. c. 145., and 47 Geo. III. c. 39.; and of the annuity of 15,000*l*., granted by 1 Geo. IV. c. 108., to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, now King of Hanover, so long as his Royal Highness shall continue to be King of Hanover. I give my notice in the way I have done, because I understand the rule of the House to be, that no notice shall be given for any day falling beyond the fourth notice day from the date of the notice.

The SPEAKER. — The notice of the Honourable Member cannot be received, because we do not know to what day the House will be adjourned.

Mr. HUME. — Then, to remove all difficulty, I will give notice for after the recess.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I give notice that on Saturday I will move that the House adjourn till the 1st of February.

MALTA.

Mr. HUME. — Soon after the House met, I inquired of the Under Secretary for the Colonial Department, whether any objection existed, on the part of Government, to lay on the Table of the House the reports of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the grievances of the Maltese. I now wish to ask the Honourable Gentleman in what state the reports are, and when the House may expect them to be laid on the Table?

SIR GEORGE GREY. — I had expected they would have been ready for presentation before the recess. I am afraid they cannot now be laid on the table before the adjournment of the House; but, to obviate all delay, it is the intention of Government, on receiving them, to have them immediately printed for distribution among Honourable Members.

DUCHESSS OF KENT'S ANNUITY.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department whether it is the intention of Government to evade the motion of which I have given notice respecting the annuity proposed to be settled on her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent? I want to know if an opportunity will be allowed me of taking the sense of the House on it this evening?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The Government have no intention of evading the motion of which the Gallant Officer has given notice. I am anxious to bring on the Bill respecting the Duchess of Kent's annuity. I was in hopes that the Bill would have come on yesterday, and I attended with my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer shortly after four o'clock, in order to be present at the discussion. If the House will allow the Bill to come on to-night, the Gallant Officer's motion will be immediately considered; but if they are not prepared to do that, I cannot say when the motion will come before the House.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — The Noble Lord and the Right Honourable Gentleman ought to have recollected, that if a sufficient number of Members was not present, the House would adjourn, and ought, therefore, to have attended before four yesterday.

DR. HAMPDEN.

Mr. C. LUSHINGTON. — I beg leave to ask a question of the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department. The Noble Lord has doubtless seen in the public journals, a document purporting to be a protest signed by the Reverend Doctor Hampden, Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, complaining of the nomination, under the authority of the Vice Chancellor, of select preachers for the University, without his (Dr. Hampden's presence and concurrence, thereby, to use Dr. Hampden's own words, "violently infringing" on his rights as Regius Professor of Divinity. The Noble Lord, however, has probably official cognisance of the transaction; and, I would beg leave, therefore, to ask him to describe to the House what course of procedure the Queen's Government have adopted, or may propose to institute, for the purpose of vindicating the dignity of her Majesty, which has been thus grievously offended by the insult offered to her Majesty's Regius Professor of Divinity?

The SPEAKER. — Order! I beg to suggest to the Honourable Gentleman, that it is always desirable that Honourable Members, in putting a question, should make use of no expression calculated to lead to a discussion.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I can only say, that no application has been made to me by the reverend professor on the subject of the protest, nor, so far as I am aware, has such an application been made to any other Member of the Government. I may add, that it is not at present the intention of Government to institute any proceedings in consequence of the protest.

LATE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I understand

there is an impression that I stated, on the late discussion respecting compensation to the officers of the House for damage sustained at the fire in 1834, that the sum of 500*l.*, which the late Speaker claimed from the Treasury for certain articles of furniture then destroyed, was demanded in return for a sum of equal amount paid by the Speaker to the late Lord Chamberlain. Now, I could not have said this, being fully aware that the consideration given by the late Speaker to the Lord Chamberlain for the possession of the furniture was merely nominal.

SHERIFFS' COURTS.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — As I see the Attorney General is in his place, I beg leave to ask him whether the law officers of the Crown have any intention to bring forward a Bill to extend the jurisdiction of Sheriffs' Courts?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — The Lord Chancellor (in conjunction with the Judges) is now considering the subject. The Noble and Learned Lord has not yet arrived at any decided conclusion, but I can assure the Gallant Officer that I will communicate to him the Noble Lord's determination before the recess, and if the Noble and Learned Lord does not bring in a Bill on the subject, I will undertake that duty.

LANDLORDS AND TENANTS.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I wish to ask the Attorney General whether he means to bring in any measure to amend the law regarding landlords and tenants?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I have no intention to take the subject out of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's hands, but I shall be most happy to lend him every assistance in my power.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I must say, that hitherto I have derived no advantage from the Attorney General's assistance, except that of never seeing him present when the subject was under discussion.

NEWSPAPER STAMPS.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — I beg to move that the return of the number of stamps issued to newspapers in Great Britain and Ireland, ordered till the 1st of November on the motion of the Honourable Member for Marylebone, be extended till the 1st of December.

Mr. F. BARING. — A return up to the 1st of December could not be made out before the recess. I have not the slightest objection to extend the return to the latest date practicable.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — I will postpone my motion till to-morrow.

TITHE ON FISH.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department whether any report may be expected from the tithe commissioners on the present state of the tithe on fish?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I am sorry to say that very little progress has been made in examining this subject. The commissioners have met with very few cases of voluntary commutation in which the tithe on fish is concerned. The assistant commissioners have, however, been desired to report on every such case, as it would hardly be expedient to incur the expense of a separate commission to inquire into the subject. I will proceed to move the dropped orders of Wednesday, as I wish to bring on the Duchess of Kent's Annuity Bill,

COMMITTEE ON THE PENSION LIST.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether the Committee on the Pension List will meet before the recess? If its meeting be postponed till after the holidays, the commencement of the inquiry will be inconveniently delayed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I cannot answer the question at present.

LIMERICK COUNTY ELECTION.

On the motion of Mr. FRESHFIELD, debate resumed on question (19th December), that Edward Hallows Plumptree be called to the bar.

Question again stated. Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Plumptree called in, and examined, upon oath, by

Mr. FRESHFIELD and other HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Is agent for George Eyre Massey, in the petition against the late return for the county of Limerick. The petition against the return was lodged on the 4th of December. The recognisances were completed in Ireland, and forwarded to the Speaker in the usual manner. No objection was made to the recognisances, but a formal objection was taken to the petition on the ground that the affidavit of the sufficiency of the sureties was sworn to previous to the day on which the petition was lodged. The recognisances were quite regular. In strict practice the affidavit, as to the sufficiency of the sureties, should have been sworn on the same day that the petition was sent in. Was aware of this objection on the 5th of December, and wrote on that day to the agent in Ireland, stating that the objection had been made, but has received no answer. His object in writing to Ireland was to procure fresh affidavits to meet the objection. Did not apply to the examiner till the 8th, in the hope that he might have received the necessary affidavits from Ireland. Is not personally acquainted with the sureties.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I will now move that the entry in Journal (9th January, 1807, petition respecting Penryn election) be read.

Entry read accordingly.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — By the Journal entry, which has just been read, it appears that the House in the case there referred to granted a stronger measure of relief than I am now, in the Limerick case, about to ask. In the Penryn case the affidavits were sworn, and recognisances entered into, thirteen days before the petition was presented; and although this was a direct violation of the Act of Parliament, the House decided upon granting the relief required. Here, then, I have a sufficient precedent to justify me in the course I am about to adopt. Now, it must be borne in mind that in the present case the recognisances were entered into in the regular manner, the only objection being that the affidavit of sufficiency was sworn eight days before the petition was presented. I submit, then, that the only question for the House is, whether these parties who were solvent on the 25th of November were equally solvent on the 2d of December? The petition complaining of the return of the sitting Member was entered regularly in the Hanaper Office in Ireland, and the parties to this petition have, by every means in their power, shown that they are fully prepared to proceed with it. The same parties who swore the affidavits were entered as sureties, and are still willing to be so. I trust, under these circumstances, that the House will not consider the mere formal objection that has been raised sufficient to set aside this petition, and prevent the merits of the election from being made the subject of inquiry. The motion I will now submit is, "That the time for entering into recognisances in the case of the Limerick county election petition be enlarged till Monday, the 1st day of January next."

Mr. WOULFE. — The case which the Honourable Member has referred to is sufficient to establish this,—that the House, on an application being made in proper time, can grant relief even where greater errors have been committed than that which by the present motion it is sought to remedy. I admit that the case of 1807 establishes this. But, Sir, how stands the matter here? A fatal error has been committed. It was known to the agent on the 5th of December; and yet he does not come to the House for assistance until the fourteen days allowed by the Act for completing the recognisances are about to close. On the 18th of December he comes forward, for the first time, to ask the House to allow a remedy to an error, of the existence of which he was aware on the 5th — thirteen days before. The Honourable Gentleman opposite says that the mistake in this case is of no importance, and that the only question for the House is, have those parties who were solvent when the affidavits were sworn now become poor and insolvent? The Honourable Member is in error. The case is this: the affidavit, having been sworn before the petition was presented, is null and void, and is now in the hands of the examiner as mere waste paper. The making of the affidavit previous to the petition being presented subjects the party to no liability as regards such petition. In fact, the justice has no power to administer the oath except in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament. The question, then, is, — the parties having been aware that, in swearing affidavits which the Act would not recognise, they involve themselves in no responsibility, is there any ground to suppose that they are willing, now, to renew them at that stage of the proceedings which will render them valid? On the contrary, the delay that has taken place since the agent was informed of the error affords, in my mind, sufficient proof that they have refused to do so. I think, Sir, the House will concur with me in opinion, that the circumstances of the case now before them are such as will in no way justify them in extending the relief that has been asked.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I would propose to call in the witness, in order that we may know how it was that, having the knowledge of the error on the 5th, he did not make earlier application.

Mr. Plumptree again called in, and examined, upon oath.

The SOLICITOR GFNERAL. — You have stated that you were made aware of the objection on the fifth; why did you not apply to the House for relief sooner? —I wrote, on the 5th of December, to the agent in Ireland, informing him that I thought it probable that an objection would be taken; but I have received no answer from him since.

By the SOLICITOR GENERAL.— Might you not, by the usual course, have received an answer in six days? — Probably I might.

By Mr. AGLIONBY. — I told my correspondent in my letter, that he had better get another affidavit sworn, and forward it to me, and then I knew there would be no objection.

By Mr. LEFROY.— Thinks the original affidavit would have been sufficient when it was presented. Concludes, from not having received an answer from the agent in Limerick, that the letter has not reached its destination. Has no copy of the letter. Delayed making the application till the last moment, in order to receive the answer from Ireland. Not having received any answer, accompanied by new affidavits, on the last day allowed by the examiners, went before them upon the old. Would not have done so if others had arrived.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. GODSON. — This case is very similar to one that was brought under the notice of the House the other evening, when it was stated, that a person having two sets of recognisances, put in the bad first, and upon an objection being made, substituted the good. I hope the same rule will be applied in both cases. There is no other difference but this, that the objection, in the one case, was to the recognisances, whilst here, it is to the affidavit; we gave time then, and we ought to do the same now. All that the House requires is, the sufficiency of the recognisances; and it has been decided, in some half dozen election petitions emanating from the other side, that where there is no bad faith, or fraud, in the matter, the House ought to grant relief. I hope, therefore, we shall not, now, have it contended by Honourable Gentleman opposite, that the affidavit in this case is wrong, and that the House cannot enlarge the time in order to its being amended.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — The only question is, whether this is a case of gross negligence, or not? On the first blush of the matter, I certainly thought the indulgence of the House ought not to be granted; but, still, the House ought not to infer fraud, unless it is clearly made out. After having heard the evidence of the witness, I am of opinion that this case does come within the same principle as was acted upon in the Sligo case, namely, that the error was a mere oversight, and that it is in the power of the House completely to cure it. You cannot make an affidavit good in law which is bad in substance; but you can give farther time to correct any mistake. I do not think, however, that it is necessary to enlarge the time till the 1st of January, but so long only, as will enable the parties in Ireland to forward proper affidavits to London.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I fully concur in the opinion which, on a former evening, was expressed by the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair, namely, that in these cases we ought to adhere to the strict rule; but, having granted indulgence in various other cases, I can see no reason why we should refuse it in this. Here there appears to have been an error committed without blame being attachable to any party; and, although all such mistakes imply negligence, I do not think there is that degree of negligence in this, which would justify me in opposing the motion.

SIR W. FOLLETT. — I think we should better consult the character of the House by not entertaining these matters; and I am the more convinced of this when I see Honourable Gentlemen take different views upon the various cases, just as these happen to affect their own party. In fact, we cannot help considering these as party questions; they are treated as such, and the decisions we come to with respect to them are party decisions. I regret, much, that the House has interfered in such cases; for my own part, I would not grant indulgence in any one instance; but, as we have granted it in some cases, we cannot refuse it in others; and as it seems to me that the feeling of the House is in favour of the present application, I will not oppose it. I think that if such interference be justifiable at all, it is so in the present instance.

MR. WOULFE. — I contend that no case, calling for the interference of the House, has in this instance been made out. The agent has written to his correspondent at Limerick, stating the objection to the affidavits that had been put in, and requiring others, sworn in conformity with the Act of Parliament, to be forwarded to him. The time when he might naturally expect an answer has long since expired, and none has arrived. What other inference can be drawn, but that the sureties are unwilling to swear new affidavits? It does appear that not only neglect, but fraud, is manifested in this case. It would seem that the parties knew that the affidavits sworn to in November were useless, and that they are not now prepared to make such affidavits as would be valid and binding. We have no right to suppose that the letter sent by the agent here did not reach Ireland; on the contrary, we must conclude that it did; that the party to whom it was addressed received the letter; that he informed the sureties of the necessity for other affidavits, and that they refused to make them. I trust that the House will consider well before it decides upon granting its indulgence in such a case.

MR. G. F. YOUNG. — I can see nothing whatever in the case to justify the inference that the parties are unwilling to renew the affidavits. I agree, in every respect, with the view taken by the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter (Sir W. Follett), namely, that the House ought in no instance to deviate from the strict rule as laid down by the Act of Parliament; but, having already done so, we must deal out even-handed justice to all; and I think I can say that, having attended the discussions on the former cases, I do not remember one in which a stronger claim to the indulgence of the House was made out than in this.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I hope the House will adopt the opinion of the Solicitor General for England rather than that of the Attorney General for Ireland. The House has lost its character for strict adherence to rule; but it has still a character for consistency; and having granted indulgence in similar cases, it cannot refuse to do so in this. We must maintain a character for even-handed justice, and extend relief in all cases, or none.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — There can be no doubt that by due course of post, the witness might long since have received an answer to his letter. I acquit the witness of any fraudulent intention whatever; but I do say that strong grounds of suspicion rest upon the parties who concocted these affidavits, and I hope the House will not give its sanction to such proceedings by granting the present application.

MR. FRESHFIELD. — Supposing the affidavits to have been irregular, still the recognisances would have been binding on the sureties, against whose sufficiency no objection has been made, and in the event of the petition being declared frivolous and vexatious, the amount of whose liability could have been enforced. No intention of fraud can be inferred from the conduct of any party. The agent thought it prudent to write to Ireland in order to have the affidavit corrected, and thus the delay originated. The extension of time asked will inconvenience no one: the Speaker will not be detained in town, the affidavits will be sent from Ireland, and will be received through the proper officer. If we are, on the mere ipse dixit of an Honourable Member, to infer fraud, there will be no justice for any party who may come before us. I feel for the honour of the House as well as for its justice; and it is upon that ground that I hope it will not hesitate to grant the relief I now ask.

MR. MAULE. — Having paid much attention to this discussion, and to the evidence of the witness who has been examined at the bar, I am decidedly of opinion that this is a case in which the House cannot extend its indulgence. The Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter (Sir W. Follett) has lamented that the House has entertained these questions at all. He says, that he should have been glad if the House had refused to entertain any such applications, but that, having done so in some cases, he thinks we are bound, in order to preserve our consistency, to extend the same principle in all; and he has rested the right of the present petitioner on this ground alone. Now, however much the Honourable and Learned Gentleman may be dissatisfied with the House for entertaining such applications for relief, it must not be forgotten that it is the law of the land which confers on us this jurisdiction. The House must recollect that these applications are made under a clause in the Act of Parliament which gives the House of Commons the power to entertain them, and to grant relief where it is required. It is not more competent for the House to say, "We will abide by the strict rule, and will in no case entertain applications for indulgence," than it would be for us to say, "We will not entertain election petitions." In both cases the act of the Legislature has conferred upon us certain powers which we are bound to exercise. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman then says, that all these questions are brought forward and discussed as party questions, and that the decisions upon them are party decisions. Why, can we have a stronger proof to the contrary than in the present instance? Has not my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General, with that spirit of fairness and impartiality which always distinguishes him, declared that he shall support the motion for granting indulgence in this case, notwithstanding that the application comes from that party to which he is politically opposed? I do not say there was any bad intention on the part of the agent; but it cannot for a moment be doubted that there was great negligence, to use the mildest term. He has stated that he wrote to Limerick on the 5th of December; no answer was received; why did he not, knowing the urgency of the case, write again on the 12th, 13th, or 14th? I say, this is matter of gross negligence, not as to any matter of law, upon which some difference of opinion might exist, but upon a plain matter of fact.

The Sligo case has been referred to in the course of this debate, and it has been said by an Honourable Gentleman on the other side, that this case rests upon the same grounds. Now, I think there cannot be a more erroneous opinion. The Sligo case was fully inquired into, and I believe all in the House, with the exception of one Honourable Member on the other side, were convinced that the indulgence of the House could not, with any justice, be refused. The error that was sought to be remedied was upon a mere matter of legal form, with respect to which many lawyers entertain different opinions. In the Carrickfergus case, in which the two sets of recognisances were prepared, there was no application for relief, the good recognisances having been put in and accepted upon the others being refused. In all these cases we are bound to look at the facts before we grant indulgence, — we are bound to see whether the parties have been guilty of gross negligence, or not. Here is a case of gross negligence, not to say suspicion. The petitioner is a lawyer, and is bound to know something of the Act of Parliament; but, having discovered the error sixteen days ago, he does not think it necessary to apply to this House till the very last moment. I shall certainly give my vote against this motion, at the same time repudiating the idea that I am induced thereto by any party consideration whatever.

Mr. PEMBERTON. — I think the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down has somewhat misunderstood the meaning which my Honourable and Learned Friend near me (Sir W. Follett) intended to convey. My Honourable and Learned Friend did not contend that, because we have granted indulgence in one case, therefore, we are bound to do so in all others, without reference to the particular acts occurring in the various cases: but that it would have been far better had the House adhered strictly to the Act of Parliament in the first instance, instead of occupying its time in these most inconvenient and very unsatisfactory discussions; for it is notorious that, in cases similar to the present, the votes and judgment of Honourable Members are generally governed by their political feelings, and the justice or legal merits of the application for indulgence are seldom taken into consideration. There is, however, one principle which I think the Act of Parliament implies, — that is, if, in any case, a mere unintentional error has been committed, — an error that could be corrected without injury to any party, — the House might, in such case, extend its indulgence.

Here, then, is a case in point. Can any man say that the error, here, was committed for the purpose of fraud, or that it is more than a mere error of technical form? The sureties were solvent and sufficient at the time of making the affidavit, and their solvency and sufficiency are not disputed now. Why, then, should we refuse to permit them to give that formality to the affidavits which it is held by some, — though by others it is doubted, — are necessary to render them valid and binding upon the parties? Can any man say that there is the slightest ground for imputing fraud in this transaction? Can any man say that the sitting Member was, in any way, prejudiced by the affidavit being sworn before the time of presenting the petition? And would it be just or consistent for the House to say, "We will not entertain this application; we will not grant indulgence here, although we have done so in other cases of a similar nature?"

What was the ground upon which the House decided in the Sligo case? Was it not that a mere technical error had been committed which could in no way affect the case, and which, therefore, ought to be allowed to be set right? And was not the decision in the Dudley case on the same grounds? In that case, an error had been committed; but, as there appeared a boná fide intention on the part of the petitioner to prosecute the petition, and as the opposite party could not be prejudiced thereby, the House, on these considerations, thought fit to grant the indulgence required; and I may say, that if ever there was a case in which the House was justified in refusing the application on the ground of negligence, it was that of the Dudley petition. On one day an order was made, granting the relief required. That was not taken advantage of; but, on the following day, the party came again, and obtained another order for extending the time as to himself, as well as to the sureties to whom the indulgence had been granted by the previous order. Now, I contend that that proceeding was in direct violation of the statute which confines the power of the House of enlarging the time to enter into recognisances to one exercise, only, in any particular case.

The Honourable and Learned Member opposite has argued, that questions of this kind must not be considered as party questions, inasmuch as my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General has declared his intention of voting in favour of the present motion. I rejoice to say that, on all occasions, my Honourable and Learned Friend displays, not only sound judgment as a lawyer, but high honour as a senator, and that this is not the first time that my Honourable and Learned Friend has voted against the opinion of Honourable Gentlemen on his own side of the House when he has, conscientiously, differed from them. This, however, does not prove the absence of party bias with respect to other Honourable Members; neither does it show that Honourable Gentlemen opposite vote, in all cases, consistently with what they believe to be the law. If the House is of opinion that the indulgence was properly granted in the other cases, I trust that it will, for its own credit, rather than for any interest I take in this or any other such case, grant the present application, and that Honourable Gentlemen on the other side will not, for the mere purpose of serving their own political party, "vote that black is white, and that white is black."

Mr. JERVIS.— Seeing a disinclination to divide, I should not, but for the charge which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has brought against this side of the House, have offered a single observation. The Honourable and Learned Member has said, that his Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General is the only Member on this side who will give an honest vote on this or any similar question. Now, I beg to say, that I feel myself bound neither by the opinion of the Honourable and Learned Solicitor General, nor by that of the Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon. I fully agree that the House, having granted indulgence in certain cases, is bound to do so in all, provided that equally good reasons for doing so be proved; but, I apprehend that all applications of this kind must be brought forward upon two grounds, which must be proved before the House can grant the indulgence required. First, it must be shown that some actual mistake has been committed; and, secondly, that there has been no laches on the part of the person applying for time. My Honourable and Learned Friend may say, "Here is a case of actual mistake," and it may be perfectly clear that it is so; but then comes the question, whether there has been laches or not on the part of the individual who claims this indulgence. I think there has been. Between the present case and that of the Dudley election petition there can be no analogy, for in this not less than sixteen days have elapsed between the discovery of the mistake and the expiration of the time allowed for entering into the recognisances; whilst in the Dudley case the error was discovered and the application made on the same day, — that latter being the last for completing the recognisances.

The Honourable and Learned Member (Mr. Pemberton) says, that a second indulgence was granted in the Dudley petition, contrary to the provisions of the Act of Parliament; but what were the facts? The first indulgence was proposed to be granted according to the terms of an order which had previously been made in the Pontefract case, and which extended the time to the petitioner as well as to the sureties; but, by some error, the order in the Dudley case was not so filled up in the Votes. The petitioner was informed, that the relief granted to him was to the same extent as that which had been granted in the Pontefract case, and the error was not discovered till the following day. The time for completing his own recognisances having then expired, it was necessary for him to make another application to the House to amend their original order. It has been urged in the case now before us, that the delay has been occasioned in consequence of the petitioner's having been obliged to write to Limerick, and not having yet received an answer. He supposes that his correspondent at Limerick could not have received the letter. But, if it had been so, would the letter not have been returned to the writer long since? And, knowing how important it was to obtain proper affidavits, would he not have written again and again, until he had received some answer or other from his correspondent? Yet he suffers sixteen days to elapse without either making application here, or taking means to ascertain whether his letter had miscarried or not. And, with these facts before him, the Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon contends, that there is no laches, and that Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House are giving a party vote in opposing the application!

Mr. ELLIS. — I am not about to enter into a discussion as to whether these applications are taken up as party questions, or not. I stated, on a former occasion, that I did not consider the Act of Parliament permitted us to grant indulgence in cases of neglect, and if this motion should come to a vote, I shall give mine in its favour, because I do not think that any neglect has been shown. The petitioner considered, in the first instance, that the affidavits were sufficient; but, on finding that they were informal, he took the proper means to obtain others: they have not yet arrived, and for that reason he asks that further time may be given. No objection has been raised to the sufficiency of the sureties, and I can see no reasonable ground for refusing the application.

SLIGO COUNTY ELECTION.

On the motion of Mr. ORMSBY GORE, debate on question (19th December), "That the time for Colonel Perceval to deliver in a particular of his qualification be enlarged till Tuesday, the 2d day of January next," was resumed. Question again stated.

Mr. WOULFE. — All that in this matter was objected to, on this side of the House, was, that the Honourable and Gallant Member (Colonel Perceval) should not be placed in a better position than he would have been in had the application for indulgence never been made. I have looked into the case since last evening, and as I do not consider that his position will be in any way altered by the present motion, I do not feel it necessary to offer any opposition.

The question was then put, and agreed to.

PORTARLINGTON ELECTION.

Debate resumed on question (19th of December), "That Mr. Potter be called to the bar." Question again stated. Question put, and negatived. Order for consideration of petition on Tuesday, the 29th of March, read, and discharged.

Mr. HUME. — I hope that the result of these applications for relief in election petitions, will induce her Majesty's Government to take steps so to alter the existing law, that, in future, all such matters as have now occupied the attention of the House for three days may be settled by the officers of the House out of doors.

COMMON FIELDS IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Second reading fixed for Wednesday, the 7th of February.

SUPPLY.

Committee to-morrow.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.—POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

Second reading to-morrow.

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITY BILL.

Mr. F. BARING.—It would be a great convenience if the House would permit the committee on the Duchess of Kent's Annuity Bill to be proceeded with at this time.

Mr. HUME.—I must decidedly object to the Orders of the Day being brought forward until the notices, which have precedence, have been disposed of.

Mr. F. BARING.—I can only repeat, that it would be a great convenience to the Government, if the House would allow the committee on this Bill to take precedence. I know that the Honourable and Gallant Member for Lincoln has a motion to bring forward by way of amendment to this Bill; but I do not think that much time would be occupied in the discussion. We are, of course, in the hands of the House; and if there is any objection, I will not press the matter farther.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—I hope the House will proceed at once to read the Order of the Day for going into committee on this Bill. I have given notice of two motions connected with it, which I propose to submit on the motion being made for the Speaker's leaving the chair. I am anxious that these should not be deferred.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—It would certainly be a great matter of convenience if the House would proceed with the subject at once; and I think, if the Gallant Colonel's motions will not extend to a long discussion, we might go into this order, and afterwards proceed to the notices of motion.

The SPEAKER.—With regard to the motion of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Lincoln (Colonel Sibthorp), I, of course, know nothing of it but from the terms in which it is drawn up on the paper. It is for the Honourable and Gallant Member, however, to consider whether it is not a fit subject to be considered in the committee; and if so, I would submit to him that it ought not to be brought forward as a resolution, but rather as an instruction to the committee.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—I am always anxious to pay the greatest respect and deference to the Chair; but in the present matter I wish to make two distinct motions apart from going into committee, and I shall certainly take the sense of the House upon them. I am the more decided in this course, because, from what I heard the other night, when this subject was under discussion, and from the fact of there being no House yesterday, there appears to me to be every disposition, on the part of the Government, to throw me over on these motions.

Mr. FIELDEN.—I rise to order. I have a very important motion standing first on the paper for to-night; and I want to know on what grounds I am to be prevented from bringing it on in due course?

LORD HOWICK.—If the Honourable Member for Oldham is determined to proceed with his motion, now, of course the Order of the Day must be postponed until after the notices of motion have been disposed of, when, if the Honourable and and Gallant Member for Lincoln shall consider that there is a fair opportunity of discussing his motion, he will have an opportunity of submitting it. I can assure the Honourable and Gallant Member, that there is not the slightest intention, on the part of the Government, to throw over his motion, as he expresses it. The circumstance of there being no House yesterday was as great a disappointment to the Government as to himself.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—As the Noble Lord gives way, I must, of course, wait until the other motions are settled; but it is probable that that will be at a late period of the night, when the House will not be full, and when, perhaps, the Noble Lord will be absent.

HAND-LOOM WEAVERS.

Mr. FIELDEN.—I rise, according to my notice, to call the attention of the House to the petition of the hand-loom weavers, which I presented on the 11th of December, and which was ordered to be printed. That unfortunate class of persons are suffering from the greatest distress; and although it is now between four and five years since their case was first brought before Parliament, no means have yet been adopted to afford them relief. I feel convinced that this House does not fulfil the duties which properly belong to it, when it neglects to protect those who form the most valuable portion of the community, and who produce every thing necessary for our comfort and wellbeing. No wonder that there is a feeling abroad that the interests of the working classes are neglected—no wonder that a cry is raised for an extension of the suffrage, when those who are now entrusted with the power of making laws so grossly abuse the trust so reposed in them. For years, the attention of Parliament has been drawn to the sufferings of these men. The expectation has been raised that their misery would cease, or, at all events, be mitigated; but they now find that nothing is to be done for their relief, and they almost despair of obtaining redress. Can this be called a Christian country, in which the men who labour for twelve or sixteen hours a day in producing articles indispensable to the comfort, convenience, and luxury of the upper and the middle classes, can procure but three halfpence a head per week for food and clothing? Notwithstanding their peaceable demeanour in submitting to their sufferings, their wretched situation is never regarded by this House, which ought to be, what it has proved itself not to be, an assembly representing the people. Well, then, I maintain that it is the duty of those who sympathise with these ill-used men, to take such steps as they deem necessary to attract that attention to their case which it so strongly and justly demands. I, for one, am resolved to take a decided course on this subject, though it may be called factious, and found inconvenient. It should be understood that the hand-loom weavers contribute to the burdens of the State; they pay taxes on every thing they consume, and on every article they wear. Unless there is some assurance that measures will, at an early period, be undertaken for their relief, I shall feel it my duty to exercise that privilege which as a Member of Parliament I possess, and whenever a motion is made to grant a supply for the public service, I will always divide the House against it, upon the ground that you have no right to tax persons in such a miserable state of distress, until you have done something to better their condition. All the facts connected with this subject were proved before the committee of inquiry upon the recommendation of the Report of the second committee, which is now upon the Table of the House, and which I would recommend to the perusal of every Honourable Member who is not already acquainted with the extent of the misery which this ill-treated, but very industrious and useful, class of the community are suffering. A Bill was brought into Parliament in the course of the last Session but one, but it was met by a direct negative from the Right Honourable Gentleman on the Treasury Bench. Then, last July, a motion was made for an address to the Crown, praying for the appointment of commissioners to go down to the manufacturing districts, for the purpose of ascertaining the state of this body of people, and to supply some remedy for their grievances. That motion was carried against the express wish of the Ministers nearly six months ago, and I have not yet heard that the commissioners have gone forth, though the weavers are starving, and daily dropping into the grave from want of food. Such conduct on the part of her Majesty's Ministers does not tend to show that we have a paternal Government, or a Government at all alive to the welfare of the working classes; and, if for no other reason than their gross inattention to the distresses of the hand-loom weavers, I maintain that the present Administration is unworthy of the confidence of the country. Petitions have been presented from quarters, and from persons, of all political sentiments, praying that the distresses of the hand-loom weavers may be considered, and some means devised for their relief; and in every instance they have been disregarded. I hope, however, that the House will yet do something to rescue this large class of their fellow-subjects from the depth of misery and distress in which they are now plunged, and that, to that end, the motion I am now about to submit will be supported by Honourable Gentlemen on both sides of the House. I beg, now, to move the following resolution:—"That there is in this kingdom an immense body of hand-loom weavers suffering unparalleled distress, and that this distress arises from the unprecedented low rate of wages that the weavers are paid for their work, and from the heavy taxes imposed by this House on the food and other necessaries of life, a sufficiency of which their wages should enable them to purchase; that the work which a large portion of these weavers execute consists of articles indispensably necessary to the personal comfort and convenience of the higher and middle classes of society, or of articles exported to foreign countries, and there exchanged for luxuries and necessaries, to increase the affluence and comfort of those classes; that it is therefore the interest, as well as the duty of the representatives of the people in this House, immediately to devise and enact such laws as shall either raise the wages of these distressed weavers to a scale adequate to maintain them comfortably, or that shall so reduce the taxes imposed on the necessaries of life, and so alter the mode of collecting such taxes, as that no part of the wages paid to these weavers shall be abstracted from them, by either direct or indirect taxation on those necessaries."

Mr. HESKETH FLEETWOOD. — In rising to second the proposition which the Honourable Member for Oldham has submitted, I have but a very few remarks to offer. Considering the long time which has elapsed since the motion for the appointment of a commission of inquiry was carried, I think it highly desirable that some cheering assurance should be given to the distressed hand-loom weavers, particularly in the present severe season, that their sufferings are not utterly disregarded. It should be borne in mind, that, notwithstanding the severe privations which this class of persons have suffered, they have not entered into any combination trenching on the liberty of others, neither have they created any disturbances; but have borne their distresses with the utmost patience, and they are obliged to work for fifteen hours a-day at the loom, in a damp and unwholesome atmosphere, even for the small wages they receive. I, myself, saw one family eating bread in a hot state, and the mother told me that they did so because a less quantity of bread in that state sufficed, not to allay their hunger, but their cravings for the moment. In supporting the motion of the Honourable Gentleman, I feel bound to say that I do not see how wages can be increased by any legislative enactments; but I consider that it lies more within the power of the House to relieve the distresses of the hand-loom weavers by reducing the taxes on the necessaries of life.

Upon the question being put, —

Mr. MARK PHILIPS said: — Representing, as I do, a large number of these people, and having, myself, presented several petitions praying that some measure might be devised for alleviating their distresses, I could not but regret my inability, in consequence of severe illness, to attend when the commission alluded to by the Honourable Member for Oldham was agreed to. Although knowing the great objections to it, — and the little benefit that could be expected from such a proceeding, — had I been in the House, I certainly should not have been amongst those who voted for it. There is no one more interested in the condition of the hand-loom weavers, or more anxious to relieve them, than myself; but I have no hesitation in stating, here, as I have stated publicly in the town I have the honour to represent, that I differ from many in the means of doing so. Since the Honourable Member for Oldham gave notice of the motion which he has this night brought forward, I thought it my duty to communicate with those parts of the country where the distress presses most heavily; and the result of my inquiries is a settled opinion, that any attempt on the part of the Legislature to regulate the price of labour will fail and be totally ineffectual. To show in some degree the extent of distress that prevails amongst these people, I will, with the permission of the House, refer to some extracts from a document which I have received; namely, certain weekly accounts which are laid before the Manchester board, of the number of this class of persons who have applied to them for relief. These reports were taken at the several periods, the 11th of August, 1837, and December 15, 1837, and are as follows:—

Weekly board sitting, Aug. 11, 1837.

Weekly board sitting, Dec. 15, 1837.

76 families, consisting of 275 persons, equal to 3½ persons per family. Average relief per family, 2*s.* 3¾*d.*; average per head, 7½*d.*

The petition to which the Honourable Member for Oldham has referred, states that the distress has been felt more during the present than in any preceding year. This is in a great degree owing to the weavers being employed in the manufacture of a species of article peculiarly adapted to the American market; and that market having lately failed in consequence of the late commercial embarrassments, the diminished consumption is of course immediately felt by the classes engaged in the manufacture. As regards a minimum of wages being fixed by Act of Parliament, my opinion is, that if any Bill were to pass for that purpose, the first persons who would feel the inconvenience, and would wish to break through its enactments, would be the weavers themselves. There is no class of operatives in the community who experience such frequent and severe privations as the hand-loom weavers, because no interest is felt by those who employ them to maintain them during the period at which the demand for their labour temporarily ceases. Supposing, then, that such a law were to pass, the weavers would find, when a period of distress had arrived, that they would be unable to procure any employment whatever, because the state of the market would not allow their masters to give them the minimum of wages which might be fixed by Act of Parliament. In such a case the weavers would gladly, rather than remain idle, consent to work for a less rate of wages than that fixed by law. Knowing that this would be the result, I cannot give my consent to any proposition for establishing a minimum of wages. With respect to the other proposal which the Honourable Member's motion involves, I will say, that I shall at all times be most ready to join in any endeavour to give relief to the hand-loom weavers by a reduction of taxation. Although, myself, connected with the landed interest, I cannot forget what is due to the trade and commerce of the country. I have, therefore, always shown my sincere desire for an alteration of the corn laws. So great is the competition carried on by the Continental and the American with the British manufactures, that I feel convinced, unless some steps be taken to alter those laws, the distress which the hand-loom weavers now labour under will soon extend to the cotton manufacturers. I shall therefore be most ready to join in any attempt to reduce taxation, commencing with that tax which I consider the most harsh of all,—the tax on bread. There is another circumstance bearing immediately on the state of trade. The evils of the late commercial crisis were, in my opinion, materially augmented by the proceedings of the Bank of England; and there is something in the constitution of that establishment which appears to me to operate most injuriously upon the interests of trade, and of the country generally. I have always remarked that the rate of wages is materially affected by the state of the currency, and I think some inquiry upon this subject would be attended with great advantage. The late transactions of the Bank of England with America have also affected the trade of this country, and I hope to see such alterations, or such openness, in the proceedings of that establishment, as will in future give greater confidence to the country. I have felt it my duty to state the difficulties which stand in the way of a remedy for the evils which exist; but I think the commissioners should immediately proceed with their labours, when I hope something might be done at least to mitigate the distress which prevails. I fully concur with the Honourable Member for Oldham as regards the general good conduct of the hand-loom weavers, and am as anxious as any man can be to relieve them; and if any distinct mode of doing so can be pointed out, it will give me great pleasure to support it; but at present I do not see any; and I cannot reconcile it with my duty to vote for a proposition which I believe to be founded in error.

SIR E. WILMOT. — Sir, I do not think that the Honourable Member who has just sat down has given any answer to the petition that has been presented, or to the propositions of the Honourable Member for Oldham. The hand-loom weavers do not seek for charity, nor any relief which they have not a right to demand. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have always advocated the cause of those deserving, but unfortunate, persons. I know that at this moment there are many thousands of them in a state bordering on starvation. They do not, and never have, complained of their condition, until compelled to do so. What they say is, that they have not a fair return for their honest labour. They have nothing to do with the condition of America: their complaint is of the system of free trade which has been adopted; by which France is enabled to undersell them by one third in the price of the description of goods which they manufacture. This, combined with the progress of machinery, is the cause of the distress which prevails amongst the hand-loom weavers, and I can speak from my own knowledge that the extent of that distress is so great that the House would hardly credit me if I were to attempt to do that which is impossible, — adequately describe it. I admit that this is a difficult subject; but the misery prevailing amongst this class of our artisans calls for some measure of immediate relief. One thing ought to be kept in the recollection of the House, which is, that the hand-loom weavers cannot go into any other trade; they are incapable of employing themselves in any other occupation; and when there is no employment for them at their looms the greatest distress must ensue. I have received a petition for presentation from the hand-loom weavers of my own district; but I have not been able to find an opportunity of calling the attention of the House to its prayer. I will, however, take an early opportunity after the recess to present the petition, and to bring the subject under the consideration of the House.

Mr. HINDLEY. — This is a question in which I feel the deepest interest; but as a commission has already been appoited, I will detain the House but a very few moments There are two points on which, I think, all are agreed, namely, the greatness of the distress, and the patience with which it has been borne. The distress cannot, in my opinion, be exaggerated, and I do believe it is such as this House is very little aware of. I think there is one other point on which all are agreed, and that is, the difficulty of finding a remedy. The remedy proposed in the first part of the resolutions of the Honourable Member for Oldham, namely, a fixed rate of wages, is, in my opinion, no remedy at all, and would, in fact, prove injurious instead of beneficial to the hand-loom weavers. When an application was made to me, in Manchester, on this subject, I said that I could not acquiesce in any such proposition. Were such a resolution passed into a law, and a minimum of wages established, in times of distress the manufacturers would give no employment, and would tell the weavers that they could not do so because of the necessity of paying them a certain sum for their labour. The minimum would be more than the manufacturers could afford to give when there was no demand for the article, and the effect would be that the operatives would have no work at all, and distress, if possible, greater than is now felt—would ensue. The hand-loom weavers do not desire charity: all they desire is justice. If we cannot benefit them, at least we can avoid doing them injury. It has been said, that they ought to go into the factories. How is this practicable, when the Government have sent down commissioners, Messrs. Mummeridge and Baker, to force the agricultural labourers to enter into competition with them. In vain do the poor hand-loom weavers make application at the factories for employment for themselves or for their families. The only result is, that they lose their time. Not so the agricultural labourer. A contract is entered into for them by the commissioners, and they are employed at once. But is it fair in the Government thus to bring another class into competition with the hand-loom weavers, when those individuals are already suffering such misery from want of employment and the low rate of wages? In my opinion, such a proceeding is both unfair and unjust. The causes of the prevailing distress are, I think, obvious. The first cause, in my opinion, and I think it will be found by the commissioners that I am right, is the present state of the corn laws. I hope the commissioners will direct their attention to this point, and if it is found that the present system of corn laws does contribute towards the sufferings of the hand-loom weavers, I trust the House will be ready calmly to investigate the evil, and to remove it. The second cause of the distress is, the improvements which have been made in machinery. It is impossible, I allow, to turn back, and I feel that machinery has been of the greatest advantage to the human race. I should, however, be glad if the management of it could be so conducted as that, while it tended to ameliorate the first curse that was pronounced upon mankind, it would cease to act so prejudicially upon particular classes of the community. Another cause of the distress of the hand-loom weavers is, the influx of the Irish poor. There are vast numbers of the Irish poor in Manchester who contend for bread with the English weaver. I by no means object to their right to do so. On the contrary, I think we ought to make them welcome, and by every means to better their condition. Yet, certainly, the effect of their coming and entering into competition with the resident weavers is,—to distress the latter, and to render their condition almost as low as their own. But what must be the effect upon them if the Irish Poor Relief Bill passes into a law? By four clauses of that Bill we are going to make beggary a crime in Ireland, subject to various terms of imprisonment. What will be the effect of that? It will force numbers of the Irish out of their country; they will come here, enter into more severe competition with English weavers, and increase their distress. We shall, indeed, treat this industrious class of our population with gross injustice if, being unable to find a remedy for their grievances, we adopt a measure which must materially aggravate them. From what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Manchester, I collect that that Honourable Gentleman intends to agree to the motion of the Honourable Member for Oldham; for the Honourable Member for Manchester has acknowledged the justice of the second proposition which is involved in the resolution, that the distress is in a great measure owing to the heavy taxation to which the food of the weavers is subjected. To that point I wish to pin the Honourable Member for Manchester and the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, as I conceive it impossible to remedy the evil without attending to it.

Mr. P. HOWARD. — The extent of distress which exists among the hand-loom weavers is unquestioned, and there can, I think, be little doubt that the chief cause of that distress is the improvements which have been made in machinery. The hand-loom weavers have, however, one advantage over the power-loom weavers and other operators, which is, that they can select their hours of labour, which they would not be able to do were they in factories. I have risen, however. simply to express my sympathy for these men; at the same time I feel that a repeal of the corn laws would not be an advantage to them, as such a measure would have the effect of throwing a large portion of the land out of cultivation, and thereby forcing into the factories a still larger number of the agricultural population. Undoubtedly great differences of opinion exist upon this subject; but, in my judgment, any material alteration of the corn laws would not only fail to relieve the hand-loom weavers, but would be attended with general inconvenience. I think the present motion is premature, as we ought to wait for the Report of the commissioners, and when that Report is laid on the table, we shall be able to legislate with full information on the subject. Such being the case, I trust the Honourable Member for Oldham will for the present withdraw his motion.

Mr. DARBY. — I would also suggest to the Honourable Member for Oldham the propriety of withdrawing his motion. The first proposition contained in his resolution is perfectly untenable; and as regards the second, namely, that the hand-loom weavers shall be exempt from taxation, the Honourable Member must see that it would be quite impossible to carry it into effect. It is complained that the hand-loom weaver is not protected from the effects of foreign competition, while, on the other hand, it is proposed to take from the agriculturists all the protection which they enjoy; and thus to relieve the one class at the expense of the other. The result of such a plan would be to throw large tracts of land out of cultivation, and to introduce an extent of distress among the agricultural labourers equal to that which the weavers are now suffering. I trust that no system so unjust will receive the countenance of this House.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — I hope that the Honourable Member who has brought forward this motion has done so rather for the purpose of giving Honourable Gentlemen an opportunity of expressing their sympathy for the objects of it, than with any intention of dividing the House upon it. If, however, the Honourable Member does intend to divide upon his proposition, then I shall feel it my duty to move the previous question. One of those propositions states facts of which the House has at present no knowledge; the other recommends a species of vague relief that it would be impossible to afford. It is very easy for any man to gain a character for humanity by dwelling on the harsh and severe conduct of Government, or of this House, by representing that they are unwilling to inquire into distress, or to apply to that distress a remedy; and by intimating that he alone is disposed to commiserate and to relieve the distressed. I utterly deny the existence, on the part of this House, or on the part of the Government, of an indisposition to consider the distress of any portion of the people; or to apply to that distress a remedy, if a proper and adequate remedy can be discovered. Why does not the Honourable Member for Oldham propose some distinct and specific remedy which might be fully and fairly discussed? Why does he not make some direct proposition on which all might express their sentiments and stand a chance of coming to a just and practical conclusion? I repeat that there is no indisposition on the part of the House, that there is no indisposition on the part of Government, to take into consideration any specific proposition on the subject, and to adopt it, if it should seem likely to be beneficial. But what is the Honourable Member for Oldham's vague proposition? That as the House has declined fixing a minimum of wages, they should lower the general taxation in such a manner as to exempt the individuals in question from contributing to it. I should like to see that proposition put into a definite shape. How could it be accomplished? Is it to be provided that persons who do not earn such or such wages are to pay no taxes? To attempt that object would be to alter the whole system of our taxation. A large portion of that taxation—all, for instance, which comes under the heads of customs and excise—is indirect. How, with reference to those taxes, could such a proposition be carried into effect? But, upon the strength of making such a proposition, the Honourable Member for Oldham exclaims to the weavers, "My friends, I am the only person who wishes to relieve you; others are hard-hearted, and will not take your case into consideration." Now this is mere delusion,—although I do not think it will take,—which I feel ought to be exposed; and therefore I will take the liberty to expose it. The Honourable Member for Oldham said that it was my duty, both as the representative of Manchester, and as holding the situation in the Government which I have the honour to hold, to satisfy the wishes of the individuals who are the subjects of the motion. Now, I will not yield to the Honourable Member for Oldham in the sincerity of my desire to relieve the unfortunate persons in question, if any rational or practical mode of furnishing that relief could be devised. But I do not believe that any legislative measure can be adopted by which that relief could be afforded. It was on that ground that I opposed the appointment of a commission of inquiry. I opposed it because I thought it likely that the appointment of such a commission would raise delusive expectations which it would be found impossible to satisfy. And not seeing that any practical good could be derived from such a commission, I opposed its appointment. The House, however, has decided otherwise. And the evil I then apprehended has occurred: but the responsibility rests not with me, but with the House.

A Member. — With the last House.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — With the last House. The commission having, however, been appointed, I shall deem it my duty to do every thing in my power to render it effective; and I hope that the result of the Report of that commission will, at least, set the question at rest. The Honourable Gentleman complained of the delay in the proceedings of the commission; but he ought to have remembered that the address to the Crown for its appointment was carried only at the close of the last Session. The commissioners are anxious to obtain all the information possible, and to conduct the inquiry to the most satisfactory conclusion. But the task they have undertaken is, by no means, an easy one; and, as the hand-loom weavers are scattered over almost every county in the kingdom, the progress of the inquiry must necessarily be slow. The House, however, may rest assured that they will proceed with all the despatch that the circumstances of the case will admit of, and that all the information it may be in their power to collect will be communicated without loss of time. With respect to the immediate cause of the distress that exists amongst the hand-loom weavers, I think it must be attributed to the great disproportion between the number of labourers and the demand for their labour. I do not think it arises so much from competition, because it exists in places where no competition has been attempted. Neither do I think that the transmigration of seventy or eighty agricultural families into the manufacturing districts, which contain an aggregate of 800,000 hand-loom weavers, would decrease their employment so materially as to cause distress amongst them. My opinion is, that the distress is caused by the trade being overdone. It has been the practice for men to take as many apprentices as they could get, in order to make a profit of their labour; and thus this branch of manufacture has become overstocked with hands. I do not deny that there may be other causes, nor do I deprecate the introduction of the corn laws as a topic in the discussion. Indeed, I believe that if we had admitted corn form other countries, we should not have seen rival manufactories springing up in them; and instead of exporting the mere raw materials, as we do now, we should have been sending our woven articles abroad. With regard to machinery, I believe that it has a tendency to cause a great demand for manual labour, after the temporary influence such a change must necessarily produce has subsided. Under all the circumstances, I think that the only course the House can pursue will be to wait for the Report of the commissioners; and if that Report suggests any remedy for the relief of this class of persons, I shall be most ready to support it.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I have heard the speech of the Right Honourable Gentleman, who is not only President of the Board of Trade, but a representative of that large manufacturing town, Manchester, with great surprise. The Right Honourable Gentleman has admitted the evil, but he says, "Wait till we see the Report of the commissioners before we do anything." Why, does not the House know that two or three years may elapse before that Report will be made? The commissioners are, at present, in a happy state of incubation; but it is a matter of great uncertainty when they will hatch. The Right Honourable Gentleman has said it is difficult to find men to undertake the office of commissioners for this inquiry. Why? I can see no difficulty, unless a certain test has been laid down, and they are told, "If you go into this inquiry, you must abide by this doctrine; but if you entertain a different opinion, we desire you will not engage in such a task." I cannot see how any difficulty can otherwise arise. A man might soon make up his mind as to the existence and extent of the distress, though it might not be so easy to come to a decision as to the cause of it.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON.—Hear, hear!

Mr. WAKLEY.—The Right Honourable Gentleman cheers me, ironically; and why? "Because," says the Right Honourable Gentleman, "we wanted men of almost superhuman judgment,—men who could find out the cause as well as the effect." Why, does not every one know the cause? Every man, nay, every child almost, is perfectly aware of the cause of the distress, and that the House has no remedy for it. The Right Honourable Gentleman has talked of the corn laws, as if an alteration of them would relieve nearly all, if not the whole, of the distress, by that interchange of trade with other countries that might thereupon take place. But, has he intimated that he is prepared to bring forward any measure to effect that desirable object? No; therefore he is but one of Job's comforters. The Right Honourable Gentleman has found out the misery; but nothing is to be expected from him, or from the House, in the shape of a remedy for it. How can that misery be removed while the country is groaning under the present load of taxation, the burden of the national debt, and the evils that flow from paper money? Is there likely to be any relief when this House can vote away 385,000*l.* for the Civil List expenditure? Such recklessness in disposing of the public money is fitly reproved by the distress which the people are suffering. It seems to appear before us as if to convince us of our injustice to the working classes, and to make us blush for the course we have been pursuing. Why not take off the tax on industry, and put it on property? The poor have not caused this country to enter into any expensive wars for the destruction of liberal opinions; neither have they derived the slightest benefit from the result. I believe that, unless the people constantly tease this House with petitions, and urge their claims with unceasing importunity, they will never get redress.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG.—I am one of those who gave my consistent support to the late Honourable Member for Lanark, in all his motions upon this subject. As regards the commission which has been appointed in consequence of the address of last Session, I believe that the object of that commission is not so much to inquire into the quantum of distress that exists, as into the cause of such distress, with a view to some remedy being applied. If the Honourable Member for Finsbury thinks that the commissioners have been trammelled by the Government, why does he not move for a copy of the instructions given to them. The Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has spoken of competition not being a cause of the distress; but the competition which is most complained of is not that alluded to by the Right Honourable Gentleman, but the competition of machinery. As to the transmigration of agricultural labourers into manufacturing districts producing little or no effect, the Right Honourable Gentleman should recollect, that when the supply and the demand are equal, a very slight addition thrown in on either side must give it the preponderance. I cannot concur in the opinion of the Right Honourable Gentleman, that machinery will increase employment for the weavers, who, in fact, are the parties suffering; but it will doubtless give more work to a different class of artisans. I hope the Honourable Member for Oldham will not place the cause, and those who have always advocated it, in a false position, by pressing his motion to a division, whilst the question is still in course of investigation before a commission.

Mr. HUME.—I concur with some parts of the resolutions of the Honourable Member for Oldham, but not with others; and I hope that, under the circumstances, he will consent to withdraw his motion. I believe that the distress is caused by low wages, the high price of provisions, and heavy taxation. Little doubt can exist, I think, on this head; and the Government have the remedy in their hands, if they think proper to apply it—namely, the repeal of the Corn Laws; though it is not to be supposed that a measure for that purpose would at once be successful, when we consider how strong the influence of the agricultural interest is in this House. The Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department stated, the other night, that he would not extend the election suffrage, because he wished to give a preponderance to the landed interest.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

The Noble Lord certainly said he was aware that the Reform Bill had given the preponderance to the landed interest, and he did not wish to lessen it by any further extension of the franchise. I am sorry the Noble Lord is not in his place, to vindicate that observation (which he repeated on the occasion to which I allude), in order that there might be no misunderstanding about it. If, therefore, I have made a wrong statement, I shall be obliged if the Noble Lord will take an early opportunity of contradicting it. I am of opinion that the distress of the labouring classes is caused by unequal taxation. It is a fact that they pay 76 per cent. of the taxes, and that the rich do not pay in equal proportion, and according to their ability. I fully concur with my Honourable Friend the Member for Finsbury, in the observation he has made, with reference to the lavish expenditure incurred by the Civil List, and I contend that one part of the motion of the Honourable Member for Oldham, calling upon the House to do that which is within its power, namely, to reduce taxation by a legislative remedy, ought to pass. Give the people but an honest House of Commons, — I mean a house composed of men of political honesty, who are ready and anxious to legislate for the many and not for the few, — and this will be done. Ever since I have been in this House I have seen a class who are desirous of legislating merely for their own advantage. I had expected an improvement in the composition of the House by the Reform Bill, but I find myself disappointed. Let the Government, instead of screwing every farthing out of the labouring man, take off all unnecessary taxes which at present press upon the miseries of the many, and lay the remaining taxes equally on the mass of the property of the country. Then, and then only, will relief be given to the poor.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I should not have taken any part in this discussion, but for the remarks which have been made by the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, and which I consider to have been in no way applicable to the subject matter of debate. I cannot but deprecate the practice of making a motion like the present the means of entering into a discussion upon the Corn Laws, upon the Civil List, the Reform Act, and twenty other subjects which have been adverted to to-night, scarcely one of which really bears upon the subject of the distresses of the hand-loom weavers. Much has been said against the agriculturists, and the protection afforded them by the Corn Laws; but I am for equal justice, and therefore must remind the House that the agricultural interests pay more to the taxes of the country than any other class of the subjects of the realm. I deplore, much, the distress of the hand-loom weavers, and I should be most happy to give my support to any measure calculated to afford them relief. I feel bound to make this observation, in order that it may not go forth that the friends of the agriculturists are not alive to the sufferings and distresses of the hand-loom weavers.

MR. MATTHIAS ATTWOOD. — As this is a subject upon which all must feel a deep interest, I trust I shall be excused, if I detain the House with a very few observations. I consider that the subject of the corn laws has been improperly introduced into this discussion. I cannot think that the corn laws are the cause of the distress which prevails among the manufacturing classes, and therefore I do not believe that the repeal of those laws would relieve that distress. On the contrary, I think their repeal would be attended with a greater and more general extent of suffering than is now complained of. I know how reluctant the House is to entertain questions of this kind, and how very difficult it is for any Honourable Member to bring any question under the consideration of the House which involves nothing of a personal, or of a party nature. For this reason, therefore, I feel the more disposed to give my support to the motion of the Honourable Member for Oldham. We have been told to wait for the Report of the commissioners; but I cannot see what advantage will be gained by doing so. All the facts that are capable of being ascertained by the commissioners, are already sufficiently well known. We all know that 10,000 of our fellow-subjects are at this moment suffering under the deepest distress, and it is the duty of the House to give such immediate relief as the urgency of the case demands. Now, I will make one other remark. It has been said that my Honourable Friend proposes to relieve one class of persons from taxation, and to place those burdens upon another. Sir, upon this subject, I will refer to the opinion of a Noble Friend of the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade, whose authority I know he will acknowledge, — I mean Lord Ashburton. He stated in his evidence before the Agricultural Committee of 1836: — "I maintain that there has, in fact, been no reduction of taxes from the period of the war up to the present day." Sir, I shall certainly vote for this motion, and I shall do so because, by taking that course, I consider that I shall be expressing my opinion, first, that extensive distress does exist among the hand-loom weavers; and, in the next place, that the House are desirous to discover a remedy for that distress.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I cannot refrain, after hearing the last observation of the Honourable Member for Whitehaven, from troubling the House for a few moments. The Honourable Gentleman has said that he considers that in voting for the motion, all that he does is to express his opinion, first, that extensive distress prevails among the hand-loom weavers, and, next, that the House is desirous to discover a remedy for that distress. This, then, being the opinion of the Honourable Gentleman as to the effect of the vote he is about to give, I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the House to what is the nature of the question before it, and to show how very far beyond those two propositions, so stated by the Honourable Gentleman, it will go, if it vote for the present motion. I will, first of all, however, remark, that this House, during the last Session of Parliament, gave a strong proof to show how anxious it was to meet the distress complained of; for it actually adopted an address to the Crown that a commission might be issued to inquire into the nature and extent of that distress. I beg to say, that in my judgment the House did not on that occasion take a prudent or well-advised step — that it was inexpedient to pursue that course; for I believe there is always the greatest danger arising from any one branch of the Legislature taking upon itself to investigate any particular and local case of distress, inasmuch as it is thus giving rise to expectations which, in all probability, will only result in disappointment. But I will now remind the House what are the terms of the concluding part of the motion before it. The motion states, "That there is in this kingdom an immense body of hand-loom weavers suffering unparalleled distress, and that this distress arises from the unprecedented low rate of wages that the weavers are paid for their work, and from the heavy taxes imposed by this House on the food and other necessaries of life, a sufficiency of which their wages should enable them to purchase. That the work which a large proportion of these weavers execute consists of articles indispensably necessary to the personal comfort and convenience of the higher and middle classes of society, or of articles exported to foreign countries, and there exchanged for luxuries and necessaries, to increase the affluence and comfort of those classes. That it is, therefore, the interest as well as the duty of the representatives of the people in this House immediately to devise and enact such law as shall either raise the wages of these distressed weavers to a scale adequate to maintain them comfortably, or that shall so reduce the taxes imposed on the necessaries of life, and so alter the mode of collecting such taxes, as that no part of the wages paid to these weavers shall be abstracted from them by either direct or indirect taxation of those necessaries." Now I have a great deal too much respect for the intelligence and good sense of these weavers to believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred of them could possibly read with a serious countenance such a proposition as this.

I say so fearlessly. To suppose that any system of taxation could be devised, consistently with the financial state of this country, so as to leave untouched the necessaries purchased by the wages of the working classes, is such a mere delusion that one can scarcely conceive it possible for any person seriously to imagine it.

SIR C. B. VERE. — The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Oldham has put his motion in such a form as not to admit of those who heartily wish to do justice to the poor hand-loom weavers giving him their support. I would, therefore, advise the Honourable Gentleman to withdraw his motion; and I do hope to see the question brought forward again in a manner that will not permit of its being put down.

Mr. FIELDEN. — I have only to say, that I have heard no arguments to move me in the slightest degree from my purpose of dividing the House. It will go forth to the people of England, that when you are voting these liberal and extensive grants to certain illustrious personages, you are deaf to the entreaties of so large and suffering a portion of the community as that which entreats, through me, your acquiescence in my motion.

The previous question being proposed, "That the question be now put," the House divided. The numbers were: —

Noes	73
Majority against Mr. Fielden's motion	62

SALE OF BEER BILL.

Mr. WARBURTON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the said Act (1 Will. IV. c. 64.), for regulating the sale of beer and cider in England and Wales. — Leave given. Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Warburton and Mr. Hume.

RETURN.

Union Workhouses. — On the motion of Mr. COURTENAY, there was ordered —

> A list of the unions for which workhouses have been ordered by the poor law commissioners to be built, purchased, altered, or enlarged, from the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act to the present time; with the number of persons to be provided for, the amount authorised to be expended, and the names of the architects and contractors.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUME moved, "That every Member intending to propose a select committee shall, one day next before such nomination of Members, place on the Notices the names of the Members intended to be proposed by him to be members of such committee."

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I do not intend to oppose the motion, although it is my opinion that the proposed alteration will be found to be attended with some inconvenience. The feeling of the House, I must, however, admit, is in favour of the proposed change.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I suppose that in this, as in other cases, a latitude would be allowed when there is an urgent necessity for departing from the rule. I do not intend to oppose the motion, but I think it would be very inconvenient if strictly adhered to in all cases. I will suppose, for instance, that a select committee were required to be appointed without delay. In that case the principle of the motion would interfere with the public business. If, however, it is to be taken as the general rule, and if cases analogous to that which I have supposed should be understood as the exception, I think no injury could accrue from at least giving a trial to the experiment.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I would suggest the introduction of words to the effect named by the Honourable Baronet; for example, "except in case of emergency." It is necessary, I assert, to make the rules of the House as clear and as explicit as possible.

PUBLIC COMMITTEES.

Mr. HINDLEY moved (pursuant to notice), "That no Member should be upon more than two public committees at the same time."

The motion not being seconded, it therefore fell to the ground.

POST OFFICE.

On the motion of Mr. HUME, Order (14th of December) for returns relating thereto, read, and discharged; and instead thereof, returns ordered, in detail, of the number of cases which have occurred, from the 5th of January, 1829, to the 5th of January, 1837, in each year, of letters franked or unfranked, addressed to persons in London, Dublin, or Edinburgh, or which had been applied for through the general post offices of those cities, containing money, bills, bank-notes, or other property, which have been secreted or purloined by any person in the employment of the post-office department, or been demanded therefrom by private parties as undelivered; with the amount thereof in each case in each year respectively. Of the names and situations of all persons dismissed or removed from the post office department as above, under the allegation of having purloined or secreted letters, franked or unfranked, or been concerned therein, containing money, bills, bank-notes, or other property, belonging to private parties, with the amount in each instance: Also, a return, as above, of all persons who have actually defrauded the revenue department of the Post Office, and been dismissed therefore; stating, in either case, if the first offence was visited with removal or dismissal, or if repeated previous thereto: Also, the nature of the security taken by the Post Office regarding the abstracting or purloining moneys or other property by those employed therein; stating if the parties becoming sureties are bound to make good and restore private property, when abstracted or purloined by the servants of the public in that department, or only for their fraudulent acts against the revenue.

QUALIFICATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I rise, Sir, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to the qualification of Members to sit in Parliament. It may be remembered that, last Session, I obtained the leave of the House to bring in a Bill to a similar effect. The general outline of the measure I may shortly describe in this manner: I propose to reduce the qualification of Members for counties and for boroughs to the same standard. I contend that the qualification ought to be given from various descriptions of property, both personal and real, and I have therefore included provisions to meet that object. I only ask for leave, now, to bring in the Bill, in order that it may be submitted to the consideration of Honourable Members during the vacation.

Leave given; Bill brought in by Mr. WARBURTON and Mr. HUME; read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday, 5th of February next, and to be printed.

FINES AND RECOGNISANCES (IRELAND) BILL.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITY.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, that the House resolve itself into committee on this Bill, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — I have to address the House on the present occasion, in pursuance of a notice which I have given, in reference to this very important subject.

The SPEAKER. — The Honourable and Gallant Gentleman will be pleased to observe, that whatever he may propose to do, in submitting his resolutions, can be done just as properly and consistently in the committee, as it can be at this time; and it is for the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman to consider whether, by the course I venture to suggest to him, he would not be materially facilitating the business and consulting the convenience of this House.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — In justice to myself and other Honourable Members, I rise to make a few observations, as there are several Honourable Members absent who wish to take part in this important discussion. I thought, from a former observation of a Noble Lord, that I could have been accommodated; and I complain that the Secretary for the Treasury has determined upon giving to another Honourable Member the preference in bringing forward a motion relating to Canada. I have no hesitation in saying that her Majesty's Government dare not meet me on this motion. I certainly feel, with great respect to the Chair, by whose advice I am always willing to be guided, that her Majesty's Ministers are not entitled to the slightest indulgence; but if I move the adjournment, then I am sure they will avail themselves, by some underhand means, of preventing a discussion in the committee. I cannot expect Members to wait here hour after hour, when we know that there is such a packed crew as I see there opposite to me, on the Treasury benches. I am determined, however, to discharge my duty to the public. The proposition comes from those ill-intentioned persons who think to buy her Royal Highness; but I know she cannot be bought.

The Speaker then left the chair, and the House resolved itself into committee.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I do not understand that boisterous laughter which succeeds the announcement of this motion.

[Laughter.]

Oh! it may be all very entertaining, indeed; but "let those," say I, "laugh that win." When I find, here, that her Majesty's Ministers propose to give to her Royal Highness Mary Louisa Victoria Duchess of Kent —

[A laugh.]

Well, it is Mary.

[Laughter.]

A yearly sum of 30,000*l.*, I have to inquire, and to express my opinion with regard to what is called a message from the Throne. Sir, it is true, it comes down in the shape of a recommendation from her Majesty, but it is the suggestion of her Majesty's servants. The advice is given by her Majesty's bad advisers, and it is attempted to be forced upon her Majesty, on a suggestion that such a grant would be consistent with the feelings, and compatible with the condition of the finances of the country. Now it is not from any disrespect to the Sovereign that I oppose a message of this kind; but because it came from a Government whom I look upon as the very dangerous advisers of the Sovereign. They are men who are professing economy, and, while reducing grants, are placing new burdens upon the country. The ties of nature called on her Royal Highness to perform these duties; and however glad we may be to see those duties performed properly by the mother to her child, it is no more than the country had a right to expect, at the hands of so illustrious a person, that she should have well performed these duties. It was an obligation incumbent upon her Royal Highness, and I believe that she has fulfilled it: but had she not, she would have been deserving of the same censure which any other individual would have met with for a similar neglect of the offices attaching to such relationship.

The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavoured, the other night, to prove that this was a demand very little burdensome to the public, which he was making in this case. "Oh!" said he, "you are only giving 8000*l.* a-year additional, and what is that? 6000*l.* a-year has fallen in, in consequence of Prince George of Cumberland having become Crown Prince of Hanover, on which account, the pension formerly granted to him lapses; so that, in point of fact, you are giving only an additional 2000*l.* a-year, and what sort of object is that?" I deny the accuracy of this statement. It was met, at the time, by an individual much better versed in calculations of this nature than I am; but I think that it was then proved, to the satisfaction of the House, that the mode in which it was proposed to carry this grant into effect gives to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent 20,000*l.* a-year more than her original income. The present aggregate of her income may be thus stated. First, the grant of 6000*l.* a-year, to her Royal Highness for life. Second, the grant for the education and better support of her Royal Highness Princess Victoria, now Queen of England, 6000*l.* a-year. Thirdly, there was 10,000*l.* a-year, in the lifetime of the late King, the whole of which was expressly stated to be for her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent for her life; but with provision that 6000*l.* a-year of this sum shall be for the same purposes as the second of these grants, the better education and support of her Royal Highness the Princess Victoria. Now I do maintain that these two grants, meaning the second for 6000*l.*, and the subsequent one, 6000*l.*, which were given for the support and comfort of the princess,—I say these grants have completely lapsed. Deducting a portion of these grants, and adding them to the 6000*l.* a-year originially granted to the Duchess of Kent, she is, in point of fact, in personal and absolute possession of 10,000*l.* a-year.

But, then, it is said that circumstances are now changed. I think they are, indeed. For, the first reason why this grant is extravagant and excessive is, that when both these illustrious parties lived together, there must have been far greater expenses to be incurred on the part of her Royal Highness the Duchess, than there can be, now, when her daughter is no longer called upon to participate in her protection, her superintendence, or her hospitality. The second reason is, that her Royal Highness would rather, I dare say, retire into the privacy of domestic or comparative retirement. But we must look to another circumstance of great importance, namely, to what have been the amounts of the grants both to males and females being branches of the Royal Family, who may be considered in every sense of the word nearer to the throne than her Royal Highness, notwithstanding her supposed "increased proximity" to it. I mean the several royal dukes and royal princesses of the blood. The first grants given by George III. were not more than 10,000*l.* each, to the princes, his sons. The grants to his daughters amounted to 30,000*l.* a-year, namely, 10,000*l.* to one, the eldest, and 5000*l.* to each of the other four daughters.

At the present moment, with all the increase that has been allowed during the intervening period, the largest income received by any of the royal dukes is 21,000*l.* a-year; and the princesses, their sisters, have only 13,000 a-year each. I have only to add, that if you have determined to give no more to those several royal personages, I cannot see how you can reconcile it to yourselves, or why you should think fit — (under circumstances in which, through the recent accession of an illustrious person to the throne of these kingdoms, the party whom you propose to benefit is rendered liable to less expenses than she had heretofore to meet) — to grant to that party, the Duchess of Kent, 30,000*l.* a-year. The moment Parliament grants this annuity, the money is gone. How long your liability to it may endure, no man can pretend to know. That is a question which must be determined by circumstances. A great deal has been said about the charities of the Duchess of Kent. For my part, I do not doubt that she has been very charitable. I am confident that her own excellent disposition would prompt her to be so. But in what condition and under what circumstances has she lived, hitherto? There was much more reason for her being so extensively charitable pending her immediate domestic connection with her royal daughter, now our most gracious Queen, than can be predicated of the present moment, when that royal daughter has ascended the throne of these kingdoms. If this amount of 30,000*l.* a-year were necessary to be given to the Duchess of Kent with a view to secure, or add to, her real comforts, I would be the last person in the world to refuse to her the grant. But I say that, if it be proper to grant her 30,000*l.* a-year, now, it was mean and highly unadvisable to grant her only 22,000*l.* a-year, when she had that additional state and splendour to maintain and state to keep up, which it was necessary for her to observe whilst she was still in the guardianship of the Princess Victoria.

Our economists, perhaps, now feel that, having done this, having made this inadequate provision, they are bound to show that they will do something to repair their past injustice. A rumour has gone forth, and some Honourable Gentlemen have even gone so far as directly to allude to it, that her Royal Highness owes debts to a very large amount. Would it not have been more manly in her Majesty's Government to come forward and state such a fact, and call on Parliament, saying, "See what expenses have been incurred by her Royal Highness in managing the education of the Queen." I tell her Majesty's Ministers that I, for one, would have been one of the first to acquiesce in the vote. It is hard that I should be driven, now, to the hard necessity of speaking in opposition to the grant it has pleased them to propose. But I should be wrong if I did not express my feelings on the subject. I say that the conduct of the Government, throughout, has been a sort of compromise — of understanding — of private arrangement. And may it not be possible that there is some sort of stronger interest, out of doors, or in a foreign land, with whom this may be an arrangement in the nature of a compromise, or a sugar-plum for good behaviour? I should be very sorry to say anything which might subject me to the imputation of a want of gratitude, for the hospitality which I experienced in another country when I was in the army; but this proceeding, altogether, does somewhat remind me of a saying applicable to at least one part of her Majesty's dominions, "Scratch me, and I will scratch you."

I have been compelled to say thus much, not without great pain, but because I conscientiously believe that this is a grant which will prove unacceptable to many classes of the people. And this, Sir, depend upon it, we shall find out when we return to our constituents. I object to this, as a most extravagant and uncalled-for grant, in comparison with former grants to various members of the Royal Family; and above all, I object to it because it has been so brought forward with the evident intention of smuggling it through the House, just at the period that it was known our adjournment for the Christmas recess was about to take place. I say that the proposition should have been submitted to us at an earlier stage of the Session, and in a much fuller House. But, perhaps, it has been made, on the present occasion, under the idea of carrying favour with that authority, by whose pleasure it may happen, that Right Honourable Gentlemen and Noble Lords opposite, may not retain their seats for ten days longer. In the strange way that we are going on, I look to their retiring,—I hope to God,—for ever!

[Much laughter, and cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Oh! indeed. If Honourable Members will seek for these rebukes, assuredly they shall have them. If they will provoke the application of the medicine, they shall have a strong dose of it. I do not envy Gentlemen opposite the feelings they must really labour under at this moment. But I shall certainly divide the House on the motion, with which I shall conclude, and, also, on the next resolution. Finally, I assure the House, that I have a most sincere respect for her Royal Highness; but if my own nearest relative were in the same relative position, I protest that I would take the same course as I am now about to do. I will therefore move, "That the blank be filled with the sum of 22,000*l*." (amount of annuity) instead of 30,000*l*.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

SIR SAMUEL WHALLEY. — This grant does appear to me to come before us in so very peculiar a manner, that it seems important to direct the attention of the House to the circumstance. I will very briefly state my view of the matter. I confess that I have great difficulty in making so large an allowance, although I do consider that there are some valid reasons given for it, on account of the Duchess of Kent's "increased proximity to the Throne;" for though her Royal Highness, not being herself a sovereign, does not stand in the relation of Queen-mother to her Majesty, yet she is, to all intents and purposes, in the still very near relation of mother to the Queen. I cannot consider that 30,000*l*. is a very large grant, when compared with the grant of 100,000*l*. to another illustrious individual, the widow of a late Sovereign. Still, had this motion emanated from another quarter, or been differently put, in point of form, I should doubtless have been more inclined to support it; but, when the grounds are looked at, which were alleged by the Honourable and Gallant Member for his view of this case, and his notion of its being a "scratch me, and I'll scratch you" sort of arrangement, — although this last was rather a strong and extraordinary expression, — I must say that I cannot, on grounds so singular, withhold my assent to the proposition of the Government, though it is far from meeting my unqualified approbation.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I must take leave to correct the Honourable Gentleman on one point; — I did not allude to the royal individual in that observation.

MR. FINCH. — I certainly think that, under the circumstances of the case, this grant is too large. Under the late King, we were called upon to grant to this Illustrious Lady 10,000*l*. a-year, in addition to 12,000*l*. a-year, of which she was already in receipt: and now we are asked to give 8,000*l*. a-year additional, — making up her income to 30,000*l*. a-year, altogether. In the year 1825, the sixth of George IV., 6000*l*. additional was granted to the 6000*l*. which had previously been the whole income of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, "for the more honourable support and education," as it was expressly stated to be, of her Royal Highness the Princess Victoria. This grant increased the Duchess's income to 12,000*l*. a-year; and this was raised to a total of 22,000*l*. a-year, as I have said, entirely by reason of the heavy expenses attaching to her state as the mother and guardian of the then presumptive heiress to the throne. Now, it is surely to be remembered, that by reason of events which have since taken place, those expenses must, of necessity, have been very considerably reduced, in place of being so augmented as to justify such an increased allowance to the Duchess of Kent. Besides, we must also recollect, that even under the proposition of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Lincoln, which goes to reduce the total of the grants to her Royal Highness to 22,000*l*., her Royal Highness will still be left with an allowance greater, by 1000*l*. per annum, than the largest annuity which we have conferred upon any member of the Royal Family, being a prince of the blood. But this is not all. We must not forget that her Majesty is in possession of the large revenues arising from the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall; that these form no part of the Civil List; and that they do afford to the Queen sources of additional income, sufficiently large to enable her to make good any deficiency which the income of her Royal Highness, on its present footing, may be thought to present.

The Committee then divided on the question, "That the blank be filled with the sum of 22,000*l*."

The clause was therefore carried.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Considering the present state of the House, and the unprecedented time at which this Bill has been brought forward, I shall postpone bringing up the clause, of which I have given notice (for restricting the payment of the annuity to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent), either till the Report upon the clause which has just been carried shall be brought up, or until the third reading of the Bill. I shall certainly wish to take the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons upon the expediency of passing such an enact-as that which my clause contemplates.

Motion withdrawn accordingly.

The several other clauses of the Bill, together with the preamble, were then agreed to; and the Bill was ordered to be reported to-morrow.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—I beg to say, as these things do, sometimes, go forth to the public, and, without proper explanation, may be misunderstood,—that I did not mean, in adverting to the scratchibility of this proceeding, in the remotest degree to allude to her Royal Highness, but only to her Majesty's Ministers.

MARRIED WOMEN'S BILL.

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD brought in a Bill "to enable married women, with the consent of their husbands, to pass their interests in chattels personal:" Also, the

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT BILL.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a petition from the prisoners confined for debt in the borough gaol of Liverpool, in favour of the above Bill.

The petition was then read, and referred to the select committee on the Bill.

CANADA.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Seeing my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department in his place, I will trouble him with a question relating to a matter of considerable importance. For reasons that are obvious I will go no further than asking the question. I wish to know whether his Majesty's Government are in possession of any official information respecting the late events in the province of Lower Canada? I put this question in consequence of some reports having reached London from Liverpool to-day, of a very inauspicious character, and which I fear are not without foundation. I hope my Noble Friend will have no objection to state whether or not her Majesty's Government are in possession of any authentic accounts from that quarter.

LORD GLENELG. — In answer to the question put by my Noble and Learned Friend, I beg to say that her Majesty's Government are not in possession of any official accounts from that quarter.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — As the subject has been named, I beg to give notice that I intend moving, to-morrow, that this House at its rising shall adjourn till Tuesday, the 16th of January. It was certainly my intention to propose a longer adjournment; but information having been received by the Government of reports or rumours having arrived, which no doubt are of a contradictory character, but which, I fear, establish the fact that open insurrection and rebellion have broken out in Lower Canada, I apprehend it would be both inconvenient and improper, because injurious to the public service — I think that, under such circumstances, we should not be discharging our duty to Parliament if we proposed an adjournment for a longer period than I have mentioned. It is my intention to lay before this House to-morrow all the papers on this subject in possession of the Government; and, when we meet on the 16th, it will be put distinctly to both Houses, whether they intend to support her Majesty's Government in all the measures which we consider necessary on this occasion. I beg to add, that this question will be put, not doubting the answer that we shall receive to it.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The right my Noble Friend has to declare, that he knows, beforehand, what answer the Government will receive to their appeal to Parliament with respect to their policy towards Canada, is a question into the discussion of which I will not enter; but this much I will say, that I heartily approve of my Noble Friend's proposition to substitute the shorter for the longer period of adjournment. I think with my Noble Friend that, considering the present state of Canada, according to that intelligence, which there is too much reason to fear is well-founded, it would be exceedingly unwise, and, indeed, utterly unjustifiable, for Parliament to adjourn beyond the earliest period that may be consistent with the convenience of the Members of both Houses.

SLAVERY.

LORD BROUGHAM. — In moving that the Returns relative to the amount of compensation paid to the slave proprietors, which were last night laid on your Lordships' table be printed, I beg to say that I consider them very satisfactory. The accounts which have been received of the working of the apprenticeship system, and of the treatment of the slaves, have been much exaggerated. I have every reason to believe that the exportation of supplies to the West India colonies have greatly increased, instead of being diminished, since the Emancipation Act was passed. If those supplies were of an inferior quality now to what they were formerly, that would in some degree throw a doubt upon my assumption, but they are not. The fact is that they have increased, and the goodness of the articles has not been diminished. It is evident, therefore, that much benefit must have been derived by those people on emerging from a state of slavery to one of freedom, because they are the consumers of all the articles sent out from this country, for which they pay out of the earnings of their industry. It appears on the face of the papers which have been laid on your Lordships' table, that there has been a general increase in the supplies sent out to the West Indies during the six last years, from 1830 to 1836, particularly in the latter year. The average value of supplies sent out for three years before the passing of the Emancipation Bill was 2,800,000*l.*, while in the three years after the passing of that measure it amounted to 3,600,000*l.*, which was paid for out of the wages of these poor people. I am anxious that the sufferings which the slaves have been compelled to endure should be obliterated as soon as possible, and I know that the complaint of their having been ill-treated by some individuals in the West Indies and the Mauritius is not unfounded. But, when persons assert that the Act has been of no use — that it has wholly failed in its object, I directly state that such is not the fact. Every facility has, I believe, been given by Government to carry the Act into effect. Having said thus much of our own Government, I may be allowed, in justice to another party, whose conduct has been much condemned, to make a few observations: — I allude to the course pursued by certain citizens of the United States. No man more deeply laments than I do the bad spirit which prevails on this subject in a considerable portion of the American Union. No man can wish, or hope, or expect, more confidently than I do, that many years will not elapse before we shall cease to have any cause of complaint against the citizens of the United States, or any portion of them, in this respect. We ought not, however, to do the citizens of the United States so much injustice as to place their situation in comparison with the situation of the people of this country in relation to the question of negro slavery. Unthinking individuals may say, "Oh! see how badly the Americans behave — see how badly both the people and the Government behave as to the slave question — compare their conduct with that of the people of England! The English have emancipated their slaves, but the Americans will not listen to such a proposition." Now, there is not a shadow of similitude between the two cases. Do the people of England live among slaves? are they in constant communication with those unhappy people? No. But the case is different in America. There the master and the slave, the oppressor and the oppresed, constantly meet together. Here the people are 3000 miles distant from scenes of slavery. Hence the great difference of feeling; and when the Legislature of Barbadoes and of the other West India Islands unite in bringing in Bills for the full emancipation of the slaves, it will be time enough for them to look down from the eminence of their lofty philanthropy, and to insult the citizens of the United States for not having followed their example.

LORD GLENELG. — I cannot help expressing the satisfaction with which I have heard the observations of my Noble Friend. I am very happy to find that he approves of the documents that have been laid on your Lordships' table; they prove the truth of the assertion which my Noble and Learned Friend made on a preceding evening, namely, that there has been an obvious improvement in the employment and comforts of the negro in consequence of the Act of emancipation. It is also with much satisfaction that I find my Noble Friend throwing the weight of his authority into the scale against that system of exaggeration which is so commonly indulged in with respect to the effects of that Act. I admit that there are abuses still in the system; but I will ask any reasonable man whether we can hope at once to put a stop to abuses which have existed for ages? Can we expect that men will at once throw aside the common feelings of their nature, or turn them into a directly opposite course to that in which they have been accustomed to flow? It is preposterous to expect such a change to be suddenly accomplished. Men's natural prejudices are not so easily overcome. When I say "natural" prejudices, I must not be supposed to be in favour of them, though they are formed under the sanction of the law of this country. No doubt England did a great thing in passing the Emancipation Act, but we must not expect at once to eradicate all our old feelings. My Noble and Learned Friend has said, "You must not, with reference to this subject, judge of America by the conduct of this country, for the people here are not, as they are in certain parts of America, surrounded day and night by slaves." Now I think that I am bound in some degree to claim the benefit of that observation for the benefit of the West India planters. I lament that in some places a desire to delay the carrying the Act into effect has been manifested in the West Indies; but I am of opinion that before we condemn the planters, we ought to consider the peculiar situation in which they are placed.

LORD BROUGHAM. — What I stated with reference to America, had no relation whatever to the situation of the Legislatures of the West India Islands. In Antigua and Bermuda the slaves were emancipated with perfect safety and signal success. Why should not Barbadoes and Jamaica follow the example? If they do not, for what purpose is 20,000,000*l.* of money granted to them? If the Americans have received this premium — I will not call it a bribe — if they have entered into a compact, if they have made a bargain, if they have received and pocketed this money, and if afterwards they have refused to do that which they have agreed to do, and which those who paid them the money are entitled to expect that they would do,—in that case, but not otherwise, my Noble Friend would have the most perfect right to claim the benefit of my observation for the West India Legislature. He might then say that the cases are parallel, that the same argument applies to both parties, and that the same measure of justice should be meted out to the West Indians which I have meted out to the citizens of America. But the cases are not at all analogous.

LORD REDESDALE. — I believe, with the Noble and Learned Lord, that the unconditional emancipation of the slaves in Antigua and Bermuda has been attended with beneficial effects; but there is a difference between the relative situation of these colonies; some of them are older than others, and in some of these, therefore, the education and general condition of the negroes are much more advanced. I hope your Lordships will recollect the prejudices which exist in our colonies, as well as in the United States, and make due allowances for them. The planters, I believe, are satisfied with the experiment as far as it has gone; they are satisfied with the advantage given to them by the grant of the 20,000,000*l.*; and I have no doubt that, without any interference, in a short time measures will be taken of a most satisfactory character.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I can see no reason why one system should be pursued in Antigua, and another in Jamaica. Nothing can be adduced to justify the continuance of the cruelties of which I complain. Does the local Legislature seem inclined to put an end to them? In answer to that, I will read, in addition to what I laid before your Lordships on a former night, another extract from an address delivered by my Noble Friend the Marquess of Sligo to the House of Assembly in Jamaica. "The whipping of female slaves is indefensible; and I called upon you for enactments to put an end to a system which was contrary to humanity and repugnant to law; but, so far from passing an Act to prevent such cruelty, you have not, in any way, even expressed your disapprobation of it." So much for the desire of the local Legislature to act up to the expressed wishes of Parliament!

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On the motion of VISCOUNT DUNCANNON, this Bill was read a third time, and passed.

PRISONERS' CONVEYANCE (IRELAND) BILL.

Read a second time (according to order); committee negatived; and Bill to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the third reading of this Bill being read, —

LORD BROUGHAM said: — My Lords, I cannot help complaining of the slovenly manner in which business is done in this House. This Bill has been read a third time, and I have never heard a word of it. If I had, I should most decidedly have opposed that clause which imposes a fine of 10*l.* upon valuation juries if they do not give in a verdict. It is a totally new principle in legislation, so far as I am aware, and, in my opinion, is absurd and oppressive.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — The clause the Noble and Learned Lord complains of I have found in the Strand Improvement Act, and others of a like nature. I have only followed the precedent in similar Bills.

Bill read a third time, and passed.

SLAVE COMPENSATION BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into committee, and the Lords summoned, read. House in committee accordingly, and Bill reported without amendment, and to be read a third time to-morrow.

On this Bill being brought from the Commons, —

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE said: — In moving the first reading of the Presbyterian Oaths (Ireland) Bill, I beg to state that the object of the measure is merely to put Presbyterians in Ireland upon the same footing with their brethren in Scotland, who take oaths in courts of justice by holding up the hand in place of kissing the Testament.

The Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

MUNICIPAL OFFICERS' DECLARATION BILL.

Returned from the Commons, with the amendments agreed to.

LORD BROUGHAM moved for a Return, by the official assignees, of the number of actions brought under each fiat since the establishment of the Court of Bankruptcy for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt's estate, and of all suits in equity under such fiats. And, also, a Return by the official assignees in the Court of Bankruptcy of the number of debts under 1*l.*; above 1*l.* and under 5*l.*; above 5*l.* and under 10*l.*; above 10*l.* and under 20*l.*; above 20*l.* and under 30*l.*; above 30*l.* and under 50*l.*; above 50*l.* and under 100*l.*; above 100*l.* and under 500*l.*; above 500*l.* and under 1000*l.*; above 1000*l.*: and how many of each have been recovered, and at what legal expenses."

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I would suggest that the better course would be for the Honourable Member to apply to the proper department of administration for the information which he wishes to obtain. FISHGUARD HARBOUR.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG.—Seeing the President of the Board of Trade in his place, I wish to put a question on a subject to which great importance is attached by all connected with the shipping interest of the country. It relates to the petition recently presented by the Honourable and Gallant Member for Scarborough. The Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr. P. Thomson) on former occasions expressed his disapprobation of the principle of passing tolls, when it was proposed to sanction that principle in a Bill which had been brought into the House to provide for the construction of a harbour at Scarborough, and which was subsequently rejected; yet the Fishguard Harbour Act has been suffered to pass with a clause authorising the exaction of a toll ten times as great, and under circumstances a hundredfold more objectionable, the only object of the Act being to raise the value of private property. I beg to ask, whether it is the intention of the Right Honourable Gentleman to introduce a Bill to repeal this most unjust, impolitic, and onerous impost?

Mr. P. THOMSON.—I am much obliged to the Honourable Gentleman for giving me an opportunity of stating the course I intend to take on this subject. I am anxious that that course may go forth to the public, in order that the parties who have promoted the Act may have no claim for compensation, and no ground of complaint that they have not had a sufficient warning of any proceedings which may be taken against them. This is one of those cases which arise from the absence of any check in this House upon Private Bills of a nature materially affecting the general interests of the public. I trust that, by the adoption of the recommendation of a select committee, of which I was chairman, last year, to the effect that a breviate of every private Bill should be prepared, stating its contents, and the manner in which it would affect the public interests, the recurrence of such cases would be prevented. I think that the House would only do what were just in the present case were it to correct the injury inflicted on the public, and punish those who were the authors of it. A private Bill was introduced (for making a harbour at Fishguard) containing a clause imposing a toll on all ships passing it, after it had become notorious, from the reports contained in the public papers, that the strongest feeling was entertained against such a measure, under general circumstances, on both sides of the House. It is impossible for any one to follow these private Bills, which are read at an hour in the evening when many gentlemen are not in their places, and even the titles of the Bills can scarcely be heard, so that no opposition can be offered to it. The limits within which these harbour tolls are to be levied, are declared to be the port of Wexford on one side, and the Welch coast on the other, and a duty is levied on every ship passing up or down the Channel, or crossing it between these two points. This is certainly a monstrous fraud on the public. I am not aware whether the repeal of the clause can now be effected by a public Bill; but if so, I shall certainly introduce a Bill for that purpose; and if not, I shall be prepared to introduce, at the expense of Government, a private Bill repealing the obnoxious provision.

SIR FREDERICK TRENCH. — I am very happy to find that the Right Honourable Gentleman takes the view which he has expressed, and I cannot but hope justice will be done.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — I beg to return the Right Honourable Gentleman my best thanks for his explanation, which cannot fail to be very satisfactory to those who are interested in the matter.

Mr. C. FERGUSSON. — As one of the Members for Scotland, I am bound to state that great injustice has been done to the trade of that country by the mode in which private Bills have been passed in this House. I never heard of what was contemplated by this measure until it was too late. It appears to me, that the best remedy for the evils, arising out of the present mode of conducting private business, would be, to print all private Bills as well as public ones.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON.—I really see many objections to our adopting the last suggestion thrown out by my Right Honourable Friend (Mr. R. C. Fergusson), and I think it would be much better to have an abbreviated form of each private Bill drawn up. This is a point, however, which will, no doubt, be duly considered by you, Sir, and I presume that arrangements will be made to remedy every such existing evil. After the recess, I will myself propose certain resolutions in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee on Private Business, upon which a distinct system may be founded.

POOR LAW UNIONS.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I wish to direct the attention of the Noble Lord to two points connected with the administration of the poor law unions. The first is, that no chaplains are appointed to them, and no provision made for the regular performance of divine service by a proper officer. I wish to know, also, whether, in any of the unions, permission has been given to persons dissenting from the doctrines of the Established Church to attend divine worship at the meeting-houses of their own persuasion?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have directed the attention of the Poor Law Commissioners to this subject. I understand, from them, that in many of the unions chaplains have been appointed, who perform duty regularly. The particulars of the information I have received, I am not now prepared to give, but I have no objection to furnish it to the Honourable Member to-morrow. Many of the unions, the Honourable Member is aware, are now only in progress, and the arrangements are not yet matured.

Mr. MACLEAN. — These matters will probably come under the consideration of the committee appointed by the House to investigate the working of the Poor Law Amendment Act; but, unless some more satisfactory provision for the performance of divine service is made, and unless the Noble Lord takes the appointment of chaplains into his own hands, I shall bring forward a motion on this subject after the recess.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA. — ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, in rising to move the Order of the day for going into committee of supply, I wish to state, in the first place, that I do so for the purpose (which I think a very legitimate purpose) of giving the Honourable Member for Westminster an opportunity of making any remarks which may seem to him necessary or expedient on the subject of the affairs of Canada. But, lest the Honourable Gentleman may have been misled by the intentions of Government, as declared by me in this place, it will be proper for me to mention to him, and to the House, what is at present intended with respect to the adjournment of Parliament. It was intended, certainly, — and I had hoped, almost up to this day, that I should have been enabled to carry that intention into effect,—to move an adjournment of this House till the 1st of February, with the view of relieving its Members, until that day should arrive, from any further attention on their parliamentary duties. But, Sir, upon considering the whole question of the affairs of Canada, I shall not think it my duty—I shall not think that I am justified in proposing to this House so long an adjournment. I do not mean to say, Sir, that I think that any measures which can be taken by Parliament with regard to the affairs of Lower Canada can have immediate effect upon what is at present passing in that province. The state of its affairs, Sir, is this. The Assembly of the province having been convened, to consider of the resolutions passed last session by the House, was necessarily adjourned, in consequence of their refusal to entertain the question of the supplies, or to proceed to business. Since that time, various symptoms have occurred, as detailed by Lord Gosford in several despatches and letters from Lower Canada, showing that the intention of the party which considered itself aggrieved was no longer to seek redress by means of any representation from the Assembly, but, in fact, to have recourse to arms for the purpose of opposing, by force, the troops stationed in the province to uphold the authority of her Majesty. I have already stated to the House that, according to the wish of Lord Gosford — (although he declared that he was ready to remain in Canada should the public service require his continued presence, — yet it being, I say, his wish, if there were no such necessity, to retire from the government of the lower province, where he had been sent in the hope of a conciliatory adjustment of the existing differences,) her Majesty's Government have relieved him from the duty and burden they had imposed upon him, and have intrusted, temporarily, to Sir John Colborne, the administration of the affairs of Lower Canada. The commission given to the Earl of Gosford would necessarily devolve upon Sir John Colborne in case of the retirement or the absence of the parties intrusted with the administration of the affairs of the colony ;, but with the accounts which were received, showing, evidently, a disposition to resist, by force, the execution of the law — showing a disposition to drive those who were well disposed and peaceable into the ranks of rebellion ; — with such accounts, I say — (speaking of their result, and, indeed, I am rather understating the substance of those statements of Lord Gosford), — the Government thought it necessary, in intrusting Sir John Colborne with the temporary administration of the affairs of the province, to inform him, that whilst they had the greatest confidence in the steadiness and judgment with which he would exercise the power reposed in him,—while they asked him to forbear to resort to measures of the strongest description, unless he should find them absolutely necessary, — yet, in the case of that absolute necessity, if he should find the proclamation and enforcement of martial law in the province inevitable, her Majesty's Government were ready to be responsible for that act, and that he might look for support from her Majesty in his loyal endeavours to preserve the obedience and allegiance of the province to the British crown.

Sir, such was, in the opinion of the Government, their duty to her Majesty and this country. The accounts that have been received since that order was sent out, have tended rather to show a greater disposition to disturbance, a greater disposition to raise and to arm bodies of men, with the view of opposing the law, than has hitherto existed. With respect to the accounts that are in the newspapers to-day, no official despatches have yet been received by the Government from the same quarters; but still, I think, looking at the form in which those accounts appear, I cannot doubt, whatever may be the exact particulars, that a collision has taken place between a portion of her Majesty's troops and a number of persons assembled in arms with the traitorous and treasonable purpose of overturning the authority of the British Government in the colony. Such being the state of things, Sir, — although, as I said, I do not think any immediate remedy now to be applied by Parliament can give much greater authority than her Majesty's Government have already intrusted to Sir John Colborne, — yet I think we should not be justified in delaying the meeting of Parliament beyond the earliest period at which we can have the means of assembling any considerable number of Members. It will be our duty, when Parliament again assembles, to make them acacquainted with the course we mean to pursue; for with respect either to what has happened hitherto, or to the intelligence that may be received between this time and the meeting of Parliament, and upon which the judgment of Parliament may be pronounced; — such, it appears to me, is the duty of Ministers of this country, acting, as all Ministers of this country must do, in concurrence with the opinion of Parliament, and only being justified in taking measures of extreme force so long as the opinion of Parliament supports them in those measures. Therefore, Sir, I wish to state to the Honourable Gentleman, that it is our intention, in the first place, to produce, to-morrow, all the information which can be produced without injury to the public service, collected from the despatches and other documents transmitted by Lord Gosford. That information being laid before Parliament, it will necessarily require some short time to read and consider. It is, further, our intention, considering that though Parliament cannot be brought together immediately after Christmas in sufficient strength to consider of matters of such importance, — yet that, at the same time, we should not be justified in delaying, till the 1st of February, the meeting of this House, — to propose an adjournment till Tuesday, the 16th of January. I have to inform the Honourable Gentleman who proposes to make the motion on the paper to-night, that I certainly do not think it would be useful or expedient that, in any answer which I may make to his remarks, I should enter into any general statement on the affairs of Canada, on which no definitive resolution can be come to in a House so thinned, by absence, as this at present is. But it is not our wish to withhold information from Parliament on a matter so grave and so important; and, in the middle of January, we propose to meet them, with the view of calling on them for their sanction to such measures as we may deem necessary; but, at all events, to call on them for their decision, ay or no, whether they will concur with us in a determination — "that those who are well-affected to the Crown of this empire shall be supported," — in order that we may act, not only by command of her Majesty, but also with the full concurrence and consent of Parliament. I beg to move that the order of the day be now read for going into a committee of supply.

Mr. LEADER. — The Noble Lord has told the House that he will lay all the papers connected with this subject before it; and the Noble Lord has said, moreover, that he does not consider himself bound, at this time, to enter further into this subject. The Noble Lord will take that course which may seem to him advisable; but the urgency and importance of the Canada question not only justify me in pressing the subject on the attention of the House, but render it an imperative duty on my part to call for a discussion of the question, in order to make the House and the country thoroughly aware of the present state of British North America, and to enable them not only to form an impartial judgment on the past and present conduct, and on the intentions, of the Government, but to decide for themselves what is now the best course to be taken for the interest alike of Canada and of Great Britain. The interests, the liberties, the very lives and fortunes of our Canadian fellow-citizens, the honour and peace of this country, are in imminent danger; it cannot, then, be unreasonable or ill-timed to ask the representatives of the people to consider by what means a great, flourishing, tranquil, and eminently loyal colony has been driven into a state of disturbance, amounting to open insurrection; by what means the evil may yet be removed or mitigated; and, above all, by what means we may be saved from an unjust war, which can bring no advantage, and which, whatever be its results, must inevitably inflict dishonour on this country.

It may be advisable, first of all, to give a very brief sketch of the present uneasy state of Lower Canada, and of the chief cause of that uneasiness. The affairs of that country, owing to its disturbed state, and to the deep and painful interest which attaches to the cause of a gallant but comparatively small and feeble people, struggling for their rights against a gigantic power, have lately occupied so much of the public attention, that a very concise statement will be sufficient. For many years past the Canadians have complained of numerous grievances; and, having first petitioned in vain, they at last demanded redress. Although every one of their complaints was admitted to be well founded, their prayers were neglected, their demands were treated as unreasonable; they were too weak to command attention, for they were not considered strong enough to enforce redress. For many years they went on petitioning in vain; trusting to the generosity of England and hoping for relief, till even the hope of justice from England seems to have left them: then, and not till then, having discovered the fruitlessness of supplication, they had recourse to that legal power which their constitution gave them, and they refused to vote any money for a Government which had obstinately refused to accede to their just demands. In doing this they exercised a known, recognised, legal right conferred upon them by the constitution which England had given them. You say they used their right improperly and at an improper time, and therefore you coerce them; but you are not to make yourselves judges of the time and manner in which a constitutional assembly is to exercise a legal right. Yet such was the course pursued by the Government, when the Canadian Assembly determined to vote no supplies till their acknowledged grievances were redressed. Instead of redressing or attempting to redress the grievances complained of, our Government passed resolutions subversive of the Canadian constitution. By these resolutions the Canadians, before excited by long years of misgovernment, were driven to desperation. They saw clearly that there was no justice for them in the Executive Government, or in the Colonial Office, or in the British Parliament; that it was the intention of the Government to chastise and to oppress them. They felt that they were forced into this dilemma,—either to submit to the resolutions and be slaves, or to resist them and run the risk of civil war. In this dilemma they made that choice which would be made by every people who had once enjoyed any portion of freedom — they determined on resistance. They would have been despicable, and the English people would have been the first to despise them, if, taking the other alternative, they had tamely submitted to injustice and oppression. Their measures of resistance have been well constituted and well executed. Meetings were held, at which the resolutions, and the Ministers who passed them, were denounced in the strongest terms of indignation and defiance; addresses were issued, plainly declaring that no justice could be now expected from England, — that the Canadians must now trust to themselves alone, and that they had no chance of good government but in a separation from Great Britain; clubs were formed for the purpose of the complete organisation, and especially of mustering, and drilling, and habituating to the use of arms, and to military evolutions, the young men of the province; provisional local courts were established for the administration of law and the settling of disputes; the established courts, and those who continued to take their differences to be decided by them, were publicly denounced; all commerce and intercourse with English merchants were publicly proscribed, the Canadians pledging themselves to use no taxed articles, that they might injure the revenue, and generally to use no articles of British manufacture, that they might show their sense of the injustice which the British Government had inflicted upon them.

All these measures of resistance were carried into effect under the management of committees of vigilance appointed especially for that purpose; but the Canadian population needed little or no admonition from their leaders to induce them to adopt, and rigidly to adhere to, these measures; their hearts were in the cause, and he was considered the best patriot who most embarrassed the detested, because tyrannical, Government. So well have the measures of resistance been executed, that Canada is now in open revolt. There is one point to which I would especially call attention, and that is, to the determination of the Canadians to use no articles of British produce. The manufacturers of this country, already embarrassed to find a sufficient market for their produce, will thus be almost entirely shut out from the markets of a country which consumed, annually, a large quantity of their goods. The House will remember that precisely the same system of non-intercourse was pursued by the Americans in the commencement of their struggle. The idea was ridiculed by the minister of the day, who seemed really to believe that the Americans could not exist without articles of British produce. What was Benjamin Franklin's evidence on that occasion, when he was asked if he did not think cloth from England absolutely necessary for the Americans. "By no means," he said; "with industry and good management they may very well supply themselves with all they want." When he was further asked, if it would not take a long time to establish the manufacture among them, and if they would not in the mean while suffer greatly? "I think not," he answered; "they have made a surprising progress already; and I am of opinion that their old clothes will last them till they have new ones of their own making." The very same words may be applied to the present case, but with this addition, that the Canadians have also the advantage of getting all they want by smuggling from the United States. In this they will of course be assisted by the Americans, who derive from the same system all the advantages which the British merchant has lost. An extensive plan of smuggling is accordingly, at this moment, in active operation; it is recommended openly at public meetings, and of course assisted in every possible manner by the Americans, and the population on each side of the border. It may be said that this plan of non-intercourse cannot have the effect intended by the popular party, because there is a strong and numerous party in Canada, which, far from adopting the system, will make every exertion to defeat it. Now, where is this party to be found, and who compose it? Why, it is to be found in Montreal and Quebec only; and it is composed almost entirely of those British merchants and their dependents against whom the system is expressly levelled; and stating their numbers at the very highest amount, they do not form one-fifth of the population.

Now that I am speaking of the ascendancy party, I have a remark to make on a recent riot at Montreal, in which it is said the popular party was defeated, and which has given rise to many exaggerated estimates of the strength of the ascendancy party in Lower Canada, and to many vain boastings of the ease with which the minority could put down the majority in that province — precisely as the Orangemen in Ireland are continually boasting of their superior intelligence and bravery, and of the ease with which they would, if permitted by England, overwhelm and for ever silence the Roman Catholics of Ireland. Sir, the facts of the case are briefly these: — A detachment of a club called the "Sons of Liberty," on their way home from a meeting, were attacked by a Tory club, called "The Doric." The aggressors were beaten off; and there the matter would have ended, but that the Tories, reinforced, came back to the scene of action, and finding no one there to oppose them, they proceeded to the office of the Vindicator, a Liberal paper, in which office there happened to be no one but an old woman. The Tories bravely stormed the office thus garrisoned, and destroyed all the property which they there found. And this is the great affair which has decided that the Tory party is much stronger than the popular party in Lower Canada! Why, consider the case for a moment; the strength of the Tory party, if not the whole party, is confessedly concentrated in Mortreal and Quebec; the chief official and military force is also mustered there. Now, it would be madness in the popular party to commence the insurrectionary movement in either of those towns; in them they would be exposed to every disadvantage, while in any country district they would have every advantage. Besides, the triumph, if triumph there be, was achieved, not by the Tory mob alone, but by the Tory mob backed by the presence in the town of a large military force; and such is the estimation in which British magistrates and British troops are held by the Cadadians, that they firmly believe that, in any disturbance or collision between even a Tory and Liberal mob, the magistrates and troops would not act fairly to disperse the general mob, and to afford equal protection to the persons and properties of Tories and Liberals indiscriminately, but that they would act as partisans for the Tories, and against them. The fact is, that the riot at Montreal affords no indication whatever of the relative strength of the Tory and Liberal parties in Canada. It would be as reasonable to bring forward a riot at Belfast or Londonderry, in which an Orange mob should gain some slight uncontested advantage, as a proof that the Orange party was much stronger than the Roman Catholic party throughout Ireland.

But what is the state of feeling in the other North American colonies? We are told, by the Government, that Lower Canada alone is discontented and rebellious. Her Majesty's Ministers find it quite refreshing to turn from the inflammatory denunciations and the violent resistance of the Lower Canadians, to the calm, peaceable, and well-affected inhabitants of Upper Canada. But are they not deluding themselves with vain hopes? There have been many meetings in Upper Canada, attended by great numbers of armed men; and, at those meetings, the coercive resolutions have been denounced in language as strong and as stern as in Lower Canada, and solemn pledges have been given, by those present at them, to their brethren in Lower Canada, that they will assist them to resist the oppression of the British Government, and to assert their independence. And if Upper Canada is so very quiet and well disposed, what can be the meaning of certain demands made at these meetings for redress of grievances? and why has the Governor, who, according to official judgment, had done so much good in the province, lately resigned, or been dismissed from his government? But, even if Upper Canada were really as quiet as Ministers would have us believe, they have determined that it shall not remain quiet much longer, for they have sent out as governor a man who, if he did not find a rebellion there, would be the cause of one. I have never seen Colonel Arthur — I hear from good authority that he is a man of talent and a good soldier — yet a more unfit man to be sent out as governor of a free colony could not have been selected. I pass by the grave and serious charges which have been made against him, and I ask, is a man who, for the last ten years, has had despotic sway over a penal colony, a fit man to send out as governor of a free colony? — that is, in other words, a man who has had to enforce a system of the most barbarous cruelty in a country which is one huge prison-house. It will, it must hurt the proper pride of free colonists to have such a man set over them, and especially at a moment when the public mind in a neighbouring colony, if not in the colony itself, is most highly excited. Have Ministers heard no whisper of grievances unredressed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? Have they heard nothing of stopping the supplies in Newfoundland? Why, in the Chronicle of yesterday, there was a paragraph stating that the differences in Newfoundland were not arranged, but that "no riot had yet taken place;" as if the writer was expecting every day to hear that the inhabitants of Newfoundland had imitated the Canadians in insurrection, as they have already imitated them in refusing the supplies. Why, this is the very crime of the Canadians. The Government, if they mean to act consistently in their injustice, must, at once, draw up coercive resolutions againt Newfoundland, and deprive the inhabitants of that province of their constitutional rights. The whole of British North America is in a state of uneasiness and disturbance; the Government, therefore, in any struggle, will have to contend, not against Lower Canada alone, but against all our colonies in North America.

I come now to a review of the strength of the contending parties, of the chances of success, and of the consequent advantages which England on the one hand, and the North American provinces on the other, may fairly anticipate as the result of their struggle. On one side, then, is the authority of the Executive Government, backed by the large military force, and all the power at their disposal, — I will not say supported by the power of England, because I hope and trust that the people of England would not sanction a crusade against the constitutional rights of a free colony. But, great as the power of the English Government unquestionably is, it was found insufficient, even when fostered and encouraged by the popular voice of England, to put down the comparatively insignificant force of the Americans, even at the commencement of their struggle for independence. On the other side, — the great distance from England, — the vast extent of country to be subdued and occupied, — and, above all, the determined spirit of the people, inflamed by the memory of wrongs unredressed, fortified by the conviction that they have justice on their side, — all these obstacles now interpose, as they interposed in the last century, between any attempt of the English Government to coerce our North American colonies, and a successful termination of any such attempt. There is thus the obvious obstacle of conveying troops to the other side of the Atlantic, and keeping them in a country like Canada, with four fifths of the population hostile. With a small force, you may possibly keep possession of Quebec and Montreal, though Quebec is the only really strong place in the country. Montreal is an open town, and any military operations in it would do mischief chiefly to the warehouses and dwellings of the British merchants. But to keep possession of the country districts would require a very large force, at an enormous expense, and producing no advantage whatever to this country, and it would be all but impossible for almost any force effectually to protect the steamers and other vessels navigating the St. Lawrence from Quebec upwards from the harassing attacks of any small predatory parties suddenly posted on any of the numerous islands which stud the river, or on any of the high grounds which command it. But the Canadians have two advantages which the Americans had not: first, the inducements held out, and the facilities afforded to British soldiers to desert; and secondly, the assistance which has been offered, and will unquestionably be given to them, by large and independent, but well-armed and organised bodies of citizens, from neighbouring states.

The Noble Lord denied, the other night, that there was an unusually large amount of desertion from the military force in the Canadas: the usual amount of desertion there must, then, be very large indeed; for I have from the best authority, that it is difficult to keep the regiments together, and that small detached parties frequently desert in a body. This will appear not only probable, but a thing in every way to be expected, if the position of a British soldier in North America be considered. He is, in many stations, within sight of a country where, by a few months of labour, he may save enough to enable him to become an independent proprietor, and a citizen of a great and free nation. He cannot fail to compare his ill-paid, hard-working, inferior station, on one side of the river, with what it might be on the other side; and should he fail to think or to make the comparison for himself, he finds plenty of hints and information in the public papers and in the conversation of the people. Here is one of the advertisements, many of which appear almost every week: — "Five thousand labourers wanted at Indianopolis, Indiana, at from fifteen to twenty dollars a month, and board." A Canadian paper remarks: — "We wonder whether we could be indicted for treason if we give it as our opinion that twenty dollars a month and board, in Indiana, are much better wages than sixpence a day, with the privilege of being flogged or shot, in the British army?" Moreover, the popular party, should they succeed, have lands wherewith to reward the Americans and the British soldiers who shall have assisted them. Certain lands, such as the reserved lands, the lands of the North American Land Company, and perhaps, also, certain lands which belong to persons who have meddled in the affairs of the country, to the great detriment of the people, will be confiscated and divided amongst the Americans and the British soldiers who have assisted the popular party, in proportion to the amount of service rendered. As to the assistance of American citizens, it is imagined by some persons in this country that the American Government has the power to prevent, and would prevent, any such assistance. The recent example of Texas is enough to show that, however anxious the American Government may be to prevent American citizens from taking part in a contest between a neighbouring country and one of its revolted provinces, there is no such power in the American Government. There is no Foreign Enlistment Act in America, nor any chance of such an Act being permitted in that country; and bodies of armed Americans may and will march to the assistance of the popular party in Canada which has risen against the English Government, precisely as bodies of armed Americans might and did march to the assistance of the Texians who had revolted against the Mexican government. The Government will thus have a more difficult task than they seem to anticipate. They seem, by their speeches, and by the tone of their organs of the press, to look upon the outbreak of the Canadians as a mere passing ebullition of discontent on the part of a small but factious section of the people, incited by some disappointed and ambitious demagogues.

It would be a waste of time to attempt to convince men who have resolved not to be convinced; but I must say, that the facts of the case, even as stated by their own organs, plainly contradict their assumption, and would be sufficient to make reasonable and unbiassed men somewhat doubt whether there was truth in the information conveyed to them by their dependents, that the feeling of discontent was partial, and confined to a small party of disaffected French Canadians. Take the account of the first affray between a body of the popular party and a detachment of Montreal cavalry. From that very statement, garbled and perverted as it evidently is, for party purposes, it appears that a body of some hundred insurgents appeared in arms, drawn up behind a breastwork of trees, felled and thrown across the road, that they rescued some prisoners, and put to flight the cavalry who had charge of them. The country near the scene of action is described as being in that state in which an insurgent district generally is: houses deserted — goods and provisions removed — the women and children gone to a place of safety — the men, armed with their rifles and hunting-knives, scouring the country in small parties, or, as in this case, posted in ambush in the forest, to intercept a detachment of troops. The authorities at Montreal seem to have been aware of the state of the country, or why were they so particular in their orders of caution, and their strict injunction not to pass the bridge? To show that I have fairly stated the case, here is an extract from the Chronicle: —

> On Friday morning (says the Montreal Herald, from which we gather most of our information), when about a mile from the village of Longueuil, the cavalry came up to a body of several armed men, who were stationed behind a log fence, evidently prepared for their arrival, and apparently disposed to interrupt their further progress, and rescue the two prisoners. About sixty men of this multitude went upon their knees, so as to take a deadly aim, when Malo called out, "Do not fire!" and the command was given to the cavalry to halt, which was, fortunately, promptly obeyed, as a considerable portion of the enemy's fire, given at the same moment, proved ineffectual, owing to their anticipating the continued advance of the troop. The cavalry then wheeled about, and discharged their pistols amongst the crowd, and, it is reported, with some effect, as several were supposed to be killed or wounded. The little band of volunteers providentially escaped with but, comparatively speaking, slight injury, three only being wounded, Lieutenant Ermatinger in the face, Mr. Sharpe in the leg. It is extraordinary that every individual of the corps was not cut to pieces, the disparity of numbers being so great. Several of the horses were wounded severely, owing, it is supposed, to the rebels firing so low. The houses and barns by the roadside, from which the cavalry had been fired upon in their retreat, were all found with the doors and window-shutters nailed up. A careful search was, of course, made; but though the fires were still burning in some of them, there were neither weapons nor inmates to be found in any. The party then proceeded along the road, finding the houses, with one or two exceptions only, deserted, and uniformly without arms in them. Scouts were frequently seen mounted, and riding down the several concession roads to the main roads; but on sight of the troops they uniformly started off again. An individual who was met upon the main road stated that, as he came along, he had seen numbers of men, women, and children leaving the houses along the road, and going off right and left, the men mostly armed. About six miles from Chambly a man was overtaken on the road armed. When arrested, he admitted that he had turned out to join a party that was designed to intercept the troops. About a mile further the cavalry, who were a little in advance of the main body, gave chase to a party of about thirty armed horsemen, whom they saw at some distance before them, and who made off immediately at full speed, turning to the left up a concession road towards the Belleisle mountain.

And where, it will be asked, did this affray take place, and what is this disturbed district? It must, you think, be a French district, in the very heart of the disaffected French population. No; it took place in one of those townships which are thought by the Government to be best affected. As to the alleged insignificance of the movement in Canada, and the ease with which Government expects to put down the insurrection, it would excite a smile, were not the subject of too serious and painful a nature, to hear precisely the same language now held by the Government as that which was held by the Government of the last century concerning the American resistance. Did the Noble Lord ever read a paper of Franklin's called "Rules for Reducing a Great Empire," &c.? It is very applicable to the present case.

Rules for reducing a Great Empire to a Small One, presented to a late Minister when he entered upon his Administration. — XVI. If you are told of discontents in your colonies, never believe that they are general, or that you have given occasion for them; therefore, do not think of applying any remedy, or of changing any offensive measure. Redress no grievance, lest they should be encouraged to demand the redress of some other grievance. Grant no request that is just and reasonable, lest they should make another that is unreasonable. Take all your informations of the state of the colonies from your governors and officers in enmity with them. Encourage and reward these leasing-makers; secrete their lying accusations, lest they should be confuted, but act upon them as the clearest evidence, and believe nothing you hear from the friends of the people. Suppose all their complaints to be invented and promoted by a few factious demagogues, whom if you could catch and hang, all would be quiet. Catch and hang a few of them accordingly, and the blood of the martyrs shall work miracles in favour of your purpose.

The same blind faith in the report of officials and dependents, the same overweening confidence in their own strength, the same contempt of the armed peasantry opposed to their regular troops, have been displayed in the present case. It seems as if we had undergone the disgrace and the disasters of one American war in vain — as if the affair at Lexington, which at the time was sneered at like this affray at St. John's, but which led to mighty results, had passed into oblivion — as if Franklin had never written, and Washington had never fought, against Great Britain, for the honour and the independence of their oppressed and insulted native land. But supposing that the Government should be successful in the approaching struggle — suppose that they should even succeed according to their own most sanguine expectations in speedily putting down, with little bloodshed, the insurgent Canadians, what, I ask, will be gained even by success? You will have gained a discontented province, ready on the first opportunity to break out into open rebellion, and which you will be able to keep in subjection only by a general and expensive military occupation of the country. What are the advantages supposed to be derived from that as from other colonies? An outlet for our manufactures, employment for our shipping, and a country for the emigration of our surplus population. For every one of these purposes British North America would afford a larger and fairer field, if it were an independent power friendly to Great Britain. There is an example and proof of this in the case of the United States; and as two thirds of the trade with Canada are forced and factitious, originating in the discriminating duty of forty shillings a load imposed on timber from the north of Europe over and above what is imposed on that brought from a British settlement in North America, and as almost the whole state of the Canadian trade may be shown to be injurious both to England and to Canada, there would be this great additional advantage in dealing with Canada as an independent state, that we should not then be compelled to tax ourselves to an enormous amount in taking bad and dear timber from Canada, when we could obtain cheap and good timber from the north of Europe; nor should we be forced to pay for the maintenance of a large military force to keep possession of an unwilling colony. Canada, as a colony, is already a burden to the people of England. By persevering in your present course you will destroy or diminish every one of the advantages which you are now supposed to derive from the possession of Canada should the war continue — it may even become general. All trade and emigration to Canada would be destroyed. Should the Canadians be speedily put down, yet trade and emigration would both be damaged; and should the contest terminate in favour of the Canadians, there will yet have been created such a feeling of hostility to England, that for a long time, even after separation, your trade would be almost destroyed and emigration to Canada almost prevented.

Whatever, then, the result of the present struggle, the vacillating policy of Ministers will have produced decided mischief. In this dilemma have the Ministers involved themselves, that, owing to their measures, England must incur disgrace and loss. If they fail in the contest, they will have brought on us the disgrace of an unjust and unsuccessful war, and the loss of any advantage which Canada may now confer on us; and if they succeed, they will still have brought on us the same disgrace and loss, with this difference only, that an unjust war has been successful. But how is it possible to avoid or mitigate the impending evil? Before collision had taken place between the government troops and the Canadian people — before blood had been shed — I should have said that there were two ways of avoiding the evil: one, by immediate redress of grievances, and immediate acquiescence in the demands of the Canadian Assembly. It is now, I fear, too late for that course. The other and only remaining course is, an amicable separation of the two countries. The North American provinces are now strong enough to take care of themselves, and they know it. Is it, then, prudent, to insist on keeping them in political subjection for a short time longer, knowing that they must soon be independent, and that, if coerced now, they will be hostile to England for many years; and that, if an amicable separation be effected now, while it will anticipate the period of their independence but by a few years, it will render them sure friends to England, and convert their country from a burdensome colony, into a most profitable free market for our manufactures, and a better and a more inviting field than now for emigration.

The question, then, is now no longer one between parties in the colony only — it is no longer a question of right between the popular and the official parties, nor between the majority and the minority — nor, as the Government would have it appear, between the French and English races. It has become a great and urgent question between the Government and the people of England, whether the Government shall, or shall not, be permitted to plunge the country into a contest, indefensible on any principle of justice, and likely to involve us in a general war. Will the people consent to the pouring forth of blood and treasure to uphold the authority of the Colonial Office, or to gratify the love of dominion, or, at best, to keep in unwilling subjection an expensive colony? Will they support the Government in an unjust war, and submit to additional burdens, in order to coerce the provinces of British North America? That is now the question; and it must be soon decided.

I have thus endeavoured to show what is the state of Canada, and what must be the result of war with the Canadian. I have also endeavoured to show how the evil might, even now, be averted, or much mitigated. To the weakness and incompetence — to the affected fairness and yielding, followed by threats, and oppression, and insult — to the incapacity and vacillation of the Government, the troubles which are now pressing on Canada, and those greater evils which are impending over both Canada and Great Britain, are almost entirely to be attributed. It is the present Government which, after having acknowledged the grievances of Canada, refuses to redress them — which, when the Canadians asked for justice, sent them, by way of conciliation, a coercion Bill — which has insulted the Assembly of their representatives, and violated the first principles of their constitution, and which, having thus driven the Canadians to resistance, now seeks, at the risk of a general war, to reduce them by force of arms to a state of abject submission. Whatever may be the result of the contest, I rejoice that the Canadians have resisted. Half a million of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest. The Noble Lord remembers similar words; he remembers by whom, and on what occasion, they were used, more than seventy years ago; he remembers the events of that period: but he seems to have forgotten or disregarded the warning indelibly stamped by them on the tablet of history. In defiance of experience, his Government is pursuing, now, the very course which then led to disaster and disgrace; and if they obstinately persevere in that course, I trust, and verily believe, that, even should they escape immediate and well-merited punishment, they will be held up to the scorn and execration of posterity, as the men who, with the example of the struggle for American independence before their eyes, plunged England into a disgraceful and disastrous war, for the purpose of chastising a colony which they had themselves, by their own incompetence, injustice, and misgovernment, forced into open rebellion.

I will conclude by moving, as an amendment to the question, that the Order of the Day be now read, to leave out from the word "that" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "an humble address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before the House copies of all despatches which have passed between Lord Gosford and the Colonial Office, since the date of those last presented to the House," instead thereof.

Question proposed, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question.

Mr. C. LUSHINGTON. — Although I do not intend, after what has fallen from the Noble Lord, to enter at large into the affairs of Canada, I cannot sit quietly by and hear such language as that which has been used by the Honourable Member for Westminster, without expressing the indignation which I feel. The Honourable Gentleman has described to the House scenes of outrage and of bloodshed among our unhappy countrymen in a distant part of the world, and dwelt upon them with feelings of exultation, which to almost every Member of this Assembly must have been most unpleasant and cruel to their feelings. The Honourable Member for Westminster has not expressed the slightest commiseration for the miseries which these occurrences have brought upon the Canadian people, but has exulted at acts of treason in a manner which I certainly did not expect from any Honourable Member of this House. The Honourable Member seems to revel in the idea that the course of justice has been suspended, and that the law of a party of insurgents has been established in its stead. The Honourable Member has hailed with feelings of pleasure and delight the prospect of desertion from the British army, and has adverted to the advantages which are held out to those who desert. I do not intend, as I stated when I rose, to enter into the discussion of this question; but I thought it my duty as a good and loyal subject, and as a Member of this House, to express the dissatisfaction, indeed the indignation, I felt at certain passages in the Honourable Gentleman's speech.

Mr. HUME.—The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has expressed his indignation at the language used by my Honourable Friend the Member for Westminster; but I think it would have been better if the Honourable Member had considered whether there was not just cause for that language. No one could deplore more than he did the horrors arising from a civil war, in which soldiers are forced to dye their bayonets with the blood of their fellow-subjects; but the causes that have excited rebellion should be taken into consideration; and I could have wished that the Honourable Member had directed a little attention to these causes, before attacking my Honourable Friend for discharging that which must have been a painful duty to him. The Honourable Gentleman complains that my Honourable Friend did not express any regret or commiseration at the existence of the present state of affairs in Canada. Why, so far from this being the case, my Honourable Friend commenced his speech by deploring the being obliged to bring forward, at this time, the statement of such occurrences. The Honourable Gentleman next accused my Honourable Friend of having exhibited feelings of delight at the suspension of the duties of the courts of law, in Canada, and at the desertion of the troops to the insurgents. Let the Honourable Member consider what are the duties which the soldiers are called upon to perform, and ask himself whether any man can applaud the seeing our soldiers called into the painful situation of committing acts of injustice and tyranny against their fellow-countrymen, and let him suppose what must be the feelings of the soldiers themselves under such circumstances. Let the Honourable Member inquire who has produced these evils. Is it the unoffending citizen? No; but the British Government, with all its unjust system of colonial agency, which has endeavoured to force down principles utterly inconsistent and repulsive to the feelings of the people. The Honourable Member may call the Canadians "rebels" if he pleases; but is there not as much virtue in resisting an illegal act as in upholding the principles and institutions of liberty? Does not the Honourable Gentleman suppose that there is a limit to human suffering, and that there is a point at which resistance becomes a virtue? And I would ask the Honourable Gentleman himself, whether the Canadians have not arrived at that point? The Honourable Member has, without thought, without consideration, condemned these people, who, by the tyranny of the colonial government, are forced, at this season of the year, from their own homes, and their own firesides, to brave the rigours of a Canadian winter. The Noble Lord has intimated that he will assemble the Parliament on the 16th of January, in order to take into consideration the affairs of Canada; but titles of the Bills can scarcely be heard, so that no opposition can be offered to it. The limits within which these harbour tolls are to be levied, are declared to be the port of Wexford on one side, and the Welch coast on the other, and a duty is levied on every ship passing up or down the Channel, or crossing it between these two points. This is certainly a monstrous fraud on the public. I am not aware whether the repeal of the clause can now be effected by a public Bill; but if so, I shall certainly introduce a Bill for that purpose; and if not, I shall be prepared to introduce, at the expense of Government, a private Bill repealing the obnoxious provision.

SIR FREDERICK TRENCH. — I am very happy to find that the Right Honourable Gentleman takes the view which he has expressed, and I cannot but hope justice will be done.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — I beg to return the Right Honourable Gentleman my best thanks for his explanation, which cannot fail to be very satisfactory to those who are interested in the matter.

Mr. C. FERGUSSON. — As one of the Members for Scotland, I am bound to state that great injustice has been done to the trade of that country by the mode in which private Bills have been passed in this House. I never heard of what was contemplated by this measure until it was too late. It appears to me, that the best remedy for the evils, arising out of the present mode of conducting private business, would be, to print all private Bills as well as public ones.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON.—I really see many objections to our adopting the last suggestion thrown out by my Right Honourable Friend (Mr. R. C. Fergusson), and I think it would be much better to have an abbreviated form of each private Bill drawn up. This is a point, however, which will, no doubt, be duly considered by you, Sir, and I presume that arrangements will be made to remedy every such existing evil. After the recess, I will myself propose certain resolutions in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee on Private Business, upon which a distinct system may be founded.

POOR LAW UNIONS.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I wish to direct the attention of the Noble Lord to two points connected with the administration of the poor law unions. The first is, that no chaplains are appointed to them, and no provision made for the regular performance of divine service by a proper officer. I wish to know, also, whether, in any of the unions, permission has been given to persons dissenting from the doctrines of the Established Church to attend divine worship at the meeting-houses of their own persuasion?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have directed the attention of the Poor Law Commissioners to this subject. I understand, from them, that in many of the unions chaplains have been appointed, who perform duty regularly. The particulars of the information I have received, I am not now prepared to give, but I have no objection to furnish it to the Honourable Member to-morrow. Many of the unions, the Honourable Member is aware, are now only in progress, and the arrangements are not yet matured.

Mr. MACLEAN. — These matters will probably come under the consideration of the committee appointed by the House to investigate the working of the Poor Law Amendment Act; but, unless some more satisfactory provision for the performance of divine service is made, and unless the Noble Lord takes the appointment of chaplains into his own hands, I shall bring forward a motion on this subject after the recess.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA. — ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, in rising to move the Order of the day for going into committee of supply, I wish to state, in the first place, that I do so for the purpose (which I think a very legitimate purpose) of giving the Honourable Member for Westminster an opportunity of making any remarks which may seem to him necessary or expedient on the subject of the affairs of Canada. But, lest the Honourable Gentleman may have been misled by the intentions of Government, as declared by me in this place, it will be proper for me to mention to him, and to the House, what is at present intended with respect to the adjournment of Parliament. It was intended, certainly, — and I had hoped, almost up to this day, that I should have been enabled to carry that intention into effect,—to move an adjournment of this House till the 1st of February, with the view of relieving there anything improper in these resolutions? Looking at the Noble Lord as an historian, I am surprised that the lessons of history have been so lost to him, as to suppose that a mere piece of waste paper, such as that which was sent to the Canadians, could coerce a great and free people. When Lord Gosford found that the people were determined to meet and express their opinions on the resolutions of the House of Commons, he issued a proclamation forbidding all such meetings. The proclamations were torn from the church doors; and what steps did Lord Gosford take then? He dismissed from the magistracy and the militia two persons who took part in tearing down, or rather in removing, these proclamations from the church doors. A member of the Colonial Parliament also, who had been requested to meet his constituents on the subject, was likewise dismissed from the magistracy. The governor then proceeded to deprive all officers and magistrates, who attended these meetings, of their commissions. When this was found to be the system pursued by the governor, a meeting of the inhabitants took place, where it was resolved, that to hold a commission under Lord Gosford, under existing circumstances, would be disgraceful; and all the friends of the Canadians, who held such offices, were called upon to resign them. This invitation was immediately acceded to; and scarcely one of the former magistracy remained. Lord Gosford appointed others; but the people again met, and declared that, as the newly-appointed magistrates were men who were known as those who were in league with the oppressors of their country, they would not submit their cases to them, but appointed magistrates of their own to act as arbitrators in all matters of dispute which might arise among them. Meetings of 1200 and 1400 persons were held to entertain the officers and magistrates who had resigned their commissions. Here was a state of things which the most submissive meekness could not endure. The Honourable Member for Ashburton ought to have cast his censure upon the parties who have brought on the present evils, and not upon my Honourable Friend the Member for Westminster. My Honourable Friend ought not to have been blamed for doing that which he considered to be his duty, and for trying to awake the slumbering faculties of Government to a sense of justice. The Canadians want nothing more than justice; all they ask is the assurance of good government. How often have they laid petitions before this House, complaining of their grievances, and yet all their efforts have proved fruitless! Is it, then, a matter of surprise, that, at the last moment, they should adopt violent measures, and be determined not to bow their necks to the yoke of slavery, and to such slavery as would be imposed on them, when we consider what tools the Government have in Canada, and who is the colonial authority here?

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — "Oh, oh!"

Mr. HUME. — It was, I repeat, more than the meekness of human nature could bear. There is a point at which resistance becomes a virtue; and of that point, those who make the resistance are the best judges. I regret that it is so; but the question is now, whether that time has not arrived, since the misrule of British government for the last ten years has produced the present lamentable state of affairs in Canada. I see, by the late accounts from that country, that British life and property have been sacrificed there to an extent truly deplorable; and although I believe the assurance of the Noble Lord, that there is none more sincere than himself in deprecating this state of things, I believe he has acted in total ignorance of the state of the colony; for had the Noble Lord been aware of the real condition of Canada, he would have followed the example of a Noble Duke, who said, on the subject of Catholic emancipation, with respect to Ireland, that nothing could have satisfied his conscience, if he, by his opposition to that measure, had produced civil war in Ireland only for one day. And who was that Noble Duke? Why, no other than the Duke of Wellington. Did any one blame him for that announcement? No; the whole country applauded the sentiment thus manfully expressed, and Ireland profited much by it. The fruit of the Noble Duke's timely concession was peace; and is it too much to ask the Noble Lord to follow so salutary an example, and to take the same steps with regard to Lower Canada, as were taken by the Duke of Wellington upon the question of Catholic emancipation for Ireland? We were formerly told, by their Tory oppressors, that the people of Ireland never could be at peace; that they were naturally rebellious, discontented, and factious. Why, Sir, no sooner did the Noble Duke make his declaration, and apply the obvious remedy of yielding in time, and granting that measure of relief which ought to have been long before conceded, than the whole appearance of

I wish to state to the Honourable Gentleman, that it is our intention, in the first place, to produce, to-morrow, all the information which can be produced without injury to the public service, collected from the despatches and other documents transmitted by Lord Gosford. That information being laid before Parliament, it will necessarily require some short time to read and consider. It is, further, our intention, considering that though Parliament cannot be brought together immediately after Christmas in sufficient strength to consider of matters of such importance, — yet that, at the same time, we should not be justified in delaying, till the 1st of February, the meeting of this House, — to propose an adjournment till Tuesday, the 16th of January. I have to inform the Honourable Gentleman who proposes to make the motion on the paper to-night, that I certainly do not think it would be useful or expedient that, in any answer which I may make to his remarks, I should enter into any general statement on the affairs of Canada, on which no definitive resolution can be come to in a House so thinned, by absence, as this at present is. But it is not our wish to withhold information from Parliament on a matter so grave and so important; and, in the middle of January, we propose to meet them, with the view of calling on them for their sanction to such measures as we may deem necessary; but, at all events, to call on them for their decision, ay or no, whether they will concur with us in a determination — "that those who are well affected to the Crown of this empire shall be supported," — in order that we may act, not only by command of her Majesty, but also with the full concurrence and consent of Parliament. I beg to move that the order of the day be now read for going into a committee of supply.

Mr. LEADER. — The Noble Lord has told the House that he will lay all the papers connected with this subject before it; and the Noble Lord has said, moreover, that he does not consider himself bound, at this time, to enter further into this subject. The Noble Lord will take that course which may seem to him advisable; but the urgency and importance of the Canada question not only justify me in pressing the subject on the attention of the House, but render it an imperative duty on my part to call for a discussion of the question, in order to make the House and the country thoroughly aware of the present state of British North America, and to enable them not only to form an impartial judgment on the past and present conduct, and on the intentions, of the Government, but to decide for themselves what is now the best course to be taken for the interest alike of Canada and of Great Britain. The interests, the liberties, the very lives and fortunes of our Canadian fellow-citizens, the honour and peace of this country, are in imminent danger; it cannot, then, be unreasonable or ill-timed to ask the representatives of the people to consider by what means a great, flourishing, tranquil, and eminently loyal colony has been driven into a state of disturbance, amounting to open insurrection; by what means the evil may yet be removed or mitigated; and, above all, by what means we may be saved from an unjust war, which can bring no advantage, and which, whatever be its results, must inevitably inflict dishonour on this country.

It may be advisable, first of all, to give a very brief sketch of the present uneasy state of Lower Canada, and of the chief cause of that uneasiness. The affairs of that country, owing to its disturbed state, and to the deep and painful interest which attaches to the cause of a gallant but comparatively small and feeble people, struggling for their rights against a gigantic power, have lately occupied so much of the public attention, that a very concise statement will be sufficient. For many years past the Canadians have complained of numerous grievances; and, having first petitioned in vain, they at last demanded redress. Although every one of their complaints was admitted to be well founded, their prayers were neglected, their demands were treated as unreasonable; they were too weak to command attention, for they were not considered strong enough to enforce redress. For many years they went on petitioning in vain; trusting to the generosity of England and hoping for relief, till even the hope of justice from England seems to have left them: then, and not till then, having discovered the fruitlessness of supplication, they had recourse to that legal power which their constitution gave them, and they refused to vote any money for a Government which had obstinately refused to accede to their just demands. In doing this they exercised a known, recognised, legal right conferred upon them by the constitution which England had given them. You say they used their right improperly and at an improper time, and therefore you coerce them; but you are not to make yourselves judges of the time and manner in which a constitutional assembly is to exercise a legal right. Yet such was the course pursued by the Government, when the Canadian Assembly determined to vote no supplies till their acknowledged grievances were redressed. Instead of redressing or attempting to redress the grievances complained of, our Government passed resolutions subversive of the Canadian constitution. By these resolutions the Canadians, before excited by long years of misgovernment, were driven to desperation. They saw clearly that there was no justice for them in the Executive Government, or in the Colonial Office, or in the British Parliament; that it was the intention of the Government to chastise and to oppress them. They felt that they were forced into this dilemma,—either to submit to the resolutions and be slaves, or to resist them and run the risk of civil war. In this dilemma they made that choice which would be made by every people who had once enjoyed any portion of freedom—they determined on resistance. They would have been despicable, and the English people would have been the first to despise them, if, taking the other alternative, they had tamely submitted to injustice and oppression. Their measures of resistance have been well constituted and well executed. Meetings were held, at which the resolutions, and the Ministers who passed them, were denounced in the strongest terms of indignation and defiance; addresses were issued, plainly declaring that no justice could be now expected from England,—that the Canadians must now trust to themselves alone, and that they had no chance of good government but in a separation from Great Britain; clubs were formed for the purpose of the complete organisation, and especially of mustering, and drilling, and habituating to the use of arms, and to military evolutions, the young men of the province; provisional local courts were established for the administration of law and the settling of disputes; the established courts, and those who continued to take their differences to be decided by them, were publicly denounced; all commerce and intercourse with English merchants were publicly proscribed, the Canadians pledging themselves to use no taxed articles, that they might injure the revenue, and generally to use no articles of British manufacture, that they might show their sense of the injustice which the British Government had inflicted upon them.

All these measures of resistance were carried into effect under the management of committees of vigilance appointed especially for that purpose; but the Canadian population needed little or no admonition from their leaders to induce them to adopt, and rigidly to adhere to, these measures; their hearts were in the cause, and he was considered the best patriot who most embarrassed the detested, because tyrannical, Government. So well have the measures of resistance been executed, that Canada is now in open revolt. There is one point to which I would especially call attention, and that is, to the determination of the Canadians to use no articles of British produce. The manufacturers of this country, already embarrassed to find a sufficient market for their produce, will thus be almost entirely shut out from the markets of a country which consumed, annually, a large quantity of their goods. The House will remember that precisely the same system of non-intercourse was pursued by the Americans in the commencement of their struggle. The idea was ridiculed by the minister of the day, who seemed really to believe that the Americans could not exist without articles of British produce. What was Benjamin Franklin's evidence on that occasion, when he was asked if he did not think cloth from England absolutely necessary for the Americans. "By no means," he said; "with industry and good management they may very well supply themselves with all they want." When he was further asked, if it would not take a long time to establish the manufacture among them, and if they would not in the mean while suffer greatly? "I think not," he answered; "they have made a surprising progress already; and I am of opinion that their old clothes will last them till they have new ones of their own making." The very same words may be applied to the present case, but with this addition, that the Canadians have also the advantage of getting all they want by smuggling from the United States. In this they will of course be assisted by the Americans, who derive from the same system all the advantages which the British merchant has lost. An extensive plan of smuggling is accordingly, at this moment, in active operation; it is recommended openly at public meetings, and of course assisted in every possible manner by the Americans, and the population on each side of the border. It may be said that this plan of non-intercourse cannot have the effect intended by the popular party, because there is a strong and numerous party in Canada, which, far from adopting the system, will make every exertion to defeat it. Now, where is this party to be found, and who compose it? Why, it is to be found in Montreal and Quebec only; and it is composed almost entirely of those British merchants and their dependents against whom the system is exchanges, which promise no advantage to the colonies, and which must prove utterly destructive of the analogy and harmony which have existed between the mother country and the Canadians, to be terrified from maintaining that which we believe to be just on the first manifestation of the spirit of insurrection. I trust that, whether on the first outbreak or on the last, we shall maintain the same course; and that justice, and not strength, will be taken for our rule; and that we shall not suffer ourselves to be swayed by threats or menaces, whether delivered in this House, or expressed on the other side of the Atlantic. There are those, too, in the colonies, whose interests we are bound to protect. Let it not be supposed that I mean to contend that this kingdom should have distant portions of the globe for ever dependent upon it; but I do contend, that the time when a separation, on the part of Canada, might be beneficial, has not yet arrived. I say, it is not a time for the colony to separate from the mother country, when her population is divided into two parties, of different origin, and inflamed by their passions into continual collisions with each other. In this state of things, England is enabled, by her power, to act as a mediator and umpire, and thus prevent contests which might be found still more fatal than that we now have to lament.

The Honourable Member for Middlesex has referred to the cases of Ireland and the United States. I must decline discussing the Administration of Lord Mulgrave in Ireland on the present occasion; and I will also refrain from going into particulars relative to the insurrection in the United States; but I must say, that the whole resistance of the American people was based on irrefutable facts, and on statements of positive and palpable grievances; and the abstract rights of man, such as they conceived them to be, were appealed to in support of the facts which had been previously stated. But it remains yet to be shown that such practical grievances exist in the case of the Canadians. The Honourable Member for Westminster has ingeniously quoted the opinions of Dr. Franklin, thereby endeavouring to prove that this is a case in which the redress of grievances will not be attempted. I admit that, if the ironical advice of Franklin had been followed with regard to Canada, we might naturally have expected that disturbance and civil war would succeed, as a legitimate consequence. But I find the case to be quite the contrary, for the attention of the Home Government has been actively engaged in considering, and the greatest care had been taken, and the most sedulous respect paid with regard to both the wants and wishes of the Canadian people; and I am not aware that, during the whole course of the discussions which occupied so many nights of the last Session, one single instance of a grievance, unredressed, was laid before the House, which was not instantly refuted. If that be so, what becomes of the horrors — what becomes of the menaces, the anticipations, and the prophecies of evil — which the prophets themselves contribute more than any other party to verify?

I was glad to hear from the Honourable Member for Westminster, himself, that he was favourable to separation, because we now know what is the real object which he and those Honourable Members who act with him have in view; and I hope that the closing sentiment of the Honourable Gentleman's speech will not be forgotten, in which he stated that he was aware he was addressing an unwilling audience, and that of all the Members present he knew that ten did not acquiesce in his own opinions. I trust the House will be, at all times, ready to listen to complaints of real grievances, and apply themselves with spirit and activity to redress them. But I hope, also, that the Honourable Member for Westminster will never find a majority of this House arrayed otherwise than they are now upon such questions as the present. The Honourable Gentleman has, in reference to this matter, quoted the opinion of Lord Chatham in the commencement of the American war. That same Noble Peer supplies me also with authority for my present augument. When this Noble Earl objected to our going to war against America, he stated that he considered the Americans oppressed; but here the Honourable Gentleman has come forward with no instances of actual oppression, no case of real grievance. The Honourable Gentleman has nothing to bring forward, in support of his position, but a desire for organic changes; and, resting his case upon this desire alone, he modestly proposes a separation between the colony and the mother country. Does the Honourable Gentleman forget the memorable words pronounced by Lord Chatham, seventy years ago, on his last appearance in the House of Lords, when he spent almost his dying energy in declaring that he never would consent to a separation of the American colonies from the mother country?

I think the Honourable Member for Westminster, in urging his project of separation, has rather misplaced his quotation from Lord Chatham.

But I will not longer occupy the attention of the House; I have been led further into the discussion than I had intended, from my own feelings in the case, rather than from any particular information I possess; for I have no other source of obtaining it than that which the public journals furnish, whether the manifestation of resistance which has been made in Lower Canada be trifling or not. It is not my wish to urge violent measures, if they can be avoided; I prefer conciliation: but Her Majesty's Government must not forget that when the time for action does come, nothing can be more fatal than delay; above all, we must not show alarm at those proceedings which I believe we shall ever consider as contrary to the laws of the country, as they are to the wellbeing of society.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH.—The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has asked what grievances the people of Canada have to complain of, and inquired whether they are not in their person and property secure? I think, if the Honourable Gentleman had listened to the debates of last Session, he would have found that it was admitted, even by the Treasury benches, that there were many just causes of complaint existing with respect to the condition of the Canadians. They complain, first, that the Legislative Council is adverse to the wishes of the people, and that every act of authority requires from them an unwilling assent. Another evil under which they suffer is, that there are appointed corrupt and improper judges. They allege, too, the bankruptcy of their treasury; but the last, greatest, and most severe grievance of all has been inflicted by the resolutions of this House, passed during the last Session, empowering the governor to seize the money of the Canadian people. I, for one, shall ever rejoice that I was so fortunate as to oppose those fatal and wicked resolutions, which the Noble Lord, unhappily for his future fame as a statesman, still more unhappily for his renown as a consistent supporter of liberal opinions, submitted last Session to the consideration of the House of Commons, and for which it was likewise the Noble Lord's misfortune to obtain the assent of this portion of the Legislature, and the eager and cordial approbation of the House of Peers. Those resolutions marked both a determination on the part of the Government to disregard the grievances and the wishes of the Canadian people, and an intention to violate the first and the most important principles of a free constitution, in the defence of which not only is rebellion justifiable, but resistance becomes the sacred and imperious duty of freemen,—a duty which all who belong to our race, whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic — all, in whose veins English blood has circulated, have never failed to fulfil. Nor, though of different origin, have the Canadians as yet appeared less determined to maintain their rights than other portions of the British empire. For as soon as the nature of these resolutions was known in their province, the indignation of the people was aroused, and they hastened to take the steps which will in future frustrate the effects of similar measures. The chief object of the resolutions was to enable the Government of Lower Canada to appropriate the moneys of the people without the consent of the Canadian Legislature. In order to prevent similar acts of tyranny, the Canadians have resolved that in future there shall be no moneys for the Government to appropriate. With this object in view, they have determined not to consume the articles upon which the customs of the province are levied. The greatest portions of the revenues of the province consist of duties on rum and brandy; of the former of which articles a million gallons are annually consumed, paying a duty of 1*s.* a gallon; of the latter 250,000 gallons, paying a duty of 1*s.* 6*d.* per gallon. Instead of these taxed liquors the Canadians have now determined to drink whisky and beer; instead of tea they have substituted a beverage made from roasted barley, beans, or bread crust; instead of the sugar of the sugar-cane they will use the sugar of the maple. But in addition to this course, which they have adopted for the purpose of diminishing the revenues of the province, they have resolved to be entirely independent of this country, and not to consume the productions of a people whose representatives have treated them with such cruel injustice. Instead, therefore, of the cloths and the woollens, instead of the cottons and the linens of our manufacture, they will be clad in their own homespun, in the coarse products of their own looms. Now, this is a most serious consideration, for of these fabrics this country annually exports to British North America a quantity amounting in value to nearly one million pounds sterling. In another year this sum will be considerably diminished. The consequence of which will be, that our manufacturers, who are suffering severely already from the want of a market for these articles, as I can unfortunately testify but too well, being the representative of one of the largest manufacturing communities in this empire: — our manufacturers, I say, and what is still worse, the labourers dependent upon them, will suffer still more severely than they now do, by a still further contraction of the market, and by the diminution of employment consequent thereon. Great additional misery, therefore, will be occasioned to this portion of the community by a quarrel with Canada. Nor let it be supposed that when these turmoils are over this country will, as a matter of course, again supply the markets of British North America; for if the present disputes should end, as is most probable, in a civil war, and if that civil war should terminate, as is still more probable, in the separation of the two countries, a considerable period must elapse ere commercial intercourse will be recommenced: meanwhile the wants of the Canadians will give rise to rival fabrics in British North America, supplying the same articles as we now supply; the manufacturers will form an interest hostile to our trade; they will expect, they will demand, protection for their produce; and in a certain degree they will appear justified in so doing, and in claiming a recompence for services rendered during a period of war. Thus this country will not only be deprived of its present trade to the Canadian provinces, but be cut off from that future extension of it which must take place to an enormous degree if this country were to continue to supply the markets of that great and flourishing province; a portion of the world which is now most rapidly increasing in a population fitted by taste and habits to consume our manufactures, and whose inhabitants this country could supply with the unrivalled produce of its manufacturing skill at the cheapest possible rate.

I must beg pardon of the House for having dwelt somewhat at length on the possible consequences of a struggle with Canada; but I felt it a duty which I owed to the constituents who have so kindly placed me in my present distinguished position; and I trust that the representatives of the other great manufacturing emporiums of Birmingham, Sheffield, and Manchester will equally feel it their duty to protest against a course of policy which will inevitably raise up rival manufacturing interests in the north of America, and which will cause the exclusion of our manufactures for a long time, at least, to a great extent,— probably for ever,— from the markets of a nation which already annually consumes two millions of the productions of this country. I must protest against a line of conduct which will make the Canadian nation view us with detestation, and induce them, on the first occasion, and most justifiably, to give the sanction of the law to that non-intercourse which they have already proclaimed against this country. But, to return to the conduct pursued by the Canadians in consequence of the arbitrary measures of the Government, for the purpose of enforcing the system of non-intercourse. In many of the counties public meetings were held, at which magistrates, officers of militia, and other individuals of weight and importance attended. At these meetings resolutions were passed prohibiting the consumption of the obnoxious articles, and denouncing as enemies to the patriotic cause those who dared to disregard these injunctions; resolutions likewise were agreed to encouraging smuggling, as the easiest means of diminishing the public revenues, and of frustrating the views of the public enemies; at the same time a general plan of organisation was adopted and put in force throughout the country. Committees of vigilance were appointed in each parish and in each county, to communicate with the central committee at Montreal. The object of the committee of vigilance was to enforce the regulations of the non-intercourse system, to which even the country traders swore obedience. The few persons who acted in opposition to the popular feeling were admonished by the committees to be more patriotic in future, and in some cases the offenders were punished by the destruction of their property; but in general these committees had but little occupation; so strong was public opinion on the subject — so willing were the people to obey and to follow their leaders. Lord Gosford was, it would appear, alarmed by this conduct of the popular party; on the 15th of June he issued a proclamation, in which he denounced as seditious and unlawful all meetings of a description similar to those just mentioned; he commanded all magistrates, militia officers, and peace officers to prevent these assemblages by every means in their power. This proclamation produced no effect; meetings continued to be held, magistrates and other functionaries continued to attend, and on one occasion, it is said, the magistrates themselves tore to pieces the proclamation, in the presence and amidst the cheers of the assembled multitude. Militia officers are said to have acted in the same manner before their companies, to whom they were ordered to read the proclamation. Lord Gosford then proceeded to take the step of dismissing every magistrate and militia officer who, he was informed, had attended any one of these meetings. I will not say that Lord Gosford was to be condemned for this conduct; but I do say, that the persons dismissed considered themselves to be honoured by this act of the Government, and a number of magistrates who found that a similar distinction was not conferred upon themselves hastened to resign their commissions. In the county of Two Mountains sixty commissions were said to have been returned at once. The functionaries who were dismissed or resigned on all occasions received the public thanks of the committees of their counties. In consequence of these dismissals and resignations, some of the counties were without acting magistrates: the people hastened to supply the want by appointing magistrates of their own.

The following is the account I have received of the mode in which this was effected in the extensive county of Two Mountains: — On the 15th of October there was a general meeting of the freeholders of that county, at which "sundry wise and discreet persons were chosen by each parish to fill the office of justice of the peace and pacificator." The duty of these justices is, "to conciliate the differences and difficulties which may hereafter arise between the Reformers of their localities, with power to judge and determine all complaints which shall be brought before them." From the decision of the justice-pacificator an appeal was instituted to the permanent committee of the county. To enforce these regulations, "Reformers were declared bound in honour to bring their cases before the justice-pacificator, in preference to the Queen's courts." Reformers who refused to acknowledge the authority of the said justices, or who carried their complaints before the Queen's courts, "in preference to those of honour and conciliation now established," &c., were to be "deprived of their votes at any public meetings," and "not to be elected by Reformers to any office;" were to be "censured publicly, which censure was to be exposed on the church doors." With regard to the militia, it was resolved, "That the Reformers who began to drill should form themselves in each parish into volunteer companies of militia, under the command of officers elected by the militiamen, and shall be drilled in the management of fire-arms, and in light infantry evolutions and movements." It was resolved, likewise, that officers who had been dismissed be re-elected by the militiamen. In the midst of these events, on the 17th of August, the House of Assembly was called together. The governor, in his speech, officially communicated the resolutions which had been agreed to by the Imperial Parliament, informed the House of Assembly that the demise of the Crown would make no alteration in the councils of the Ministry, and concluded by asking for a vote of money to pay the salaries of the officials. The Assembly, in reply, maintained all its former positions, and refused to grant any money till the grievances complained of were redressed. The House of Assembly likewise, in its address to the governor, very properly commented in the strongest and most indignant terms on the resolutions in question. The House of Assembly said, "It is our duty to tell the mother country, that if she carries the spirit of these resolutions into effect in the government of British America, and of this province particularly, her supremacy therein will no longer depend on the feelings of affection, of duty, and of mutual interest, which would best secure it, but on physical and material force." These plain words ought to make the deepest impression on our minds, and ought to convince us what will be the conduct of the Canadian people if we do not hasten to do them justice. The tone of the debate in the House of Assembly, on the address, was similar to that held at the public meetings throughout the country. The proclamation of the governor against these meetings was denounced, the conduct of the magistrates and others in attending them was highly approved of, and the people were exhorted to adhere to the system of non-intercourse, and to carry it out to its fullest extent.

These determined proceedings on the part of the House of Assembly induced the governor to prorogue it on the 26th of August, after a Session of only ten days. Since that period, the system of organisation, to which I have already referred, has been more and more extended throughout the province. Riots have taken place, blood has been shed, the troops have been called out, and there is every appearance of an approaching struggle. Such is the state of Lower Canada. But Upper Canada is by no means tranquil: a political union is extensively ramified throughout the townships and counties of Upper Canada, similar, in many respects, to the committees of vigilance in Lower Canada. The members of the union have set an example which has been followed by their friends of the lower province. they have petitioned the Congress of the United States for a free trade between Canada and the neighbouring states, and, in the mean time, they have systematically encouraged smuggling by every means in their power. What has been the conduct of the Government, in this crisis, with regard to Upper Canada? The office of governor to that province was vacant. Whom ought a wise and reflecting Ministry to have chosen to fill this most important post? Undoubtedly, some person eminent for his talents, still more eminent for his high virtues, who would have commanded the respect of all parties. To whom have the responsible advisers of the Crown confided the task of conciliating the inhabitants of Upper Canada, and inspiring them with regard for British authority? To the most obnoxious and unpopular person they could find in this country, with the exception of the gaoler of St. Helena, — a gentleman whose conduct has excited the loudest and most vehement complaints, and produced almost rebellion in every colony over which he has ruled. Whether these complaints are just or not, I will not pretend to say; but, whilst they exist, the policy of the Government in selecting such a person for so delicate an employment seems most dubious. But I condemn this appointment on other grounds: I condemn it from having carefully studied the conduct of Colonel Arthur whilst that gentleman was governor of Van Dieman's Land, from having examined Colonel Arthur himself, and from his despatches to the Colonial Office, which were laid before the Transportation Committee of last year, of which I had the honour to be chairman. From that evidence, it appears, that during the last twelve years Colonel Arthur has possessed despotic powers for the sole purpose of framing a system of atrocious and unheard-of cruelty, such as stands unparalleled in the annals of nations; his sole object was to inflict pain — intense pain — to render the condition of the convict most wretched and degraded — to make Van Diemen's Land what it now is, a hell upon earth — a fitting abode for the criminals whom he, by his tortures, converted into still worse fiends. I most readily admit that, in so acting, Colonel Arthur only obeyed the commands of the Colonial Office, that he in nowise outstripped, or even acted up to, the strict letter of those commands, and that he merely followed out the necessary consequences of transportation, and enforced a system of punishments, the existence of which is the deepest disgrace to this country. But I contend that the feelings, the habits, and the dispositions of a gentleman who for twelve years wielded the most uncontrolled authority, and for that period administered, and could administer, such a frightful system of evil, must make him unfit to be the constitutional governor of a free province, inhabited, not as the Australian colonies are, by the ruffians, felons, prostitutes, and outcasts of England, but by a high-minded and a moral race, who will feel most indignant at the insult thus offered them. Nor are the other colonies in North America in that state of political repose and placid tranquillity which would be most agreeable to the feelings of the Noble Lord, who calmly slumbers at the head of the Colonial Department. Newfoundland has refused to grant the supplies. Is a coercion Bill ready for that province? Are the resolutions to seize its revenues prepared? Nova Scotia and Prince Edward's Island have both declared in favour of an elective Legislative Council; and in New Brunswick the most perfect harmony does not exist between the Assembly and the Executive. No reliance, therefore, can be placed on these provinces in a struggle between this country and Lower Canada. But to return to Lower Canada. The events to which I have referred prove that the Canadians are determined not to submit to the mandates of her Majesty's Ministers —resolve to prevent injustice by force— and, if needs be, to defend their rights by an appeal [to the sword. Now, what course do her Majesty's Ministers intend to pursue? It seems to me, that they can prudently and wisely adopt but two courses. They ought either to attempt to conciliate the Canadians by acquiescing in all the demands of the Legislative Assembly which are not inconsistent with the connection of the two countries,— they ought to grant an elective Legislative Council, and, by these and similar measures, they might prolong, for some time, the dominion of this country over Canada. The other, and, perhaps, the wiser course would be, now, to propose a separation of the two countries, as the mass of the Canadian people no longer desire the dominion of this country; and when the greatest portion of the population of a colony feel dissatisfied with the authority of the mother country, then, it appears to me, that the period has arrived at which a friendly separation would be beneficial to the interests of both countries. These are the only alternatives which can be beneficially adopted. The remaining alternative, the one which I fear Ministers intend to pursue, is, to adhere to their past policy, and to assert the supremacy of this country over Canada, without redressing the grievances of the Canadian people. The inevitable result of such a course will be a civil war, unless the people of this country are, as I trust they are, wise enough to forbid it, and to hurl from power the Administration who would dare to propose an appeal to arms. I fear that it is the intention of Ministers to pursue a course which will lead to a civil war, because I find they are now sending troops to Canada. Can the Ministers, I would ask, depend upon the soldiers in Canada? Desertion, I understand, is going on to a great extent, especially in Upper Canada; hardly a week passes that the muster-roll of each regiment is not diminished in this manner; thirty soldiers in one week deserted from Toronto alone; parties are obliged to be stationed at the points of easy egress to the American frontier, in order to prevent desertion, and these parties (generally serjeants' parties), sometimes desert themselves. The 24th regiment, I have been informed, has been almost wholly renewed since it has been in Canada. Nor is desertion to be wondered at, when the rate of wages and the demand for labour across the lines are known. A labourer can obtain from fifteen to twenty dollars a month; and as rich land costs only a dollar and a half an acre, the labourer can, by a few months' savings, make himself independent.

With regard to the demand for labour, advertisements of the following kind are not unfrequently to be seen in the Canadian papers:—"Five thousand labourers wanted at Indianopolis, Indiana, at from fifteen to twenty dollars a month, and board." It seems to me that a British soldier would be patriotic to a romantic degree, who would not, even in time of peace, prefer twenty dollars a month and board, in Indiana, to sixpence a day, and the privilege of being flogged, in the British army; but in time of war, in an unjust and unholy war as this would be, the patriotism of a soldier who would remain in the British service one moment longer than he could help, would be miraculous, tempted, as that soldier undoubtedly would be, by an offer of a portion of the territories of the anti-popular party; for instance, by a share in the fertile possessions of the Land Company, or in the rich fiefs of Beauharnois. In all events, therefore, a war with Canada would be attended with the greatest difficulties. I shudder, Sir, at the idea of the consequences of a civil war with Canada; it would undoubtedly involve this country in a contest with the United States of America. First, it would bring our Government in collision with the governments of the states bordering on Canada, for volunteers by thousands would swarm into Lower Canada from Maine, Vermont, New York, and Kentucky, animated as they would be by the love of adventure,—animated still more by the desire of driving the last relics of monarchy from North America,—tempted, likewise, by the promises of rich lands, by the possessions of the anti-popular party. In this respect, I say, let Texas be a warning of what we may expect from America in the event of a struggle for Canada. Though this interference in the affairs of Canada would at first be confined to individual Americans, it would not terminate there; the conduct of American subjects would not be passed over unnoticed by our Government; complaints and remonstrances would be made to the Union, and the Union would be called upon to prevent its subjects from bearing arms against our troops. This, even if it were willing to do, it could not effect; for how powerful soever the central government of the United States may be, when it goes along with the wishes of the people, it is most feeble when the people are opposed or indifferent to its commands, or when one or more of the sovereign states are desirous of evading its decrees. It is exactly in a case like this that the central government of that republic is weakest; for how anxious soever it may be, from general views of policy, to prevent all interference in the affairs of Canada,—all hostilities with this country,—yet its people will see in this struggle but a repetition of their own glorious struggle for independence; they will behold in the conduct of England towards Canada the sequel of those despotic and unjust principles which, a little more than half a century ago, caused them to shake off our yoke; they will rejoice in the triumph of the Canadians, as the great and final victory of democracy in the New World,—they will sympathise with their northern brethren as sufferers in the same great cause of liberty; and, animated by these noble, these good and generous feelings, they will take a part in that conflict, which, whatever may be the temporary vicissitudes of war, will never terminate till our dominion in America be for ever destroyed. That that dominion should now be brought to a conclusion, I, for one, most sincerely desire; but I desire it should terminate in peace and friendship, leaving behind it the memory of past kindnesses and mutual benefits, paving the way to new and more intimate connections, arising from commercial intercourse and the opening of new channels of beneficial trade; leaving, therefore, to this country all the advantages of a vast and increasing market for our manufactures, without the burden, vexation, and expense of governing a remote region. Great would be the advantages of an amicable separation of the two countries; and great would be the honour this country would reap in consenting to such a separation; great, also, would be the renown which a Ministry would derive from proposing such a measure. I can hardly endure to look at the consequences of a forcible separation. The expenditure of blood and of treasure, great as they would be, are not the greatest among the evils which such a war must engender; we must calculate the baneful prejudices, the odious antipathies, which it will produce amongst nations whose mutual interest it is to cultivate kindly feelings towards one another. We must remember more than half a century has hardly sufficed to obliterate the bad feelings between this country and America, which resulted from the American struggle for independence; and now, when the two nations have begun, as they ought, mutually to admire and respect one another, it must be a matter of the deepest regret to all thinking minds that a new conflict should disturb the relations of amity which are equally beneficial to both. Moreover, such a war invariably appeals to the vilest passions of a nation,—to its worst national vanities, and tends, for a time, to put a stop to all improvements; and many who fear the march of improvement will, I doubt not, gladly seize upon such an opportunity as the present, with the hope of occupying, by war, the national mind, and turning it away from the consideration of reform; and thus delaying, for a time, the progress of all reform. I sincerely trust that the people of this country are enlightened enough to forbid such a war, to disregard the prejudices in favour of extended dominion, and count as little the loss of a useless portion of their territories, when those territories can only be maintained by the infliction of such enormous evils. Should, however, a war take place, I must declare that I should more deplore success on the part of this country than defeat; and though, as an English citizen, I could not but lament the disasters of my countrymen, still it would be to me a matter of less poignant regret than a success which would offer to the world the disastrous and disgraceful spectacle of a free and mighty nation succeeding, by force of arms, in putting down and tyrannising over a free, though feebler community, struggling in defence of its just rights. May such a calamity be averted! May such a reproach never fall upon this country! But if, unhappily, a war does ensue, may speedy victory crown the efforts of the Canadians, and may the curses and execrations of the indignant people of this empire alight upon the heads of those Ministers, who, by their misgovernment, ignorance, and imprudence, involve us in the calamities of civil discord, and expend our national resources in an unholy struggle against liberty! And then ——

[Loud cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. C. LUSHINGTON. — I would appeal to the Chair whether such language as the Honourable Baronet has used is proper for the House to hear?

MR. HUME. — I rise to order. I claim for every Honourable Member of this House full and free liberty of speech, to express his sentiments upon this or any other question, whenever he may think proper to do so, the language always being fitting to the occasion; and I maintain that no man should dare to interrupt him.

SIR W. MOLESWORTH. — I will not trouble the House further.

SIR G. GREY. — After the statement which has been made by my Noble Friend near me (Lord John Russell) as to the course which the Government have deemed the proper one to be adopted, in order to obtain the deliberate judgment of the House, as to the measures which they will feel it their duty to lay before it, for their consideration, I certainly do not intend to enter at length into the various topics and statements which have been brought forward by the Honourable Members who have spoken on this side of the House, and which, I think, might well have been postponed until the information promised to be laid on the table to-morrow had been in their hands. I the more regret that this course has not been followed, and that Honourable Members should have thought fit to enter into a discussion as to the present affairs of Canada, and the measures which are necessary to be adopted in consequence, before the papers to which I have alluded had been laid before them, because the information contained in those papers would have tended to correct some statements which have been made in the course of the speeches to-night, and which I can only characterise as gross misrepresentations of facts as to the real state of affairs in the Canadian provinces. From those statements it would appear that a contest is actually going on between the British Government on the one hand, and the united people of those provinces on the other.

Mr. HUME. — Hear, hear!

SIR G. GREY. — The Honourable Member for Kilkenny cheers me, intimating thereby that such is his opinion; but in the face of the House and of the country I positively and solemnly deny that such is the fact. The Honourable Members who have spoken seem very carefully to have examined the Canadian papers for the resolutions passed at public meetings by those of the inhabitants of those provinces who are in opposition to the British Government; but have they been equally careful in noticing the numerous meetings which have been held in different parts of the provinces, at which some of the most influential of the Canadians have recorded, in the strongest and most unmistakable manner, their sense of the value of the British constitution, their decided attachment to the British constitution, and their firm determination to uphold by all means in their power the connection existing between the two countries. Are not those Honourable Members aware that there is in Canada, at the present moment, a powerful, influential, and numerous minority, who, deprecate the steps which have been taken by the majority of the Legislative Assembly, — a minority who, having invested their capital in the colony, in dependence on the security which the connection with the mother country affords them, dread the success of any measures which may lead to a separation of the countries, and which, however desirable it may be to some Honourable Members in this House, cannot but be attended with ruinous results, not only to the British but also to the French population of Lower Canada. I would remind the House, that the people of Canada enjoy many advantages underth dominion of the British Crown. They are the most lightly taxed people that I know of; they possess the privileges of British subjects, and the protection of the British Crown, and peculiar advantages, which, in the event of a war on the North American continent, and the amalgamation of the colony with the United States, they could not hope to retain. It has been said that the entire of Canada is at present in a state of commotion; but that is far from the fact. It is unfortunately true that a portion of Lower Canada is in a state of disturbance, nay, that, if not in actual insurrection, it is bordering upon it; and that a conflict has taken place between the disaffected and her Majesty's troops. But this state of things by no means extends itself over the whole surface of the provinces, for in by far the greater portion of it not only is the law vindicated, but the government authorities in those parts of the provinces are able to offer the Government the best assurances that any attempt to spread disaffection in them would signally fail. The Honourable Member for Westminster has adverted to the unhappy occurrence which took place on the sixth of last month at Montreal, and has charged the Government with taking part with a lawless mob, and opposing the French Canadians, and driving them out of the town.

Mr. LEADER. — I did not accuse the Government of such a proceeding. I merely stated that such was the opinion of the Canadian population.

SIR G. GREY. — I am surprised to learn that the people of the colony are not aware that, in that affair, the French Canadians were the aggressors; and, being resisted by the English people, the British troops were called out to protect the French people themselves, and it is to that interference that M. Papineau owes the preservation of his property. Allusion has been made to the hostility which exists between the two races composing the Canadian population. That is a fact deeply to be deplored; but the Government have, honestly and zealously, applied themselves to remove that feeling of jealousy. It has been its earnest object to reconcile the moderate men of both parties, who desire the redress of real grievances, and are opposed to every measure having a tendency to sever the colony from the mother country. Hitherto, the attempt to moderate the extreme opinions of either party has, to a certain extent, failed; but I trust that the example set on a former occasion by this House, when party feeling was merged in a general desire to promote the advantage of the empire at large, will have the effect of rallying round the Government in the present crisis all men who are anxious to prevent the spilling of blood, and to see peace restored. The Honourable Member for Westminster would induce the House to believe that sympathy and cordiality exist between the French party in Lower Canada and the inhabitants of the other provinces in British North America. If I am to understand that Honourable Member as disclaiming any feeling of dissatisfaction at the supposed existence of such a state of affairs, I am happy to be able to assure him that the fact is quite otherwise; and the best proof to the contrary I can adduce is to be found in the fact, than in Upper Canada all the British soldiery have been dispensed with by the authorities, and placed at the disposition of Sir John Colborne, who commands in the lower province. It has been said that New Brunswick participates in the revolt. From what source this intelligence has been derived I cannot say; but I am in a situation to assure the House that the latest intelligence received from that quarter by the Government mentions that a unanimous vote has just been passed by the United Assembly of the province, expressing, in a very warm manner, their gratitude to the British Government for the conduct and policy which it has adopted towards them, and which, I will say, is precisely the same as was pursued with regard to Lower Canada up to the month of July last. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has brought forward very general charges against her Majesty's Government, to which I do not think it at all necessary to reply; but he has, with an impartiality which certainly does him credit, denounced every colonial governor as a tyrant. To a general charge of this kind I can only give a general denial; but if the Honourable Member has any specific complaints to make, let him bring them forward, and I promise him that they shall be fairly gone into.

And this brings me to the remarks which have been made with respect to the appointment of Sir George Arthur. The Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds has said, that Colonel Arthur is totally unfit to conduct the government of a liberal and free-minded people; and has referred to the evidence given before the Transportation Committee, of which the Honourable Member himself was chairman. Now, I was also a member of that Committee, and, until the present moment, I was not aware that an opinion unfavourable to Colonel Arthur was entertained by any Honourable Gentleman who sat on that Committee; and, certainly, my opinion of Colonel Arthur's conduct differs very materially from that entertained by the Honourable Baronet. It is my opinion that the colony of Van Diemen's Land flourished under Colonel Arthur's rule to an unprecedented extent, and under circumstances naturally disadvantageous. The Honourable Baronet has admitted that Colonel Arthur only executed his instructions. But why not, then, blame the instructions, and not the man whose duty it was to act according to them? Colonel Arthur has served under various colonial secretaries, and has received marks of approbation from many holding different political opinions from his; and I will say that, numerous as were the charges which were alleged against Colonel Arthur, he did not shrink from meeting them. Not one, however, could be substantiated; indeed, one only was persisted in, and it will be in the recollection of the House that that was most satisfactorily refuted. It is asked whether I have not heard of a certain Honduras memorial? In answer to that question, I may state, that the Honourable Member for Southwark, a few nights ago, gave notice of a motion for the production of a letter sent from Honduras to Lord Bathurst in 1822. I have looked for the document, but have been unable to find one of that date; but I discovered a memorial presented in the preceding year from Honduras, deprecating the return of Colonel Arthur in the strongest terms. There also exists another document relating to Colonel Arthur's conduct in liberating certain persons whom he believed to be unjustly held in slavery. This brought on him the odium of the slave-masters; but it was found afterwards that his conduct had been perfectly proper. When, therefore, the Honourable Member for Southwark makes his motion, I will take care also to call for a copy of those two documents. I am confident that the choice made by the Ministry of this officer for the government of Canada will be fully justified by the wise liberality and firmness with which he will discharge his duties. The Honourable Member for Leeds has stated that many British troops have fallen in the collisions that have taken place between them and the French Canadians. I see no reason for believing that statement; and, indeed, I do not think that even one has fallen. I have every reason to believe that the Government, backed by the authority of Parliament, will be enabled, in a very short period, to stem the tide of insurrection in Canada, and to restore to that colony the advantages of peace and tranquillity which, under the dominion of the British Crown, I hope it may long enjoy.

Mr. WARBURTON. — If the course of the House on this occasion turned on any amount of facts necessary to be ascertained, as to whether the present position of affairs in Canada was attributable to the conduct or misconduct of any particular party, I should have wished that this discussion had been delayed until the papers proposed to be laid on the table by the Noble Lord had been produced; but, considering the existing posture of affairs in that province to be the natural consequence of a colony emerging from its infancy and opening into manhood, I do not see how the information which the official papers contain can assist their discussion. As to the conduct of M. Papineau, or of the British Government, I do not think that, whether it have been right or wrong, on the one side or on the other, it has anything at all to do with the question. I admit all the charges that have been alleged against what is called the liberal party to be well founded. I admit, if you will, that their conduct has been treasonable, — call it by what name you please; still I will say, that the conduct of the British Government towards Canada has been, I will not say criminal, but I will give it a name which generally implies what is worse than a political crime, — I will call it a political blunder. An Honourable Member has said, "Show me wherein the conduct of the British Government has been oppressive towards the people of Lower Canada." Why, Sir, that may be considered oppressive by the people on the other side of the Atlantic which would not be considered oppressive here. You may alter the government of a colony, — you may introduce a better system, as in the case of Marshal Suchet, in the Spanish provinces, in the government of which all admit that he effected great improvements. His administration of power was infinitely superior to that of the preceding authorities. Yet the resistance of the people of those provinces to his measures was justifiable, for the changes were not in accordance with their wishes. We must not judge of the feelings and principles of the inhabitants of other countries by our own feelings and principles. How well was it said by Mr. Fox, with reference to the Canadians, in the debate on the Quebec Bill, — "Make them feel that their institutions may be advantageously compared with the republican institutions of neighbouring states." Who will tell me, when, during the last twelve years, the table of the House has been covered with petitions from the Canadians, complaining of their grievances, — when committee on committee has been appointed to take those grievances into consideration, and when the justice which this country always professes its disposition to administer, has been so tardy in its administration as not to be worth the having, — who will tell me that the Canadians have no cause for dissatisfaction? Look at all those things, — the admitted evils, and the delay in providing a remedy, — and then tell me if they have no reason to complain of oppression, and of the acts of the Legislature and Government of this country? There are but two courses open to her Majesty's Government in this case. On the one hand, there is the course which has been so often recommended, not merely by a few Gentlemen of the party with whom I usually act, but by some of the most enlightened Members on the other side of the House, and which was so strongly recommended by Lord Ashburton, when he had a seat in this House. "Let the Canadians," said that Noble Lord, "be governed in such a manner as may prepare them at the earliest possible period for a state of independence." Has this been done? Instead of characterising the demands of the Canadians by the term "organic changes," it ought to have been considered whether those demands related to objects which the Canadians themselves thought desirable? If, on the whole, concession to those demands would have introduced a greater portion of democratic arrangements, what had that to do with the question whether those arrangements would be consistent with the principles of our Government at home? Why not give the Canadian people that which it was evident their hearts were so ardently set upon? Have they not repeatedly demanded an elective council? Why not give it them? "Oh, but," exclaim the opponents of their claims, "that would be an organic change." The answer is, that it is the change which the Canadians wish for. There is this course, therefore, that the Government of this country can pursue; namely, to grant all the changes, organic or not, which the Canadians demand; and by so doing, the separation, which must ultimately take place, may for some time longer be delayed. But if you are not prepared to do this, then we come to that alternative which sooner or later you will be obliged to adopt, namely, separation. I am not one of those who would view the adoption of such a course with alarm; on the contrary, I consider that such a step might be fraught with advantage to the mother country.

Let the House consider the advantages which would result from this course of policy. In the first place, there would be an immense saving of expense to this country, as we should no longer have to pay the charges of the Canadian Government, and the innumerable other charges consequent on our possession of that country. I do not allude to the mere expenses of the Executive, but we must take into the account the enormous sums which it has been necessary to expend for the purpose of advancing the prosperity of the colony. Twelve years ago, when I first entered this House, one of the first subjects which I heard discussed was the Rideau canal, the expense of which was estimated at above a million and a half of money. That is only a single instance of the vast expense to which these colonies have subjected the mother country. No colony, while the mother country is employed in raising it up, can be productive, but it is, on the contrary, a source of continued expense to the mother country. The object of colonising is, to plant on a deserted soil, or on a soil inhabited only by savage hordes, a population which, when it becomes powerful and enlightened, may repay the care and expense which has been bestowed upon it, by becoming consumers of the produce of the nation from which it sprung. This is the promised land to which all states look when they plant colonies. Up to the present period the Canadas have been productive of nothing to the mother country but expense. To get rid of them, therefore, would be to get rid of a certain loss of money. The very trading monopoly occasioned by our possession of the Canadas has (as I have frequently represented to the House) cost the country 1,200,000*l.* in that amount of protecting duties. If we get rid of the Canadas, that extension of trade will follow, which is the necessary consequence of the independence and prosperity of a colony. All the advantages will accrue to both countries which, under the principles of free trade, must flow from an interchange of commerce. Such is the invariable result of the prosperity that follows the establishment of independence. The next advantage will be the encouragement to emigration, which is occasioned by separation. If the House were to inquire into the extent of emigration from this country to the United States, while those states were colonies of Great Britain, with the extent of emigration after those colonies became independent, they would see that the increased demand for labour which followed independence, was the source of very extensive emigration. Let it not be said, therefore, that we are to retain the Canadas as an outlet for those who wish to emigrate; or that, if a separation were to take place, there would be no longer any emigrants to that country: I am, on the contrary, convinced, that if Canada were free, the present extent of emigration would soon be doubled.

But there are other advantages, too obvious to render it necessary to dwell upon. There is the saving of the expense and misery of a cruel and disgraceful civil war. The next advantage is, the escape from the danger in which we are placed, while we maintain these colonies, of being engaged in war with other countries. Disagreements have already taken place between the diplomatic agents of this country and of the United States, with reference to the boundaries. Those boundaries are still unsettled; and on the settlement of them it is not impossible that discussions may arise which will involve the two nations in hostilities. Now, if we were to make up our minds to an amicable separation, we should avoid all the consequences of war; we should avoid all the bad feelings engendered by every war, but which are produced in a tenfold degree by civil war. I believe, therefore, that if we could put aside those sentiments of national pride by which so many persons are influenced, and which frequently lead Governments to adopt measures which they know in their hearts to be injurious to the countries the affairs of which they are administering, we should desire a separation. So far am I from regarding it with feelings of shame or disgrace (I believe the alternative would be productive of more shame and disgrace), that I devoutly wish the period of separation had arrived; convinced as I am that the change which must then take place in the relations between these colonies and the mother country will be advantageous to all parties. If, on the other hand, we determine to retain the Canadas by a war, we must be prepared to incur all the corresponding disadvantages. And what I most fear, as one of the consequences of the breaking out of civil war in the Canadas, is, that it may involve us in hostility with the United States, and that will necessarily lead to the breaking out of war in Europe. The course of events which would lead to this result, and which has already been pointed out by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds, is obvious. Thousands of American citizens would cross the boundaries for the purpose of assisting the Canadians. That would occasion complaints by Great Britain that the United States were taking part against us in the quarrel between ourselves and our colonies. Now, we all know that the Government of the United States, if they were inclined to do so, could not prevent American citizens from taking part in that quarrel. But the circumstance would produce a state of exasperation between the two countries, and the transition to war would be easy. This country, then, would be engaged in hostilities with the United States; and being so engaged, a quarrel between this country and some of the European states would inevitably follow. If I am asked what powers would be most likely, if they did not actually engage in war with us, to take a course which would be highly detrimental to our interests, I would say, all the northern powers of Europe. Russia, Prussia, Sweden, Norway, if they did not do so openly, would secretly endeavour to promote the cause of the Canadians, in order to destroy the forced trade which we have established with the Canadas; and to recover their full and free trade with this country. This is an object which in the event of a war would render all those powers either the open or the secret allies of our American colonies. As to the question of the advantages or disadvantages which would result to the people of Canada from a separation from this country, that is a point which I am not now prepared to discuss — that is, of course, entirely a matter of opinion. But if a people take up arms, and subject themselves to all the penalties attendant upon revolt and insurrection, for the attainment of what they consider to be a beneficial object, it cannot but be acknowledged that of the value of that object they must be the best judges. It is foreign to the question to say that you can draw up a bill of indictment against the colony. I am convinced by their conduct that the Canadian people are dissatisfied with the Government of this country. It has been frankly admitted that the supporters of the British Government in Canada are only a minority of the population. And yet, forsooth, because there are certain persons in Canada who are well affected towards the British Government, and are anxious for the continuance of the connection with this country, we are therefore to pay no respect to the wishes of the majority; but for the sake of the minority we are to entail upon the colony all the horrors of a civil war. But there were loyalists in the United States on the breaking out of the revolt in that country, and there are Orangemen in Ireland; and the fact that a minority of Canadians are favourable to British rule proves nothing more than this, — that in Canada, as in every other country where there is political excitement, there are parties who hold opposite political opinions upon agitated questions.

I must say, that the conduct pursued with reference to this subject by the present Government, considering to what party in the state they belong, strikes me with astonishment. In the course of my reading, as bearing upon the history of this country, I have always admired the conduct of the Whigs at the time of the quarrel between the American colonies and the mother country as one of the brightest efforts that was ever made in the cause of freedom. Such being my feelings and opinions, I cannot but lament that the same party are now pursuing a course so much opposed to that which they formerly adopted; and I exclaim, —

Who would not laugh, if such a man there be?
Who would not weep, if Atticus were he?

But, Sir, I must say, that if the indications which have this night been given are to be followed up — if the course which has been darkly shadowed out be realised — if that be carried into effect, which I fear I but too truly anticipate, — I shall deem it my duty, without paying the slightest regard to the feelings which I entertain for my party, to do all in my power to oppose a Government so acting; and I shall do so for this reason, — because I can only augur from such a course a repetition of all the disgrace which we incurred in vainly endeavouring to prevent the United States from acquiring their independence. Still, I cannot but believe that her Majesty's Government, having before them the history of the American war, and seeing that similar consequences are likely to result from engaging in a similar contest with Canada, will pause before they determine upon adopting such a line of policy. I think the Government must feel that such a course of policy is wrong; if, however, they have not this feeling, then I wish they would at once make up their minds to resign the offices which they hold rather than engage in a war that must prove disastrous, let it terminate in what way it may. If you triumph, you triumph. You will "make a solitude, and call it peace." If you continue to hold the colony, you can only hope to do so at a monstrous expenditure; and besides, however great that expenditure may be, it will eventually be ineffectual: the affections of the colonists will be estranged from the mother country, and separation must come at an early period. If, on the other hand, as has been recommended by some Honourable Members on this side of the House, you agree to the terms of an amicable separation, you will derive from it all the advantages which I have described, and many more which I will not take up the time of the House by enumerating; and, so far from losing the advantages of the connection between the colony and the mother country, those advantages will be increased to a tenfold degree. But, independently of the question of separation (and a separation is not inevitable at the present moment), the Government have the alternative of granting all the changes in their constitution which the Canadians desire, whether organic or not. I am aware that the number of individuals in this House disposed to support my views in this matter is not large. If Parliaments were shorter, or if we were nearer a general election, the event might be very different; but, unfortunately, we are at the commencement of a new Parliament, and therefore I cannot venture to expect that many Honourable Gentlemen will be found disposed to favour my suggestions. But, whether the House or the Government do or do not pursue the course which I have ventured to recommend, I anticipate that the period will shortly arrive when the consequences of the breaking out of the war will become manifest, and when the opposition of Government to liberal principles shall be more distinctly marked, the great majority of the people will declare themselves in favour of the cause which now meets with so few supporters in this House. When the war shall have commenced, and the people begin to experience all the evil consequences, — when they find their comforts reduced, the burdens of taxation increased, their trade diminished, — when they see all internal improvement at an end, and education denied them, — then will their eyes be fully opened; they will raise their voice, and at once put a stop to that course of ruinous policy which the Government now seem inclined to follow.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG.—Sir, it is a melancholy and humiliating spectacle to see an Honourable Member of the British House of Commons rise in his place for the purpose of dwelling on and exaggerating (though certainly not intentionally) the disasters which threaten his country, pointing out the parts in which it was most vulnerable, and showing how a colonial population, in a state of revolt, might triumph over the law. Sir, I was sorry to hear the Honourable Member for Westminster suggest the mode of firing, which would have the most deadly effect upon her Majesty's troops. It reminded me of the advice given in the Irish song: —

> So put your trust in God, my boys,
> And keep your powder dry.

And, Sir, I was sorry, also, to hear an Honourable Member, holding such high rank and station in the country as does the Honourable Member for Leeds, express his hope that, if there should be a collision between the British troops and the revolted population of Lower Canada, the latter might be victorious. The whole of the Honourable Baronet's statement was pervaded by fallacies. This, however, is no matter for surprise, as it is too much the practice of that small knot of solemn politicians, at the head of whom (now that the late Member for Bath is no longer in this House) the Honourable Baronet has placed himself, to pretend to a monopoly of all the information respecting the condition of Canada. Now, I will say, that there are other Honourable Gentlemen in this House who are at least as well informed on this subject as are those Honourable Members to whom I have alluded; and whilst, by presenting exaggerated statements, they have endeavoured to throw the House into a state of despondency, I, proceeding on sound and solid information, will submit to the House a very different picture. The effect of the Honourable Baronet's address to the House would be, to stimulate the discontented in Canada to effort. The Honourable Baronet has said, that the desertion from her Majesty's troops is enormous. Now, I can tell the Honourable Baronet that, although the temptation held out is very great, there has been much less desertion since the existence of the present disturbances than there was before. The Honourable Baronet also spoke of Lower Canada as if all its people were averse to British rule and British connection. Now, that is far from being the fact. The population of Lower Canada is composed of one quarter belonging to the British party, and three quarters belonging to the French party. The British portion are all but universally in favour of the British Government, and the connection with the mother country; neither are the French party so generally averse to that connection and rule, as the Honourable Baronet affects to believe. In fact, they are a peaceable, quiet, orderly set of persons; and, in the main, are much attached to the mother country. The priests, too, who have great influence over them, entertain similar sentiments; and when the Honourable Baronet talks of the causes of "present disturbances," let him not look so far off as Canada itself. In estimating those causes, I cannot leave out of my consideration the inflammatory harangues made to the population of Lower Canada, not in their own country, but much nearer home, within the walls of this House, — a course of conduct which, I regret to observe, is not even now abandoned, although the standard of insurrection has been raised in the colony. As to the increased value of Canada to this country in the event of a separation, I think I am prepared to disprove the suppositions of the Honourable Member for Bridport. The advantages which this country at present enjoys from the connection with Canada may be stated to be three :— first, that it affords an outlet for our manufactures; secondly, that it employs British shipping; thirdly, that it affords facilities for emigration.

I will advert, more especially, to the second branch, with which I am the most acquainted. In the first place, however, I would remark, that I do not think the question should be placed on the narrow ground of how much benefit or how much loss would result from the separation of Canada from Great Britain. National justice and national honour are the considerations which it is more imperative to attend to. With respect to the advantages which British shipping would derive from the separation, the Honourable Baronet was perfectly in error when he said that British shipping had derived advantages from the separation from the United States. Does the Honourable Gentleman know that almost all the existing carrying trade between Great Britain and the United States is carried in American bottoms? There is no foundation, therefore, for the inference which the Honourable Baronet has attempted to draw, that the separation of Canada from the mother country would be beneficial to our shipping interest. I say that national justice and national honour are involved in this case. I was not a little astonished at the Honourable Member for Westminster's sarcastic allusion to the rich lands which have been granted by the British Government to the Land Company, as affording rich prizes to those engaged in the present contest. If the Legislature, granting these lands, have induced the proprietors to invest capital in cultivation, thereby conferring a benefit on the colony, are not these proprietors entitled to protection? Have the numerous persons who have emigrated to Canada no right to that protection from the mother country, upon the faith of which they were induced to settle there? Are we to give up the possession of political power in Canada into the hands of those who would exercise the most reckless tyranny over all who are friendly to British connection and British interests? The consent, therefore, of the Government of this country to adopt the course that has been recommended by some Honourable Gentlemen on the other side would, in my opinion, be not only unjust but disgraceful. For these reasons, I think the Honourable Member for Ashburton was fully justified in expressing his honest indignation at the language used by those who have advocated such a line of policy. As to the causes of the existing state of things in Lower Canada, they may form fitting matter for consideration at a future period. But when the house is in flames is not the time to suspend exertions for its extinction for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the conflagration. The Honourable Member for Bridport may indulge in his philosophical harangues; but he will not succeed in eradicating the general conviction of the advantages of our colonial possessions from the minds either of this House or of the public so easily as he, and the little band of pseudo politicians by which he is surrounded, seem to wish.

Allusion has been made to the first war with the United States of America, and an analogy has been attempted to be drawn betwixt the present condition of Canada and that of the United States previous to the breaking out of that war. If, however, the matter be fully and fairly examined, it will be found that no such analogy subsists. The Honourable Gentleman opposite is begging the whole question when he says that the people of England would not support the Government in an unjust war. I hope they will not. I hope no war will take place,—notwithstanding the sneer of the Honourable Member for Westminster, who has ventured to say that he supposes that some Honourable Gentlemen on the side of the House where I sit would support a war, because they might profit by it. I believe that there is no justifiable foundation whatever for the attempt which has been made to subvert the British power in Canada, and that the attempt has found no sympathy or support among the great mass of the Canadian people. I am satisfied that, if the contingency were to arise which has been suggested by the Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton), — if we, the Members of the House of Commons, were about to return to our constituents, it would be found that the great majority of the people of Great Britain would respond to the sentiments expressed by the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell), when he said that he conceived it to be the duty of the Government to do everything in its power to maintain the British authority in Canada. I voted, during the last Session, in favour of the resolutions which the Noble Lord proposed to the House. Many other Honourable Members, who have recently appeared on the hustings, did the same; and was any dissatisfaction expressed by our constituents on that ground? None whatever. Indeed, I believe that the people of Great Britain would rather reject candidates if they openly avowed their intentions, who, like the Honourable Member for Westminster, wish to lay the honour and justice of this country prostrate at the feet of a few unprincipled and selfish agitators, than they would those who are desirous of maintaining that honour inviolate, even though it should unhappily, for a time at least, be necessary to employ the strong hand of force to attain that end. It is well known that I have attached myself to no party in this House; I have always acted on the principle of "measures, and not men." If it can be proved that those who are intrusted with the powers of government in Canada have abused their trust, let them be called to account, and impeached and punished. But, in the mean time, until the disorders which have now unfortunately broken out are put down by a salutary use of the authority and executive powers of the law, I shall feel it my duty to give my support to the Government in the course they are pursuing. One word more. The Honourable Member for Westminster has alluded to one outrage said to have been committed by some belonging to that party of the Canadians who are attached to the British Government; but he did not say anything of the numerous outrages committed by the disaffected agitators, who, in some instances, have gone to magistrates, and, by threatening their lives, have compelled them to resign their commissions.

Mr. GROTE. — The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has followed the example of others who have spoken from the same side of the House, in condemning the tone of triumph and exultation which they say has been adopted by my two Honourable Friends behind me. If such a tone of argument is open to condemnation, I think none can be more open to that censure than the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, and the Honourable Baronet the Member for Plymouth; they have both indulged in a tone of triumph and exultation. They have stated, that the existing disturbances in Lower Canada, which all must lament, occupy a very small space — the space of a pin's point—in the centre of the colony, while every other state is in an exuberant state of loyalty aud peace. I do not intend to expose myself to the charge of using expressions of triumph and exultation; my only feeling is one of deep sadness and concern. If, indeed, there be in my bosom one lurking feeling of triumph, it rests solely upon the recollection that I was one of the very small minority who offered their most strenuous opposition to those fatal resolutions of the last Session which have produced all the present disasters in Canada. I would not have the responsibility of those resolutions upon my conscience, taking them in connection with all the consequences to which they are destined to give birth, for anything that could be offered me. There is no part of my public conduct to which I look back with such unqualified gratification, as to that in which I united with a few others, and carried my opposition to the utmost verge that the forms of the House would allow, hoping, if possible to prevent so great an injustice being inflicted upon a free people. When those fatal resolutions were under discussion, I took the liberty of saying, that with their passing would terminate our policy and connection with Canada, and that, thenceforth, the people would have nothing to look to but the means of supporting and defending themselves, or, to use their own words, "physical and material force must be the only topic for their consideration." Almost every prediction which those who opposed the resolutions ventured to hazard has since been verified, and more than verified, in the way of calamitous consequences. However disagreeable it may be to the Honourable Gentlemen opposite to entertain the idea of separation from Canada, I am quite sure that no person can weigh the subject, well, without seeing that that question must, before long, be brought under the mature consideration of every reflecting man in the kingdom. In the course of the discussions which took place upon the resolutions, I said that there were two things, either of which it was desirable (though certainly not equally desirable) to accomplish, — an amicable union, or an amicable separation. From the present posture of affairs, I very much fear that neither the one nor the other of these alternatives will soon be within our reach. Notwithstanding the urgency of the time, and the great changes of circumstances which have since taken place, I regret to find the same tone adopted by the Government and the Honourable Gentlemen who support the views of the Government, as that by which they seemed to be inspired when the resolutions were under their consideration. I regret to find the same confidence expressed by the Government, and by so many Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, that it wanted only the expression of a strong opinion from a large majority in the British Parliament, at once to put down all idea of resistance in the minds of the people of Canada. Last year, all the disturbances, all the disquiet of the province were attributed to a few agitators, who were talked of as insignificant, and unworthy of a serious regard; and, even now, the same language is held, although occurrence after occurence shows that such confidence is founded in the grossest delusion.

It has been asserted by some Honourable Gentlemen, in the course of the debate, that there is no analogy between the present state of Canada and that of the provinces of the United States in 1774. But I have not heard one single argument to prove to me that there is the least disparity whatever between the two cases. I contend, not only that the treatment of England towards Canada is analogous to that of the treatment of England towards the United States, but that the grievances of which the Canadians complain are also, in every respect, exactly analogous to the grievances of which the United States complained. The principal grievance arises, in fact, out of the right assumed by the British Government to take the people's money. That was the chief ground of the complaint of the United States in 1774; it is also the chief ground of the complaint of Canada at the present moment. By the resolutions of last year, the Canadian people were substantially deprived of all control over their own revenues and their own treasury. I listened with much surprise to the Honourable Member for Newark (Mr. Gladstone) when he said, in the course of his speech this evening, that it was not a mere speculative grievance, or grievance of principle, but a series of protracted oppressions, which led the United States of America to shake off the yoke of Great Britain. Now, that statement was entirely inaccurate. It is necessary only to read the speech of Mr. Burke upon the subject, to be convinced that the resistance of the Americans arose entirely out of the assumed right of the British Parliament to tax them without consulting their own Legislature. In point of fact, the British Parliament did not take any money — did not exercise the right it claimed in that respect; — it was the mere claim of the right which caused the bloody and protracted war in which the Americans engaged, and in which they would rather have died than submit to what they conceived to be the injustice and tyranny of the mother country. I believe that no great practical grievance has been entailed upon Canada, any more than upon the United States; but the British Legislature unfortunately assumes over the former, as it did over the latter, a right of control, which, however the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud (Lord J. Russell) may regard it, I am sure would have been considered by the Lord Russell of former days, and by Algernon Sydney, as equal to a sentence of slavery! Although I admit that, under present circumstances, the question of union or separation between the mother country and the colony is accompanied with difficulties peculiar to the time, yet I maintain, that the British Legislature must not fear or even delay to face the evils of which it has itself been the cause. After matters have come to such a pass as that in which they now are in Canada, how can the British Legislature hope to govern the colony except by superiority of force? How can it ever hope that its occupation of the country will be other than one of continual disturbance, revolting to the feelings of those who have to maintain it, and absolutely intolerable to those who have to submit to it? Surely, the material advantages, in point of wealth and commerce, must be great indeed, if worth purchasing at the cost of eternal coercion and an unceasing struggle to put down the feelings of the great mass of the Canadian people.

Whether the state of affairs in Canada be as serious as has been represented or not, it is, at all events, certain that a series of disturbances has taken place; and that the tendency of things is such as to render the continuance of pacific government scarcely to be expected under any circumstances; even if the House were disposed, which I do not think it is, to adopt a conciliatory course, it is much to be feared that it would now fail of producing that happy effect which, if adopted at an earlier period, it would undoubtedly have secured. Although sufficient information has not yet been received to enable us to estimate the extent to which the flame of rebellion has spread, we have, still, sufficient knowledge upon the subject to convince us that all the care and attention of the Government will be required to meet the difficulty in which the country and the colony are involved. I should be pleased, indeed, to find that the rebellion had not reached the height which many Gentlemen seemed to anticipate, because it might give time to the Government to retrace, and perhaps retrieve, its policy. I say, I shall rejoice if it shall appear, by further information, that the accounts we have received from Canada are exaggerated as to the extent of the existing evils; and, if so, I would implore the House to let what has passed serve as a warning for the future, and instead of indulging, at all times, when the rights and interests of the colony are discussed, in a tone of triumph at the superior power of England, to allow a little space for conciliation and justice, and to deal with the Canadians as they would with men who, though freemen like themselves, are still desirous of remaining, if they can do so with honour, in connection with England as their mother country.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — Having heard the speech of the Honourable Member for Bridport, and looking at the appearance of the House, with its half-empty benches, one would suppose that we were discussing some Bill for the regulation of weights and measures, or something of a most uninteresting character, rather than a rebellion in a colony which is one of the brightest jewels in the British Crown. This indifference is most striking, and, to me, most unaccountable, considering the magnitude and importance of the question. If the statements which have been received respecting Canada are correct, the Government ought not to delay the consideration of the subject a single moment; and, instead of adjourning for a fortnight, they ought, before the next twenty-four hours have elapsed, to attempt to bring it to something like a satisfactory settlement. A great colony is said to be in a state of open rebellion; therefore the Government have great and urgent duties to perform, and they ought not to suffer the House to separate for so long a period as three weeks, when matters so urgent are pressing upon us for consideration; and I do hope, as the question of adjournment has not yet been formally put, that the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) will pause before he proposes so long a recess. I do not know whether it was my misfortune or my good fortune not to have heard all the speeches which have been made in the course of this debate, but I did hear the Honourable Member for Westminster call on Honourable Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House to answer a sneer which he thought proper to address to them, as if they coveted an unjust war for the sake of crushing a free people. There is nothing in the conduct of the Honourable Gentlemen with whom I act to justify the Honourable Member in saying that they underrate the horrors of war under any circumstances, or that they would advocate a cause which was unjust, either in public or private, in war or in peace. I am perfectly certain, that it would require eloquence and arguments far different to those of the Honourable Member to convince the people of England that we are what he is pleased to describe us to be. The Honourable Member for Bridport, at a time when it is said that the cannons are roaring on the other side of the Atlantic, talks of an amicable settlement. Is this the time for an amicable settlement? Is it not, rather, a time for giving protection to those who are attached to the British Government? Not that I undervalue an amicable settlement, or think it utterly impossible; for I trust that Canada will be reduced to that subjection which is desirable and necessary before anything in the way of a settlement can be satisfactorily effected. It is in Canada as in Ireland; in the one country a certain set of men call themselves Canadians, and in the other a certain party call themselves Irishmen. Those men to whom I allude talk as if none but those of their own — I will not say faction, but — party—were entitled to the rights and feelings of Irishmen. So it is with the party in Canada. Only those who belong to a faction are regarded as having any rights at all. At the least, there is one fourth of British blood in Canada, and of the other three fourths a very large portion of the people are in favour of the British Government.

The Honourable Member for Bridport has made a kind of philosophical speech, which was calm enough in its tone, but into which he introduced doctrines the very reverse of calm, and which, I must say, appeared to me very inconsistent with other passages of his own speech. For instance: in one part he talked of the justice of the cause of the colonists, and in another, of the popular will being the only good; and he contended that, because a majority held certain opinions, and claimed certain rights, they ought to be conceded. The question is not, with the Honourable Gentlemen, whether they are well founded, but simply whether the majority adhere to them. Now, I deny any abstract rights in any man, or any body of men. I contend that the Canadian people have certain rights emanating from a specific constitution, awarded to them by the competent power. To those rights, in their fullest extent, they may justly lay claim; but any attempt to demand beyond those rights, is to be considered as rebellion, and ought not to gain that sympathy from Honourable Members opposite, which, I need hardly say how far, has provoked the present state of things. But of this I am certain, that the best chance of bringing back the colonists to subordination, is a manifestation in this House to support, I will not say the rights and honour of the Crown merely, but the loyalty of the better part of the population, and their peace and independence, which are threatened as much by the success of the present rebellious party as they would be if conquered by a foreign power. Does anybody suppose that, if that party should succeed in revolutionising that country, it can remain independent? Would not America absolve it for the purpose of gaining it? Or would they not be compelled to turn to America? I hope her Majesty's Ministers will not delay the consideration of this important question; but that, as early as possible, they will call the whole of the Members of this House together to investigate so important a subject, and that the Noble Lord will reconsider the announcement he has made.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I must also join in deprecating the tone and manner in which this discussion has been carried on; and I must especially express my dissent from the observations of the Honourable Gentlemen the Members for Leeds and for Westminster, relative to the probability that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would be found making common cause with Canada; and to the desertion which is likely to take place from the ranks of the British army, in case of open hostilities. Sir, I believe that no greater misfortune could happen to the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, than a separation from the mother country. Those colonies are in precisely the same situation now, as was the province of Canada during the late war with the United States. The Canadas might then have easily joined those States; but the advantage of British connection was appreciated, and they refused to do so: and the same reason which restrained the Canadians then, would actuate the inhabitants of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the present day. And, with respect to desertions, I believe that, previous to the breaking out of the present disturbances, some few instances of desertion did take place, owing to the great advantages which were offered to our soldiers in the United States; but I know well that, now their assistance is actually needed, the fallacies of such promises will be seen through, and the British soldier will not be induced to desert his colours. Whatever may be the ultimate decision of the House upon this discussion, I hope that the Noble Lord at the head of the Home Department will not take the advice of the Honourable Baronet, the Member for the University of Oxford, with reference to the length of the adjournment of the House, for I believe that a shorter adjournment than to the 1st of February will be most distasteful to many Honourable Members who are now absent. I therefore hope, rather, that the Noble Lord will withdraw from the intention he has expressed, and thus give the House an opportunity of showing its confidence in the Government.

MR. MACLEAN. — Though, perhaps, it may be distasteful to many Honourable Members on both sides of the House that it should meet earlier than the 1st of February, as originally proposed, still, from the deep importance of this subject, — a subject not very appropriately, I think, offered to the consideration of the House at this moment,—I am prepared to accede to the views of the Honourable Baronet, the Member for the University of Oxford, as conveyed in the suggestion he has made. I am of opinion that Parliament should, without any loss of time, take into its careful and most serious consideration the present condition of Lower Canada, the rebellious position of which renders it necessary to have the opinion of the Legislature of this country; and the earlier the Parliament proceeds to the discharge of this important and imperative duty, the better it will be both for the character of the mother country and the best interests of the colony. I cannot avoid alluding to some of the points of the speech which has been delivered by the Honourable Member for Bridport, — a speech remarkable for the singular discrepancies between the doctrine preached by the Honourable Member, and the conduct hitherto pursued in the House with regard to Canada. The doctrine of the Honourable Member for Bridport is, that it signifies nothing what has been the language, what the course of conduct,—no matter how rebellious or treasonable soever,—nay, it matters not to the Honourable Member if the subjects of the Queen are in a state of overt treason, of open rebellion; the Honourable Member says, that the first thing to be done is to attend to their complaints. Now, I beg to ask whether Canada is a colony of this country, or is she an independent nation? Why, if the Honourable Member for Bridport push his argument but a few steps further, every colony might take precisely the same ground as Canada; and, when the British Legislature, or the Crown under which such colony was by conquest placed, declared that that colony was wrong in the course it was pursuing, might say, that the course it had so taken was right, in virtue of its being supported by the majority of the people of that particular colony. Nay, the same doctrine might be brought even nearer home. Might it not equally be applied to another portion of her Majesty's dominions, separated from Great Britain only by the sea, as, indeed, is Canada; and then would the Honourable Member for Bridport declare that, however treasonable the language used, however rebellious the feeling manifested, still these were to be justified by the fact of their accordance with the views of the majority of the people? It is admitted that the Canadas are, both of them, colonies of this country, and have established in them two independent legislatures; but, at the same time, those legislatures invariably confer with the mother country upon any course that is thought important to be pursued with reference to the government or interests of those colonies. The resolutions at present before me show that it was the intention of Canada, acting on the principle of her constitution, to submit her grievances to the consideration of Parliament here; and, if so, surely Canada was bound by the course the British Parliament might think fit to adopt.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Oh, oh!

Mr. MACLEAN. — The Honourable Gentleman may cry "Oh!" but I would be glad if the Honourable Gentleman, whoever he may be, will tell me what becomes of the doctrine that the majority should always take the lead, when, on the colony, submitting—as it did—its interests to the consideration of the Legislature of Great Britain, and on a majority of that Legislature refusing its sanction to the measures proposed by the colonists; the latter refuse to adopt such decision,—what becomes of the argument, that we must act in conformity with the views of that majority? Why, the Canadians have themselves negatived that doctrine. They represented either real or supposed grievances to the Legislature of this country; those real or supposed grievances received the solemn deliberation of the House of Commons; and is it to be said that when Parliament, by a large and overwhelming majority, passed the resolutions now before me, and sent them out to the Canadian Legislature, those resolutions, so adopted, were to be met with an address which, according even to the Honourable Member for Leeds, was couched in a most insulting tone towards the mother country? Why, if one course was more adapted than another to blow the flame of civil war in the Canadas, it was the course taken on the occasion to which I refer, by the House of Assembly, with their Speaker at their head. And when the Earl of Gosford thought it his duty to make a proclamation in the name of her Majesty, is this House to be told by Honourable Members who are here the advocates of that course of proceeding, which may or may not be treasonable, that it was justifiable in some of the magistracy to be part and parcel of a meeting who tore down the Queen's proclamation, and treated it with insult? That meeting was held for the purpose of setting at defiance her Majesty's authority, and when those gentlemen were most properly dismissed from the commission of the peace for thus contemning the royal authority, did not the people appoint justices of their own, and, under a solemn agreement, bind themselves to pay no obedience to the law or the courts of the country? Is the House, then, under such circumstances, to be told that when the Governor General saw these events passing before his eyes, — that when his authority was set at defiance, his whole jurisdiction abolished, — he was to be blamed for taking those steps which were necessary to discharge his duty to his country, and prove his loyalty to his sovereign? Is it just to designate him as the man who has blown the flame of civil war, and driven the Canadian people against the Government of the mother country? I should like Honourable Gentlemen opposite to say what course they would have recommended Lord Gosford, under such circumstances, to adopt. I should be glad to hear from them what they, in their wisdom, would have done, if placed in the same position as that in which the Noble Earl stood? I will say, that if the Noble Earl, instead of pursuing the course he has done, had truckled to the parties engaged in these rebellious acts, he would have ceded the Queen's rights; and, in my opinion, would have been a traitor to his country and his Queen, and would have been justly taunted, when he returned home, with arrant cowardice, for failing to discharge the high and important functions with which his Sovereign had invested him.

I do not stand up either to vindicate or to discuss the nature of Lord Gosford's mission; but I will say, looking at all the facts before the House, that it appears to me somewhat curious to charge the Noble Earl with an abandonment of duty, when he has actually been forced into the severe exercise of the powers with which he was invested, by the unfair promulgation of doctrines which militated against the authority of the Crown. The Canadians have been told, by some Honourable Gentlemen in communication with them, that the time was coming when the baleful domination of this country over the colonies would cease. Now, nothing can be more calculated to excite the colonists, and to lead them to suppose that the people of England were favourable to the views of M. Papineau's party, than the language used in the correspondence and communications to which I allude. When it was understood that her Majesty's Government intended to call Parliament together for the purpose of discussing this subject, I had hoped that the angry topics which have been launched tonight, and urged upon the attention of the country, would have been avoided. I regret that some Honourable Members opposite should have thought it right to declare their wish, that whatever course this question might take, if it came to blows, and her Majesty's troops were brought into collision with those parties engaged in the rebellion, — her Majesty's arms might be defeated. I cannot but enter my protest against such language being uttered, especially by Honourable Members of the station and rank of those to whom I advert; and I trust that the wishes of the majority of the House will be, however painful it is to contemplate a collision of the nature all must deprecate (namely, between those who defy the authority of the Crown, and those sent to support and relieve the difficulties of the Governor General), that if any such collision do take place, her Majesty's troops may be successful. I also extremely regret that, in this discussion, Honourable Gentlemen opposite should have dealt in expressions derogatory to individuals placed in authority in Canada. Of Colonel Arthur I know nothing; but with regard to the gallant officer now in the command of the troops serving in that colony, and armed with a most delicate and important commission, I will say that the language applied to that gallant officer by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny was not in the most remote degree warranted by anything that is known of him. I speak of him as the son of an old officer, when I state that Sir John Colborne is a man highly esteemed in the profession of which he is an ornament, and has discharged many most important services to the country. Sir John Colborne has been spoken of as a firebrand sent from one province to another, and as unlikely to extinguish civil war; but I am sure I speak the voice of the whole military profession, when I declare that Sir John Colborne does not deserve the imputations which have been cast upon him. I cannot but deprecate the unseasonableness of the present discussion, which I think is calculated to give a false colouring to the events which have happened, and a false direction to those which are about to follow.

SIR C. B. VERE. — I must say, that the aspersions which have been thrown out against Sir John Colborne by Honourable Gentlemen opposite were extremely improper, and ought not to have been indulged in. I can bear testimony to the great claims of Sir John Colborne to that respect and esteem which he has acquired among his brother officers. I believe that the character of no officer in the public service stands higher, nor is there one better qualified to have trust reposed in him. He is a friend whom I have not seen for years; but I may safely say, that every Minister with whom he has had communication, in the situation in which he has been placed, whether of the one political party or the other, has been perfectly satisfied with the manner in which that gallant officer has discharged his duty.

Mr. J. ELLIS. — I conceive that with a subject of so important and pressing a nature as that which is involved in the present discussion, it is incumbent upon the House to adjourn over for the shortest possible period. The Noble Lord admits that the reports from Canada, which have been published, are credible, and that he believes they cannot be questioned; yet the Noble Lord has proposed an adjournment of three weeks. Now, when I consider the nature of the sentiments which have been this night expressed, — when I consider that the present debate will be a long way on its road to Canada before the three weeks will have expired, and before any counteraction can be given to these sentiments, — and when the House remembers that Lower Canada is on the very verge of insurrection, and that the flames of rebellion are ready to break forth there, — I trust that Honourable Members will press upon the Noble Lord the necessity of fixing an earlier day than the 16th of January for the re-assembling of Parliament. I must, at the same time, express my astonishment that the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Westminster, so soon after the news of a collision between the British troops and the insurgents had reached England, should come down to this House and deliver a speech, — I will not say tainted, but at any rate—completely pregnant, with gratulation, in which he did not even point out any means of effecting an amicable separation, but suggested the manner in which the colony might resist the connection with, and shake off the authority of, the mother country. I did not expect to hear the Honourable Member say that the measures of the Government would fail in putting down the disturbances which exist in Lower Canada, and that the measures taken by the Canadians for resisting the authority of this country were well taken and would be successful — I did not expect that the Honourable Member would have improved upon the policy which the Canadians are pursuing in recommending that all commercial intercourse between the two countries should cease. I must equally deprecate the language used by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. I do hope that the debate will be resumed at an early period, and that the language which may then be held will be more in accordance with that of the Noble Lord's (J. Russell), in his opening speech, than, I am sorry to say, much of that which I have heard uttered this evening.

Mr. HINDLEY. — Sir, if there be any one part of my public conduct, any one vote that I have ever given in this House, with which I am better satisfied than another, it is the vote I gave last Session, on the Noble Lord's resolutions regarding Canada. I confess I cannot concur in the propriety of the shortness of the adjournment; for I am convinced that it will prove to be a most serious practical inconvenience to call back those Honourable Members who have been long in town, assiduously engaged in the discharge of parliamentary duties, earlier than the 1st of February. With respect to the question now under discussion, I would say, that all I wish or desire is, that Government should take conciliatory steps towards the adjustment of Canadian differences. I deprecate, exceedingly, the tone and temper of the clever and vehement speech of my Honourable Friend, the Member for Westminster (Mr. Leader); but I hope that the expressions of which I complain will not influence the feelings of the Canadian people, nor prevent her Majesty's Ministers from pursuing that conciliatory course which may long preserve Canada as a colony of the British Crown. But should the chance be even probable that Canada will become a separate state, still, I say, let us treat her whilst she is ours with the same kindness, the same good feeling, the same justice, and the same generosity with which all our other possessions and colonies are treated by the parent state. I, for one, in such a case, should be extremely glad that we were thus enabled to get rid of an expensive colony, on the ground of advantage both to it and to the mother country. But, in this alternative of parting with it, let us, at least, part on the best of terms, and make the necessary arrangements for rendering Canada a prosperous and independent state.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — I should not have trespassed on the patience of the House at all, on the present occasion, had it not been for the speech which we have just heard from the Honourable Member for Ashton (Mr. Hindley). That speech presented a very extraordinary contrast, indeed, with some which preceded it. I must concur with the Honourable Gentleman who last addressed the House in deprecating the language resorted to, especially by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume) and the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds (Sir W. Molesworth); the one of whom, in place of measures of conciliation, actually invoked the thunders of the rebels' cannon, whilst the other has recorded wishes which actually amount to curses upon the cause for which the standard of his country is unfurled in the Canadian territory. The Honourable Member for Westminster (Mr. Leader) has expressed his cordial approbation of proceedings which amount to all but absolute rebellion. I should be sorry to put faith in all the shadowy rumours which have reached this country, of late, from Canada, touching the state of feelings and opinions which exists throughout that vast country, but especially upon its frontiers. This, however, I must say, — that expression, has been given, to-night, to principles of the most dangerous description that could agitate men's minds, either in Canada or in the mother country itself. For what was the language of the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds, but that of hearty and powerful encouragement to the monstrous insurrection of the British Canadian colonists? I have heard, in this British House of Commons, epithets of approbation and sympathy lavished on a struggle in which revolted colonists are arrayed with artillery, and all the appliances of war, against the troops of our gracious Sovereign. But the Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton) actually insists, that it is no question for us, here, to determine whether the asserted grievances of the Canadians be real or fictitious; he maintains that the only question is, whether they be matters which have been construed into grievances by the people of Canada; the meaning of which is, that it is not for this House to entertain questions of asserted grievances on the part of the people of Canada, or to devise such measures as may be necessary for their redress, or to adopt a system of policy that shall be acceptable to the wants, the wishes, or the feelings of the Canadians; but that it is for a particular party in the province of Lower Canada to assume to itself the cognisance of all these matters, and to give direction and excitement to the passions of the community in accordance with their own views on these subjects. Sir, I have never given my sanction to any principles of this kind. Neither do I think that the people of this country at large will ever give their sanction to the doctrines which the Honourable Member for Westminster has laid down, in favour of a course of headlong revolution. I do hope, nay, I trust, that her Majesty's Ministers, will treat with scorn and contempt any proposition for unworthy compromises, involving those great principles with which the loyalty of the people of this empire is intimately bound up. No, Sir; I am sure that the country will rather support the dignity of the Crown, and maintain its present connection with the colonies. When the Canadian insurgents shall have laid down their arms, — when they shall have returned to peaceful allegiance, — then, and not till then, can they pretend to talk of the redress of grievances; then, and not till then, can we pay any regard to the suggestion of what is called the peaceful separation of the colony from the mother country.

But the Honourable Member for Bridport has further said, that he wonders that the Whigs should be those who adopt this course, on the present occasion, of vindicating the authority of the Crown of Great Britain over a revolted colony, "because," he says, "they are the successors of those who took so different a part upon the great question of that colonial separation which terminated in the American war;" and he has quoted the authority of Mr. Burke to justify the policy so adopted by their predecessors. Now there is nothing wonderful in that; but I, for one believe, that if Mr. Burke were now alive, and sitting on those benches opposite, he would take the same steps which, we have reason to hope, the Noble Lord (J. Russell) will take upon the present occasion, in vindicating the authority of the Crown and of Parliament, and restoring tranquillity to this unhappy province. I must add, that I do not participate in one view of that Honourable Gentleman, namely, that which he has on this matter taken, in common with others who for the last three or four years have expressed their warm solicitude for the success of British soldiers, and the honour of the British flag, engaged elsewhere, and yet do not hesitate to say, on the present occasion, that they will be pleased to hear that the arms of the young Victoria, the Queen of Great Britain, have been defeated, in one of her own colonies.

Yes, Sir, there is, indeed, an amazing contrast, sufficient to awaken that cheer, between the language which was held by these very individuals in another case; namely, that of the employment of the British troops in Spain, on an occasion, when they were forced to fall back before a foreign force, and when Gentlemen opposite were loud in their expressions of eager anxiety for the success of the British standard; and their language now, when the conflict is not for the triumph of a faction in a foreign and independent state, but for the preservation of a colony to the imperial Crown of Great Britain. It is of this latter struggle they have presumed to say, that it will gratify them to learn that her Majesty's arms have been defeated, and that a portion of her Majesty's subjects have accomplished a successful rebellion to her power! I will not now enter into any discussion, however, upon that question. It is sufficient to observe, that, with regard to Spain, they declared their fervent hope to be, that, however unjust might be the cause in which British arms were employed, those arms might never experience defeat;—and yet that now, when the cause in which British arms are engaged is a just and righteous one, and when the scene of conflict lies in one of our own colonies, their aspirations are for the triumph of the rebellious party. Any observations which I might desire to offer upon the merits of the great question which is involved in that immediately before us, I postpone, because I agree that the better opportunity for submitting them will be when the Noble Lord shall again call Parliament together.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I think that the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir Robert Inglis) can hardly have been in his place when I originally made my statement to the House. For the information of the Honourable Baronet, and of others who may not have been present, I will recal to the recollection of the House what I did originally state, and the actual circumstances of the case. We were about to move the adjournment of the House from to-morrow to the 1st of February, and no complaint was made against such a course. The House was quite ready to leave to the Government the responsibility and the arrangements as to the administration of the affairs of Canada, as well as of the other parts of the empire. I did, under these circumstances, without any suggestion, come forward with the proposition that the House should adjourn to the 16th of January instead of the 1st of February,—not on the ground that it was necessary to take any measures adapted for any immediate emergency, or that the Government thought that Parliament need take any steps to promote the honour of the Crown and the maintenance of the colony; but what I did state was, that I thought, from the uncertain intelligence which was arriving, week by week, and on account of some important information which we had already received, it was not parliamentary, nor was it according to the constitution of the country, that Parliament should separate, for so long a period as five weeks, without some expression of concurrence, on the part of the House, in the course of policy which the Government had thought it its duty to pursue. On this ground alone it was that I stated my intention of moving a shorter adjournment; and I think, if I had made it still shorter,—if I had moved only for an adjournment of one week, without immediate and sufficient necessity, I should have run the risk of not obtaining so full an attendance of Members as was requisite to ascertain the fair opinion of the House with respect to the policy which has been pursued in Canada. I should have had little to add to these few observations, had it not been for the spirit that has sprung up in the course of the debate; but I think it is necessary that I should express my opinion on the tone and manner that have been exhibited in some of the speeches which have been delivered this night. I trust my Honourable Friends will be satisfied with this explanation, and see that we should be neglectful of our duty as Ministers of the Crown, did we not animadvert on such language as I have heard, with astonishment, in some of the speeches to which I allude. I do not find fault with the philosophic view which the Honourable Member for Bridport has taken of the subject, when he says that, if you have a distant colony in which complaints exist, it is no matter or consequence whatever whether or not the complaints of your colonists,—the Canadians, for example,—are unfounded and unjust; whether the notions of their rights entertained by those colonists be well founded or not,—no matter from what part of the colony those complaints proceed; but, in any such case, you ought to effect a separation between the colony and the parent state on amicable terms. I know not, as has already been said by another Honourable Member, if I were willing to discuss that philosophical argument, whither it would lead me. I know not to what parts of this empire such a doctrine, if allowed to prevail, might not, at some period of our history, have applied. I know not whether, if my Honourable Friend had lived at the time of the accession of the House of Hanover to the throne of these realms, he would have said, Scotland being at that time unfriendly to the Hanoverian succession, that, as the people of Scotland wished to have a Sovereign of another race, their desire ought to be gratified, and that the union between the two countries ought to be immediately repealed.

I do think that, if we were to discuss this question as a mere abstract proposition, it would be found to stand, indeed, as to the feeling of Scotland, with regard to the succession of the House of Hanover, on very plausible data; but could it have been gravely said that Scotland would be justified on such a ground in calling for a separation or dissolution of the union with this country? If such a doctrine were to avail, it would be totally irreconcileable with the dominion of a great empire,—inconsistent, and utterly at variance with our position among the nations of the world,—and, as I believe, in the end, totally destructive of all social order and happiness.

But, supposing we were to give way to this theoretical and extreme proposition of my Honourable Friend, does he really believe that, after the statements which we have heard to-night in this House, we should get rid of, as he says we should do, the bad feelings which would be engendered by civil war, and the disaffection and discontent which at present, to a certain extent, unhappily prevail in Canada? Does my Honourable Friend believe, after the speeches which he has heard this night, — does he really believe that those bad feelings will be got rid of by the adoption of such a course? Has he not heard enough to demonstrate to him, that if her Majesty's Ministers should be ill-advised enough to pursue such a line of policy, a large portion of her Majesty's subjects in Lower Canada would be doomed to wade through the horrors of instant proscriptions, that they would be subjected to the loss of their property, and would be in danger of their lives. And shall it then be said, that Government should abandon them at once to the mercy of their enemies? Shall it be said, that we must abandon them all to the tender mercies of a new republic, in what was, heretofore, British America?

Has the House not heard—not, indeed, from a Canadian—not from one of French descent; and therefore less likely to sympathise with natives of this country, but from a Member of this House — a degree of satisfaction expressed at the desertion of British troops, and a hope avowed that they will fail in their allegiance to those colours to which I hope they will always be attached? Have not we seen, on the part of a Member of this House, a sort of gloating over the confiscation of public and private property in Canada, at the violation of compacts entered into, and solemnly recognised by Acts of the British Parliament,—property the settlement of which was sanctioned by that Parliament, and secured to British settlers with all the formalities of the law, acquired, as it was, by the outlay of their own means, in the purchase of these lands in the distant territory of the Canadas? Have we not witnessed a sort of delight expressed at the prospect of these lands being confiscated, and those persons driven penniless from their homes, — and this by a member of a British House of Commons? If I were to comply with the pacific proposition of my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport, does my Honourable Friend expect that tranquillity would be restored in Lower Canada, and that protection could be afforded by the Government to all classes of her Majesty's subjects in that country? I must remind him that Government would not be acting a part which becomes the Ministers of the British Crown if we were thus to sacrifice the interests of British settlers and subjects by withdrawing our protection from their lives and their property; and my Honourable Friend must know, that those who are foremost in this struggle against the lawful authority of the Crown have always been actuated by the most deadly animosity against British subjects living in the same country as themselves. I do not believe, from the information which has reached me, that the parties engaged in upholding the cause of rebellion are so much influenced by an abstract love for particular form of constitution, as by those violent feelings which have grown out of and survived former feuds, and which they think they shall be more likely to gratify during the confusion of civil broils, than while the country remains under the ordinary and legitimate form of government. But, then, we are told, as we often have been told, that the course which the Government has pursued is precisely that which this country has followed with respect to America. The Honourable Member for London (Mr. Grote) has said that the cases are exactly alike, and has maintained that there is not, as the Honourable Member for Newark, who spoke with so much ability to-night, has contended, a great similarity between them. I must say, that I agree with the Honourable Member for Newark in thinking that these contests are dissimilar in their origin, as, too, I trust they will be in their result.

With respect to America, the first Act of the British Parliament was passed, not in consequence of the refusal of the American Legislature to pay their contribution towards the expenses of their own internal government, for they had made large contributions for that purpose, but it was an Act granting and applying certain stamp-duties, to be raised in the British colonies in North America, towards defraying the expenses of protecting the same. It was argued by Lord Chatham and by others who took the part of the Americans in Parliament, that we had no right to tax those American settlements for that purpose without their own consent. I will not go through the respective aspects of these contests, but it is sufficient to say, that while Lord Chatham complained of this conduct on the part of the mother country as an aggressive act, he at the same time declared that this country had supreme legislative power over her colonies in North America. But has this been the course of things in our Canadian affairs? In the year 1791 a constitution was given to Lower Canada, and settled by Act of Parliament. There was a governor, an executive council, a legislative council, the members of which were appointed for life, and an assembly elected by the people. So little was this country inclined to interfere with the privileges of that assembly, that when the latter complained that by our contributing towards the support of the local Government we diminished the control which the House of Assembly had a right to exercise over that Government, we discontinued our contributions, and gave them the whole power over the finances of their Government. In the course, however, of events in the history of Canada, the connection between the two Houses of their domestic Legislature became disturbed, and complaints arose on the part of the Canadian Assembly that many persons were elected as members of the Legislative Council who were known to be hostile to the Assembly, and that, therefore, they would not act in harmony with the other House, and so did not agree to many useful Bills. Now, with regard to that complaint, the British Government have never said that the Legislative Council shall have the power of stopping the course of useful legislation in Canada. On the contrary, the constitution of that body has been so much improved, that the Government have had reason to expect that the two Houses might act together in concert. This country never pretended to tax the Canadas for British objects, nor were the funds raised in the province applied for other than Canadian purposes. But what the Assembly insist on is, that the Legislative Council should be made elective. That is one of their demands; but they also make another of a most questionable character, which is, that the members of the Executive Council shall be placed on the same footing as the members of the Administration in this country; and that they shall be removable when they no longer possess the confidence of the Assembly. These two demands form, together, a demand of absolute independence. Such a demand I, at least, understand it to be. It is not a demand for the removal of a grievance, but it is a demand to have a constitution which must be to all intents and purposes an independent constitution, because it is impossible that the Ministers of the Government in Canada should be removable at the pleasure of the Assembly, and yet be able to act at the same time upon orders which they receive from the Queen's Government at home. When, therefore, this extreme demand of theirs to become an independent state was refused, they, on their part, refused the supplies to the Government of the Crown, and stopped the whole machine of that Government. What this country then proposed was, to take means to set the machine in motion again. In this there was no act of oppression upon our part; it was not a measure of finance, but a measure of defence. It was a defensive position which we took up, in order that the provincial Administration, with its machinery, might not be entirely stopped, but be carried on by some means or other. But that the Government had conceded these demands I am by no means prepared to say, for I do not know that even by those means we should have secured tranquillity. Suppose the Legislative Council to have been elective, and a Bill to have been introduced into the Legislative Assembly for preventing British troops from entering Quebec or Montreal, and such Bill to have been agreed to by a council so constituted. What remedy would remain in that case? The Governor, indeed, might have rejected it, but then he would have been obliged to dismiss his Ministers, and then the Assembly would have refused the supplies. The difference, therefore, between the two countries would still have existed, with this distinction,—that in the case supposed, it would have rested on the question of the exclusion of British troops from Quebec and Montreal, instead of arising out of our refusal to make the Legislative Council elective, and the Executive Council of the local Government like our own Cabinet. The House of Assembly and the Council would have refused the supplies in that case, as they actually have done, and thus the machinery of government must necessarily have been stopped until the demands of the Assembly had been complied with. I will maintain, therefore, that there are no features of resemblance between the former contest with North America, which has been insisted on so much, and the present contest with Canada, except that the former was carried on against certain of our colonies in North America, and this is also a contest with an American colony belonging to Great Britain. I do not like to deal in confident predictions. I did not predict that the question would be settled by the resolutions passed by Parliament in the early part of the year. I certainly said, that I did hope that the opinion of this House would have a great moral weight with the people of Lower Canada. I must, however, say, with regard to this contest, that although I will not make any confident predictions, I have no serious apprehensions of the result. At the same time I am bound to say, that I do not look forward — I think that no man ought to look forward — to the maintenance of British authority and British dominion contrary to the express wishes of the Canadian people. Still, however, I do not think that the people of Canada are at heart indisposed to the British Crown. My belief is, that the resistance which has been made in this case has been artificially promoted. My belief is, that if by fair means that resistance can be put an end to, then there is no reason why the affairs of Canada should not be conducted in accordance with the interests of the Canadian people; and I see no reason why, that people being lightly taxed, and suffering no grievance in the administration of the law, they should not remain, after this agitation shall have subsided, under British dominion and subject to the Crown of Great Britain. I do not, therefore, look to any early separation between this country and Canada, notwithstanding all that has passed during the last three years. I know not how far the principle of separation laid down by my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport might be pushed if temporary difficulties of a similar nature to those which are distracting Canada were to arise in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and our other North American colonies. If those colonies should ever be desirous of erecting themselves into sovereign states, I am not sure that hostile powers, who might aim at clipping our strength and impairing our dominion, would be deterred from aggression by a submissive attitude. Allusion has been made to the possible interference of hostile powers in this contest, and it has even been suggested that the demands made are likely to lead to such an interference. For my part, I cannot say that that argument makes any impression on me. It is not very possible to say whether this contest may not assume a shape at present unforeseen by me, and whether foreign powers may not engage in it. But of this I am sure, that if we take a timid and pusillanimous tone — if you are content to sacrifice those who naturally and properly look up to you for protection — if you give up the interests of British subjects, who have always been steady and loyal to their allegiance, and withdraw our troops, so that they must be overpowered — if you follow so weak and cowardly a course, and take up so base an attitude, then, not only shall we invite the aggressions of foreign powers, but we shall give them all occasion to say, "Here is this great British nation, which was once so mighty in war, so flourishing in times of peace, — she is forced to yield in a contest with her own subjects in one of her own colonies; only try her, and it is clear that she will yield to the first foe who shall demand strongly. — And here," they will add, "is this sun, which once shone with such brightness and beauty, now setting in darkness and in clouds."

We should, indeed, embark in a course hostile to the peace, degrading to the character, and fatal to the greatness and independence of the British nation, if we were to give way to the timid and the fatal counsels of the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds and the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, who look to submission on the one side and to impunity on the other — who look to means of unworthy compliance rather than to the achievement of victory as the result to be desired on the part of this great nation in this conflict. I must say, I have listened with the utmost surprise and pain, to-night, to the language which I have heard from those Honourable Gentlemen, and from one or two other Honourable Members. Were those suggestions to be acted on (of which, however, I am not one who entertain the slightest fear), the consequences would be far more fatal to this empire than any which can be anticipated, in any case, from entering with vigour and with firmness on a just quarrel. The discontent existing in Canada, ungrounded in facts, as I believe it is, may be overcharged, or it may not be so. But if you quench the spirit which has hitherto animated the energies of this country — if you choose to be accomplices in the work of your own downfal and its irretrievable degradation,—then I warn you that you will neither save Cacient information has not yet been received to enable us to estimate the extent to which the flame of rebellion has spread, we have, still, sufficient knowledge upon the subject to convince us that all the care and attention of the Government will be required to meet the difficulty in which the country and the colony are involved. I should be pleased, indeed, to find that the rebellion had not reached the height which many Gentlemen seemed to anticipate, because it might give time to the Government to retrace, and perhaps retrieve, its policy. I say, I shall rejoice if it shall appear, by further information, that the accounts we have received from Canada are exaggerated as to the extent of the existing evils; and, if so, I would implore the House to let what has passed serve as a warning for the future, and instead of indulging, at all times, when the rights and interests of the colony are discussed, in a tone of triumph at the superior power of England, to allow a little space for conciliation and justice, and to deal with the Canadians as they would with men who, though freemen like themselves, are still desirous of remaining, if they can do so with honour, in connection with England as their mother country.

SIR R. H. INGLIS.—Having heard the speech of the Honourable Member for Bridport, and looking at the appearance of the House, with its half-empty benches, one would suppose that we were discussing some Bill for the regulation of weights and measures, or something of a most uninteresting character, rather than a rebellion in a colony which is one of the brightest jewels in the British Crown. This indifference is most striking, and, to me, most unaccountable, considering the magnitude and importance of the question. If the statements which have been received respecting Canada are correct, the Government ought not to delay the consideration of the subject a single moment; and, instead of adjourning for a fortnight, they ought, before the next twenty-four hours have elapsed, to attempt to bring it to something like a satisfactory settlement. A great colony is said to be in a state of open rebellion; therefore the Government have great and urgent duties to perform, and they ought not to suffer the House to separate for so long a period as three weeks, when matters so urgent are pressing upon us for consideration; and I do hope, as the question of adjournment has not yet been formally put, that the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) will pause before he proposes so long a recess. I do not know whether it was my misfortune or my good fortune not to have heard all the speeches which have been made in the course of this debate, but I did hear the Honourable Member for Westminster call on Honourable Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House to answer a sneer which he thought proper to address to them, as if they coveted an unjust war for the sake of crushing a free people. There is nothing in the conduct of the Honourable Gentlemen with whom I act to justify the Honourable Member in saying that they underrate the horrors of war under any circumstances, or that they would advocate a cause which was unjust, either in public or private, in war or in peace. I am perfectly certain, that it would require eloquence and arguments far different to those of the Honourable Member to convince the people of England that we are what he is pleased to describe us to be. The Honourable Member for Bridport, at a time when it is said that the cannons are roaring on the other side of the Atlantic, talks of an amicable settlement. Is this the time for an amicable settlement? Is it not, rather, a time for giving protection to those who are attached to the British Government? Not that I undervalue an amicable settlement, or think it utterly impossible; for I trust that Canada will be reduced to that subjection which is desirable and necessary before anything in the way of a settlement can be satisfactorily effected. It is in Canada as in Ireland; in the one country a certain set of men call themselves Canadians, and in the other a certain party call themselves Irishmen. Those men to whom I allude talk as if none but those of their own—I will not say faction, but—party—were entitled to the rights and feelings of Irishmen. So it is with the party in Canada. Only those who belong to a faction are regarded as having any rights at all. At the least, there is one fourth of British blood in Canada, and of the other three fourths a very large portion of the people are in favour of the British Government.

The Honourable Member for Bridport has made a kind of philosophical speech, which was calm enough in its tone, but into which he introduced doctrines the very reverse of calm, and which, I must say, appeared to me very inconsistent with other passages of his own speech. For instance: in one part he talked of the justice of the cause of the colonists, and in another, of the popular will being the only good; and he contended that, because a majority held certain opinions, and claimed certain rights, they ought to be conceded. The question is not, with the Honourable Gentlemen, whether they are well founded, but simply whether the majority adhere to them. Now, I deny any abstract rights in any man, or any body of men. I contend that the Canadian people have certain rights emanating from a specific constitution, awarded to them by the competent power. To those rights, in their fullest extent, they may justly lay claim; but any attempt to demand beyond those rights, is to be considered as rebellion, and ought not to gain that sympathy from Honourable Members opposite, which, I need hardly say how far, has provoked the present state of things. But of this I am certain, that the best chance of bringing back the colonists to subordination, is a manifestation in this House to support, I will not say the rights and honour of the Crown merely, but the loyalty of the better part of the population, and their peace and independence, which are threatened as much by the success of the present rebellious party as they would be if conquered by a foreign power. Does anybody suppose that, if that party should succeed in revolutionising that country, it can remain independent? Would not America absolve it for the purpose of gaining it? Or would they not be compelled to turn to America? I hope her Majesty's Ministers will not delay the consideration of this important question; but that, as early as possible, they will call the whole of the Members of this House together to investigate so important a subject, and that the Noble Lord will reconsider the announcement he has made.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I must also join in deprecating the tone and manner in which this discussion has been carried on; and I must especially express my dissent from the observations of the Honourable Gentlemen the Members for Leeds and for Westminster, relative to the probability that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would be found making common cause with Canada; and to the desertion which is likely to take place from the ranks of the British army, in case of open hostilities. Sir, I believe that no greater misfortune could happen to the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, than a separation from the mother country. Those colonies are in precisely the same situation now, as was the province of Canada during the late war with the United States. The Canadas might then have easily joined those States; but the advantage of British connection was appreciated, and they refused to do so: and the same reason which restrained the Canadians then, would actuate the inhabitants of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the present day. And, with respect to desertions, I believe that, previous to the breaking out of the present disturbances, some few instances of desertion did take place, owing to the great advantages which were offered to our soldiers in the United States: but I know well that, now their assistance is actually needed, the fallacies of such promises will be seen through, and the British soldier will not be induced to desert his colours. Whatever may be the ultimate decision of the House upon this discussion, I hope that the Noble Lord at the head of the Home Department will not take the advice of the Honourable Baronet, the Member for the University of Oxford, with reference to the length of the adjournment of the House, for I believe that a shorter adjournment than to the 1st of February will be most distasteful to many Honourable Members who are now absent. I therefore hope, rather, that the Noble Lord will withdraw from the intention he has expressed, and thus give the House an opportunity of showing its confidence in the Government.

Mr. MACLEAN. — Though, perhaps, it may be distasteful to many Honourable Members on both sides of the House that it should meet earlier than the 1st of February, as originally proposed, still, from the deep importance of this subject, — a subject not very appropriately, I think, offered to the consideration of the House at this moment,—I am prepared to accede to the views of the Honourable Baronet, the Member for the University of Oxford, as conveyed in the suggestion he has made. I am of opinion that Parliament should, without any loss of time, take into its careful and most serious consideration the present condition of Lower Canada, the rebellious position of which renders it necessary to have the opinion of the Legislature of this country; and the earlier the Parliament proceeds to the discharge of this important and imperative duty, the better it will be both for the character of the mother country and the best interests of the colony. I cannot avoid alluding to some of the points of the speech which has been delivered by the Honourable Member for Bridport, — a speech remarkable for the singular discrepancies between the doctrine preached by the Honourable Member, and the conduct hitherto pursued in the House with regard to Canada. The doctrine of the Honourable Member for Bridport is, that it signifies nothing what has been the language, what the course of conduct,—no matter how rebellious or treasonable soever,—nay, it matters not to the Honourable Member if the subjects of the Queen are in a state of overt treason, of open rebellion; the Honourable Member says, that the first thing to be done is to attend to their complaints. Now, I beg to ask whether Canada is a colony of this country, or is she an independent nation? Why, if the Honourable Member for Bridport push his argument but a few steps further, every colony might take precisely the same ground as Canada; and, when the British Legislature, or the Crown under which such colony was by conquest placed, declared that that colony was wrong in the course it was pursuing, might say, that the course it had so taken was right, in virtue of its being supported by the majority of the people of that particular colony. Nay, the same doctrine might be brought even nearer home. Might it not equally be applied to another portion of her Majesty's dominions, separated from Great Britain only by the sea, as, indeed, is Canada; and then would the Honourable Member for Bridport declare that, however treasonable the language used, however rebellious the feeling manifested, still these were to be justified by the fact of their accordance with the views of the majority of the people? It is admitted that the Canadas are, both of them, colonies of this country, and have established in them two independent legislatures; but, at the same time, those legislatures invariably confer with the mother country upon any course that is thought important to be pursued with reference to the government or interests of those colonies. The resolutions at present before me show that it was the intention of Canada, acting on the principle of her constitution, to submit her grievances to the consideration of Parliament here; and, if so, surely Canada was bound by the course the British Parliament might think fit to adopt.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Oh, oh!

Mr. MACLEAN. — The Honourable Gentleman may cry "Oh!" but I would be glad if the Honourable Gentleman, whoever he may be, will tell me what becomes of the doctrine that the majority should always take the lead, when, on the colony, submitting—as it did—its interests to the consideration of the Legislature of Great Britain, and on a majority of that Legislature refusing its sanction to the measures proposed by the colonists; the latter refuse to adopt such decision,—what becomes of the argument, that we must act in conformity with the views of that majority? Why, the Canadians have themselves negatived that doctrine. They represented either real or supposed grievances to the Legislature of this country; those real or supposed grievances received the solemn deliberation of the House of Commons; and is it to be said that when Parliament, by a large and overwhelming majority, passed the resolutions now before me, and sent them out to the Canadian Legislature, those resolutions, so adopted, were to be met with an address which, according even to the Honourable Member for Leeds, was couched in a most insulting tone towards the mother country? Why, if one course was more adapted than another to blow the flame of civil war in the Canadas, it was the course taken on the occasion to which I refer, by the House of Assembly, with their Speaker at their head. And when the Earl of Gosford thought it his duty to make a proclamation in the name of her Majesty, is this House to be told by Honourable Members who are here the advocates of that course of proceeding, which may or may not be treasonable, that it was justifiable in some of the magistracy to be part and parcel of a meeting who tore down the Queen's proclamation, and treated it with insult? That meeting was held for the purpose of setting at defiance her Majesty's authority, and when those gentlemen were most properly dismissed from the commission of the peace for thus contemning the royal authority, did not the people appoint justices of their own, and, under a solemn agreement, bind themselves to pay no obedience to the law or the courts of the country? Is the House, then, under such circumstances, to be told that when the Governor General saw these events passing before his eyes,—that when his authority was set at defiance, his whole jurisdiction abolished, — he was to be blamed for taking those steps which were necessary to discharge his duty to his country, and prove his loyalty to his sovereign? Is it just to designate him as the man who has blown the flame of civil war, and driven the Canadian people against the Government of the mother country? I should like Honourable Gentlemen opposite to say what course they would have recommended Lord Gosford, under such circumstances, to adopt. I should be glad to hear from them what they, in their wisdom, would have done, if placed in the same position as that in which the Noble Earl stood? I will say, that if the Noble Earl, instead of pursuing the course he has done, had truckled to the parties engaged in these rebellious acts, he would have ceded the Queen's rights; and, in my opinion, would have been a traitor to his country and his Queen, and would have been justly taunted, when he returned home, with arrant cowardice, for failing to discharge the high and important functions with which his Sovereign had invested him.

I do not stand up either to vindicate or to discuss the nature of Lord Gosford's mission; but I will say, looking at all the facts before the House, that it appears to me somewhat curious to charge the Noble Earl with an abandonment of duty, when he has actually been forced into the severe exercise of the powers with which he was invested, by the unfair promulgation of doctrines which militated against the authority of the Crown. The Canadians have been told, by some Honourable Gentlemen in communication with them, that the time was coming when the baleful domination of this country over the colonies would cease. Now, nothing can be more calculated to excite the colonists, and to lead them to suppose that the people of England were favourable to the views of M. Papineau's party, than the language used in the correspondence and communications to which I allude. When it was understood that her Majesty's Government intended to call Parliament together for the purpose of discussing this subject, I had hoped that the angry topics which have been launched tonight, and urged upon the attention of the country, would have been avoided. I regret that some Honourable Members opposite should have thought it right to declare their wish, that whatever course this question might take, if it came to blows, and her Majesty's troops were brought into collision with those parties engaged in the rebellion, — her Majesty's arms might be defeated. I cannot but enter my protest against such language being uttered, especially by Honourable Members of the station and rank of those to whom I advert; and I trust that the wishes of the majority of the House will be, however painful it is to contemplate a collision of the nature all must deprecate (namely, between those who defy the authority of the Crown, and those sent to support and relieve the difficulties of the Governor General), that if any such collision do take place, her Majesty's troops may be successful. I also extremely regret that, in this discussion, Honourable Gentlemen opposite should have dealt in expressions derogatory to individuals placed in authority in Canada. Of Colonel Arthur I know nothing; but with regard to the gallant officer now in the command of the troops serving in that colony, and armed with a most delicate and important commission, I will say that the language applied to that gallant officer by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny was not in the most remote degree warranted by anything that is known of him. I speak of him as the son of an old officer, when I state that Sir John Colborne is a man highly esteemed in the profession of which he is an ornament, and has discharged many most important services to the country. Sir John Colborne has been spoken of as a firebrand sent from one province to another, and as unlikely to extinguish civil war; but I am sure I speak the voice of the whole military profession, when I declare that Sir John Colborne does not deserve the imputations which have been cast upon him. I cannot but deprecate the unseasonableness of the present discussion, which I think is calculated to give a false colouring to the events which have happened, and a false direction to those which are about to follow.

SIR C. B. VERE. — I must say, that the aspersions which have been thrown out against Sir John Colborne by Honourable Gentlemen opposite were extremely improper, and ought not to have been indulged in. I can bear testimony to the great claims of Sir John Colborne to that respect and esteem which he has acquired among his brother officers. I believe that the character of no officer in the public service stands higher, nor is there one better qualified to have trust reposed in him. He is a friend whom I have not seen for years; but I may safely say, that every Minister with whom he has had communication, in the situation in which he has been placed, whether of the one political party or the other, has been perfectly satisfied with the manner in which that gallant officer has discharged his duty.

Mr. J. ELLIS. — I conceive that with a subject of so important and pressing a nature as that which is involved in the present discussion, it is incumbent upon the House to adjourn over for the shortest possible period. The Noble Lord admits that the reports from Canada, which have been published, are credible, and that he believes they cannot be questioned; yet the Noble Lord has proposed an adjournment of three weeks. Now, when I consider the nature of the sentiments which have been this night expressed, — when I consider that the present debate will be a long way on its road to Canada before the three weeks will have expired, and before any counteraction can be given to these sentiments, — and when the House remembers that Lower Canada is on the very verge of insurrection, and that the flames of rebellion are ready to break forth there, — I trust that Honourable Members will press upon the Noble Lord the necessity of fixing an earlier day than the 16th of January for the re-assembling of Parliament. I must, at the same time, express my astonishment that the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Westminster, so soon after the news of a collision between the British troops and the insurgents had reached England, should come down to this House and deliver a speech, — I will not say tainted, but at any rate—completely pregnant, with gratulation, in which he did not even point out any means of effecting an amicable separation, but suggested the manner in which the colony might resist the connection with, and shake off the authority of, the mother country. I did not expect to hear the Honourable Member say that the measures of the Government would fail in putting down the disturbances which exist in Lower Canada, and that the measures taken by the Canadians for resisting the authority of this country were well taken and would be successful — I did not expect that the Honourable Member would have improved upon the policy which the Canadians are pursuing in recommending that all commercial intercourse between the two countries should cease. I must equally deprecate the language used by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. I do hope that the debate will be resumed at an early period, and that the language which may then be held will be more in accordance with that of the Noble Lord's (J. Russell), in his opening speech, than, I am sorry to say, much of that which I have heard uttered this evening.

Mr. HINDLEY. — Sir, if there be any one part of my public conduct, any one vote that I have ever given in this House, with which I am better satisfied than another, it is the vote I gave last Session, on the Noble Lord's resolutions regarding Canada. I confess I cannot concur in the propriety of the shortness of the adjournment; for I am convinced that it will prove to be a most serious practical inconvenience to call back those Honourable Members who have been long in town, assiduously engaged in the discharge of parliamentary duties, earlier than the 1st of February. With respect to the question now under discussion, I would say, that all I wish or desire is, that Government should take conciliatory steps towards the adjustment of Canadian differences. I deprecate, exceedingly, the tone and temper of the clever and vehement speech of my Honourable Friend, the Member for Westminster (Mr. Leader); but I hope that the expressions of which I complain will not influence the feelings of the Canadian people, nor prevent her Majesty's Ministers from pursuing that conciliatory course which may long preserve Canada as a colony of the British Crown. But should the chance be even probable that Canada will become a separate state, still, I say, let us treat her whilst she is ours with the same kindness, the same good feeling, the same justice, and the same generosity with which all our other possessions and colonies are treated by the parent state. I, for one, in such a case, should be extremely glad that we were thus enabled to get rid of an expensive colony, on the ground of advantage both to it and to the mother country. But, in this alternative of parting with it, let us, at least, part on the best of terms, and make the necessary arrangements for rendering Canada a prosperous and independent state.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — I should not have trespassed on the patience of the House at all, on the present occasion, had it not been for the speech which we have just heard from the Honourable Member for Ashton (Mr. Hindley). That speech presented a very extraordinary contrast, indeed, with some which preceded it. I must concur with the Honourable Gentleman who last addressed the House in deprecating the language resorted to, especially by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume) and the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds (Sir W. Molesworth); the one of whom, in place of measures of conciliation, actually invoked the thunders of the rebels' cannon, whilst the other has recorded wishes which actually amount to curses upon the cause for which the standard of his country is unfurled in the Canadian territory. The Honourable Member for Westminster (Mr. Leader) has expressed his cordial approbation of proceedings which amount to all but absolute rebellion. I should be sorry to put faith in all the shadowy rumours which have reached this country, of late, from Canada, touching the state of feelings and opinions which exists throughout that vast country, but especially upon its frontiers. This, however, I must say, — that expression, has been given, to-night, to principles of the most dangerous description that could agitate men's minds, either in Canada or in the mother country itself. For what was the language of the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds, but that of hearty and powerful encouragement to the monstrous insurrection of the British Canadian colonists? I have heard, in this British House of Commons, epithets of approbation and sympathy lavished on a struggle in which revolted colonists are arrayed with artillery, and all the appliances of war, against the troops of our gracious Sovereign. But the Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton) actually insists, that it is no question for us, here, to determine whether the asserted grievances of the Canadians be real or fictitious; he maintains that the only question is, whether they be matters which have been construed into grievances by the people of Canada; the meaning of which is, that it is not for this House to entertain questions of asserted grievances on the part of the people of Canada, or to devise such measures as may be necessary for their redress, or to adopt a system of policy that shall be acceptable to the wants, the wishes, or the feelings of the Canadians; but that it is for a particular party in the province of Lower Canada to assume to itself the cognisance of all these matters, and to give direction and excitement to the passions of the community in accordance with their own views on these subjects. Sir, I have never given my sanction to any principles of this kind. Neither do I think that the people of this country at large will ever give their sanction to the doctrines which the Honourable Member for Westminster has laid down, in favour of a course of headlong revolution. I do hope, nay, I trust, that her Majesty's Ministers, will treat with scorn and contempt any proposition for unworthy compromises, involving those great principles with which the loyalty of the people of this empire is intimately bound up. No, Sir; I am sure that the country will rather support the dignity of the Crown, and maintain its present connection with the colonies. When the Canadian insurgents shall have laid down their arms, — when they shall have returned to peaceful allegiance, — then, and not till then, can they pretend to talk of the redress of grievances; then, and not till then, can we pay any regard to the suggestion of what is called the peaceful separation of the colony from the mother country.

But the Honourable Member for Bridport has further said, that he wonders that the Whigs should be those who adopt this course, on the present occasion, of vindicating the authority of the Crown of Great Britain over a revolted colony, "because," he says, "they are the successors of those who took so different a part upon the great question of that colonial separation which terminated in the American war;" and he has quoted the authority of Mr. Burke to justify the policy so adopted by their predecessors. Now there is nothing wonderful in that; but I, for one believe, that if Mr. Burke were now alive, and sitting on those benches opposite, he would take the same steps which, we have reason to hope, the Noble Lord (J. Russell) will take upon the present occasion, in vindicating the authority of the Crown and of Parliament, and restoring tranquillity to this unhappy province. I must add, that I do not participate in one view of that Honourable Gentleman, namely, that which he has on this matter taken, in common with others who for the last three or four years have expressed their warm solicitude for the success of British soldiers, and the honour of the British flag, engaged elsewhere, and yet do not hesitate to say, on the present occasion, that they will be pleased to hear that the arms of the young Victoria, the Queen of Great Britain, have been defeated, in one of her own colonies.

Yes, Sir, there is, indeed, an amazing contrast, sufficient to awaken that cheer, between the language which was held by these very individuals in another case; namely, that of the employment of the British troops in Spain, on an occasion, when they were forced to fall back before a foreign force, and when Gentlemen opposite were loud in their expressions of eager anxiety for the success of the British standard; and their language now, when the conflict is not for the triumph of a faction in a foreign and independent state, but for the preservation of a colony to the imperial Crown of Great Britain. It is of this latter struggle they have presumed to say, that it will gratify them to learn that her Majesty's arms have been defeated, and that a portion of her Majesty's subjects have accomplished a successful rebellion to her power! I will not now enter into any discussion, however, upon that question. It is sufficient to observe, that, with regard to Spain, they declared their fervent hope to be, that, however unjust might be the cause in which British arms were employed, those arms might never experience defeat;—and yet that now, when the cause in which British arms are engaged is a just and righteous one, and when the scene of conflict lies in one of our own colonies, their aspirations are for the triumph of the rebellious party. Any observations which I might desire to offer upon the merits of the great question which is involved in that immediately before us, I postpone, because I agree that the better opportunity for submitting them will be when the Noble Lord shall again call Parliament together.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I think that the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir Robert Inglis) can hardly have been in his place when I originally made my statement to the House. For the information of the Honourable Baronet, and of others who may not have been present, I will recal to the recollection of the House what I did originally state, and the actual circumstances of the case. We were about to move the adjournment of the House from to-morrow to the 1st of February, and no complaint was made against such a course. The House was quite ready to leave to the Government the responsibility and the arrangements as to the administration of the affairs of Canada, as well as of the other parts of the empire. I did, under these circumstances, without any suggestion, come forward with the proposition that the House should adjourn to the 16th of January instead of the 1st of February,—not on the ground that it was necessary to take any measures adapted for any immediate emergency, or that the Government thought that Parliament need take any steps to promote the honour of the Crown and the maintenance of the colony; but what I did state was, that I thought, from the uncertain intelligence which was arriving, week by week, and on account of some important information which we had already received, it was not parliamentary, nor was it according to the constitution of the country, that Parliament should separate, for so long a period as five weeks, without some expression of concurrence, on the part of the House, in the course of policy which the Government had thought it its duty to pursue. On this ground alone it was that I stated my intention of moving a shorter adjournment; and I think, if I had made it still shorter,—if I had moved only for an adjournment of one week, without immediate and sufficient necessity, I should have run the risk of not obtaining so full an attendance of Members as was requisite to ascertain the fair opinion of the House with respect to the policy which has been pursued in Canada. I should have had little to add to these few observations, had it not been for the spirit that has sprung up in the course of the debate; but I think it is necessary that I should express my opinion on the tone and manner that have been exhibited in some of the speeches which have been delivered this night. I trust my Honourable Friends will be satisfied with this explanation, and see that we should be neglectful of our duty as Ministers of the Crown, did we not animadvert on such language as I have heard, with astonishment, in some of the speeches to which I allude. I do not find fault with the philosophic view which the Honourable Member for Bridport has taken of the subject, when he says that, if you have a distant colony in which complaints exist, it is no matter or consequence whatever whether or not the complaints of your colonists,—the Canadians, for example,—are unfounded and unjust; whether the notions of their rights entertained by those colonists be well founded or not,—no matter from what part of the colony those complaints proceed; but, in any such case, you ought to effect a separation between the colony and the parent state on amicable terms. I know not, as has already been said by another Honourable Member, if I were willing to discuss that philosophical argument, whither it would lead me. I know not to what parts of this empire such a doctrine, if allowed to prevail, might not, at some period of our history, have applied. I know not whether, if my Honourable Friend had lived at the time of the accession of the House of Hanover to the throne of these realms, he would have said, Scotland being at that time unfriendly to the Hanoverian succession, that, as the people of Scotland wished to have a Sovereign of another race, their desire ought to be gratified, and that the union between the two countries ought to be immediately repealed.

I do think that, if we were to discuss this question as a mere abstract proposition, it would be found to stand, indeed, as to the feeling of Scotland, with regard to the succession of the House of Hanover, on very plausible data ; but could it have been gravely said that Scotland would be justified on such a ground in calling for a separation or dissolution of the union with this country? If such a doctrine were to avail, it would be totally irreconcileable with the dominion of a great empire,—inconsistent, and utterly at variance with our position among the nations of the world,—and, as I believe, in the end, totally destructive of all social order and happiness.

But, supposing we were to give way to this theoretical and extreme proposition of my Honourable Friend, does he really believe that, after the statements which we have heard to-night in this House, we should get rid of, as he says we should do, the bad feelings which would be engendered by civil war, and the disaffection and discontent which at present, to a certain extent, unhappily prevail in Canada? Does my Honourable Friend believe, after the speeches which he has heard this night, — does he really believe that those bad feelings will be got rid of by the adoption of such a course? Has he not heard enough to demonstrate to him, that if her Majesty's Ministers should be ill-advised enough to pursue such a line of policy, a large portion of her Majesty's subjects in Lower Canada would be doomed to wade through the horrors of instant proscriptions, that they would be subjected to the loss of their property, and would be in danger of their lives. And shall it then be said, that Government should abandon them at once to the mercy of their enemies? Shall it be said, that we must abandon them all to the tender mercies of a new republic, in what was, heretofore, British America?

Has the House not heard—not, indeed, from a Canadian—not from one of French descent, and therefore less likely to sympathise with natives of this country, but from a Member of this House — a degree of satisfaction expressed at the desertion of British troops, and a hope avowed that they will fail in their allegiance to those colours to which I hope they will always be attached? Have not we seen, on the part of a Member of this House, a sort of gloating over the confiscation of public and private property in Canada, at the violation of compacts entered into, and solemnly recognised by Acts of the British Parliament,—property the settlement of which was sanctioned by that Parliament, and secured to British settlers with all the formalities of the law, acquired, as it was, by the outlay of their own means, in the purchase of these lands in the distant territory of the Canadas? Have we not witnessed a sort of delight expressed at the prospect of these lands being confiscated, and those persons driven penniless from their homes, — and this by a member of a British House of Commons? If I were to comply with the pacific proposition of my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport, does my Honourable Friend expect that tranquillity would be restored in Lower Canada, and that protection could be afforded by the Government to all classes of her Majesty's subjects in that country? I must remind him that Government would not be acting a part which becomes the Ministers of the British Crown if we were thus to sacrifice the interests of British settlers and subjects by withdrawing our protection from their lives and their property; and my Honourable Friend must know, that those who are foremost in this struggle against the lawful authority of the Crown have always been actuated by the most deadly animosity against British subjects living in the same country as themselves. I do not believe, from the information which has reached me, that the parties engaged in upholding the cause of rebellion are so much influenced by an abstract love for particular form of constitution, as by those violent feelings which have grown out of and survived former feuds, and which they think they shall be more likely to gratify during the confusion of civil broils, than while the country remains under the ordinary and legitimate form of government. But, then, we are told, as we often have been told, that the course which the Government has pursued is precisely that which this country has followed with respect to America. The Honourable Member for London (Mr. Grote) has said that the cases are exactly alike, and has maintained that there is not, as the Honourable Member for Newark, who spoke with so much ability to-night, has contended, a great similarity between them. I must say, that I agree with the Honourable Member for Newark in thinking that these contests are dissimilar in their origin, as, too, I trust they will be in their result.

With respect to America, the first Act of the British Parliament was passed, not in consequence of the refusal of the American Legislature to pay their contribution towards the expenses of their own internal government, for they had made large contributions for that purpose, but it was an Act granting and applying certain stamp-duties, to be raised in the British colonies in North America, to-

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITY BILL.

The Order of the Day for the third reading of this Bill having been read, on the motion of LORD JOHN RUSSELL, —

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR said: — I rise with great reluctance to address the House on this occasion; but the more any duty is painful in itself, or likely to be followed by circumstances of personal disadvantage, the more it is incumbent upon any honest public man not to shrink from the faithful discharge of it. When the message in reference to this grant was first read from the chair, I anticipated a very different arrangement from that which has since been submitted. I thought that the two grants of 6000*l.* each, awarded expressly for the support and education of her Royal Highness the Princess Victoria in 1825 and 1831, had, of course, reverted to the public,—certainly in point of equity, and probably in point of law,—in consequence of her Royal Highness's accession to the throne; and supposed that her Majesty's Ministers intend to propose that a part, or even the whole, of this sum, should be settled for life upon the Duchess of Kent, although, from the crown having devolved upon her royal daughter, her Royal Highness has been exonerated from the greater part of that very expense on account of which the two additional sums have been successively voted by Parliament. For, in my opinion, what is termed her Royal Highness's "increased proximity to the Throne" has rather diminished than augmented the demands upon her income. To this proposition, I am persuaded that a cordial and unanimous assent would have been given. I deeply feel, and gratefully acknowledge, how much the country is indebted to her Royal Highness for the unwearied solicitude and sound discretion with which her Royal Highness has superintended the education of our beloved Queen, although I may be excused for adding, that I trust there are, in the humbler spheres of life, hundreds of attached and anxious mothers, who have attended, with as exemplary a faithfulness, to the discharge of their maternal duties. I cannot but take this opportunity to observe, that, both in this House and out of doors, a custom is far too prevalent of showering down upon illustrious personages exaggerated panegyrics, to say nothing of fulsome adulation. It is cruel and unjust to poison their minds with inflated encomiums, which tend to make them think of themselves more loftily than they ought to think, and forget that they are by nature subject to like passions with the wicked, and to like infirmities with the weak.

The question now before the House is a very simple one; it is neither more nor less than this,—namely, whether an illustrious personage can enjoy all the comforts, and maintain all the splendour of her rank upon a clear income of 22,000*l.* per annum, amounting to above 400*l.* per week,—an income equivalent to the laying of sixty golden sovereigns upon the breakfast table every morning, and this without any deduction whatever,—no house-rent,—no taxes,—Kensington Palace and Claremont kept up at the public expense,—no ill-paid rents,—no fluctuations in the value of property,—no local burdens,—no insurances to provide for younger children. I cannot lay my hand upon my heart, and maintain the inadequacy of such an income for such a purpose; and I must, therefore, respectfully object to the new grant of 8000*l.* per annum. One sentiment is often uttered by gentlemen, and loudly cheered on all sides, which is not nearly so often expressed by candidates on the hustings as by Members in the House,—namely, a disregard for popular applause. I should be sorry to purchase the approbation of any individual, or class of persons, by a sacrifice of principle; but I must say that, in my opinion, it requires more moral courage to brave the frowns of a court, from which honours and affluence may be expected, than to disregard the smiles of the people, who have nothing to give or to take away. I think that profuse or unnecessary grants to the members of the Royal Family tend to bring the monarchy into discredit, and the House into contempt. I have acted consistently on this view of the subject, and not without a sacrifice of private feeling and of personal interest. I well remember that, in 1819, a proposition was brought before Parliament for allowing 10,000*l.* to the Duke of York, as custos of his royal father,—a proposition submitted by a Tory Government, which I was supporting, and strenuously opposed by the Whigs, who were not then in power, and were politically adverse to his Royal Highness. In spite of his Royal Highness's proximity to the Throne (to which he was immediate heir presumptive), in spite of his eminent and acknowledged services at the head of the army, Mr. Tierney, the then Whig leader, made an eloquent appeal against the grant; and two divisions took place, on both of which I had the good fortune to vote with the Noble Lord opposite, and all the principal Whigs of that day,—one proposition being, that the 10,000*l.* should be charged on his Majesty's privy purse, a course which I humbly think might, with singular propriety, have been followed on this occasion. Times are now changed, and the Whigs are in the full tide of court favour; but my own principles continue the same; I will act, in 1837, as I did in 1819, be the consequences to myself what they may. I hope I have expressed myself calmly and respectfully: the duty which has devolved upon me is a very irksome one; but I have followed the dictates of my conscientious conviction, and shall content myself with entering my protest against the grant.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — I differ widely from my Honourable Friend, and it is only fitting that I should state the reasons why I am at issue with him on this occasion; and when my Honourable Friend talks of its requiring more moral courage to brave the frowns of a court, from which honours and affluence may be expected, than to disregard the smiles of the people, who have nothing to give or to take away, I feel I should not do justice either to myself or to the subject under discussion, if I did not state the general view which I take of the matter. I maintain, Sir, that this is a question which ought not to be decided either by the smiles of the court or the frowns of the people. The grant, in my opinion, is quite justifiable, from her Royal Highness's nearer relation to the Throne, which will, of necessity, lead to an increase in the expenses of her establishment. I believe the amount now fixed is not the utmost which was originally proposed for her Royal Highness, and that the country is indebted to the disinterestedness of that illustrious lady for the refusal of a much larger sum in a different shape. There is a very prevalent rumour that her Royal Highness declined the offer made by Ministers to discharge her debts, if she had any, in addition to the present grant. I yield my cheerful assent to the third reading of the Bill.

SIR EDWARD CODRINGTON. — Coinciding, as I do, in the opinion so ably expressed by the Honourable Baronet, I beg leave most cordially to support the third reading of this Bill.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Whatever may be the opinion of the Honourable Baronet near me (Sir R. Inglis), I am resolved to pursue that course which I regard as consistent with my duty. Though I sit on this side of the House, I am not tied down to support every proposition which comes from it; but I am determined, on all occasions, to act honestly, fearlessly, and conscientiously. The course I am now adopting is forced upon me by the profligacy of the Government, who have come into office on the strength of their professions of economy and retrenchment, but who have totally disregarded them. I have no doubt there are debts, though Ministers are not honest or manly enough to lay the particulars of the case before the House; but I believe, also, that the report referred to by the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford is true, and that her Royal Highness has indignantly rejected the offer of the Government to discharge them. Though I have failed in reducing the grant from 30,000*l.* to 22,000*l.*, still I will persevere in my duty, and bring forward two other amendments to the Bill.

The SPEAKER. — These motions cannot be made till the Bill has been read a third time.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I will content myself, in that case, for the present, with protesting against the grant, as uncalled-for and unnecessary; because, with such a House it would be quite useless for me to have recourse to a division. I will not buy favour from any one, by neglecting what I consider to be a public duty. I have felt bound to state my honest and undisguised opinions, and will not retract a single syllable of what I have uttered.

The Bill was then read a third time. On the question that it do now pass, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — The period has arrived for moving the clauses of which I have given notice. I hope the House will profit by its experience of the dissatisfaction caused by the enormous grant voted out of the impoverished funds of this country to the King of the Belgians, for, according to the old adage, "a burnt child ought to dread the fire." If 30,000*l.* were to be taken from the country, and spent abroad by the Duchess of Kent, it would, in my view of the matter, be a most ungrateful return for our liberality. As to the possible contingency of her marriage, I am supported in the proposition I am to make by an Act of Parliament already passed. I will now, with permission of the House, bring up the following clauses: —

"Provided always, and be it enacted, that the said annuity of 30,000*l*, or any part thereof, shall not be alienable; but that every alienation of the same or any part thereof shall be absolutely null and void.

"Provided always, and be it enacted, that in case her Royal Highness Mary Louisa Victoria, Duchess of Kent, shall, after passing any grant by Act of Parliament for the sole and separate use of her said Royal Highness, marry with any person without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, or shall cease to reside in, or shall absent herself from, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, without such aforesaid consent, for more than twelve months at any one period, or without the intervening period of six months' residence in Great Britain, shall afterwards return abroad, a portion, not exceeding one half of such grant as may be given by way of annuity to her said Royal Highness, shall, in either such case, absolutely and entirely cease."

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I really must oppose the bringing up of these clauses. The annuity of 100,000*l.* was granted by Parliament to the Queen Dowager without any condition or restriction, and it would be most unbecoming in this House to place any such restrictions on the grant to the Duchess of Kent as are now proposed. I beg to recal the attention of Honourable Members to a few circumstances relating to her Royal Highness. When her Royal Highness became a widow, she found that, by no fault of her own, very large debts had been incurred, for the payment of which she was liable; and I must say, that at that period a great temptation was presented to her, having been born and bred a foreigner, to retire to a country where the rate of living was cheaper than in this, and to the manners of which she was more accustomed. Her Royal Highness, however, rightly thought that her duty to this nation required her to reside here, and to bring up her Royal daughter among her future subjects. In 1825, it was proposed by the Ministry of the day to increase the grant to her Royal Highness, but no conditions were annexed to the liberality of Parliament. Then, if ever, was the proper time to annex such conditions, inasmuch as the main object of the grant was to provide for the education of the Princess her daughter; but Parliament generously reposed confidence in the good and highly honourable disposition of her Royal Highness. That confidence was well-deserved, and has not been abused; and as one proof of it I will mention, now, a circumstance not alluded to in this place before. When the present Queen reached the age of eleven, her Illustrious Mother, not content with what she had done in providing the best preceptors for her daughter, asked the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Lincoln, to inquire into the particulars of her education; and to advise whether any other course of study would be better fitted to prepare her to reign over this empire, if it should ever please Providence to call her to that high office. Another grant was made by Parliament, in 1831, to the Duchess of Kent; no condition was attached to it; the same confidence was continued, and I think the House will agree with me, that that confidence has not been misplaced. Having, then, on former occasions made these grants without restriction,—having now to express our gratitude for the care bestowed on our Sovereign's education, — having to consider her Royal Highness as a person nearer to the Throne,—is the same liberality not to be extended towards her because her task has been fortunately and successfully accomplished? I must say, that it would be most unbecoming and indecorous in the House to agree to any motion that imposed conditions on the grant, and proceeded on supposed grounds derogatory to the merits of her Royal Highness.

MR. BRISCOE. — It appears to me, that the conduct of the Honourable and Gallant Officer is strangely at variance with his professions. I can only say, that I have great pleasure in supporting the original motion.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—I care not what may be the opinion of the Honourable Gentleman. I have discharged my duty in proposing this clause, and therefore I will not trouble the House to divide.

Question, "That the said clause be brought up," put, and negatived; Bill passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg leave to move, "That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Tuesday, the 16th day of January next.

The question having been put, —

LORD GEORGE BENTINCK said: — I do not know, Sir, why we should sleep over the Christmas holidays. I think that, looking to the intelligence which has been received from Canada, it would better become the House to meet again with the least possible delay, in order to support the Ministers of the Crown in any strong measures which it may be necessary to adopt, in order to crush the rebellion which has burst forth. I therefore propose, as an amendment, to leave out the words "Tuesday, the 16th day of January next," in order to add the words "Thursday next."

Question, "That the words 'Tuesday, the 16th day of January next' stand part of the question." The House divided:—

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I will now give notice, that on the 16th of January I will move that the House take into consideration that part of the Speech from the Throne relating to the affairs of Canada, and that any measure which may be introduced with reference to that subject shall have precedence on all days before the 1st of February.

BENEFICES PLURALITY BILL.

To abridge the holding of benefices in plurality, and make better provision for the residence of the clergy. — Presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Friday, the 2d of February, and to be printed.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

LORD G. BENTINCK. — I think it is important that the House should be called over on Tuesday, the 16th of January. I beg, therefore, to make a motion to that effect.

Upon the question being put, that the House be called over on Tuesday, the 16th of January, —

LORD J. RUSSELL said: — I certainly am not prepared to adopt the motion of the Noble Lord, unless he is prepared to state reasons to justify it. It does not at present appear to me necessary that the House should be called over on that day.

LORD G. BENTINCK. — If the Government think it necessary to assemble Parliament at an earlier period than they originally intended, that, in my opinion, constitutes a sufficient reason for proposing such a motion. It is hardly necessary for me to give any other reason, when the Canadian provinces are acknowledged to be in a state of rebellion, and the insurgents are reported to be 2000 strong, with eight pieces of cannon. I must also be permitted to say, that her Majesty's Ministers are acting with great apathy and negligence in adjourning for so long a period.

SIR S. WHALLEY. — I rise to order, Sir. Upon an occasion when your predecessor was in the chair, I myself made a similar motion to the present. That Right Honourable Gentleman held that it was not competent for me to move a call of the House, as I had not complied with the forms of the House in giving twenty-four hours' notice. I apprehend, Sir, that the same rule must apply in this case.

The SPEAKER. — There can be no doubt that, according to the ordinary rules and practice of the House, the Noble Lord ought to give notice of such a motion; but it is for the House to decide whether any change shall be made in the usual course of proceeding in consequence of the emergency that has arisen. It is competent for the Noble Lord to propose to make such a motion, but whether it shall be entertained or not is a question for the consideration of the House.

SIR G. SINCLAIR. — If the present state of affairs in Lower Canada be such that it is necessary to call the Parliament together on the 16th of January instead of the 1st of February, as was originally intended, I think it is equally necessary that a call of the House should be made for that day.

The motion was then put, and negatived.

BALLOT.

Mr. WARD presented a petition of the chairman of a meeting at Sheffield, in favour. — To lie on the Table.

MESSAGE TO ATTEND HER MAJESTY.

The House went, and being returned,—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to Civil List Bill; Slave Compensation Bill; Municipal Officers' Declaration Bill; Juries at Sessions Bill; Houses of Parliament Bill; Prisoners (Ireland) Bill; Patry's Naturalisation Bill; Mengen's Naturalisation Bill; Ionides's Naturalisation Bill; Schwann's Naturalisation Bill; Saffran's Naturalisation Bill.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

On the question that the House do now adjourn,—

Mr. WAKLEY said: — I rise, Sir, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the state of the ventilation of this House. Honourable Members may smile, but I can assure them, it is a subject well worthy of their serious consideration, if they have any regard for their own health. It is true, there are more frequent changes of air than under the old system, and that we are much freer from breathing respired air than formerly. But I ask those Honourable Members who have attended night after night to their duties, whether they have not suffered from irritation of the throat and lungs, from sitting in this House? I myself suffered seriously during the last Session, and I feel the symptoms now returning; and unless there is some alteration made, so as to prevent this unpleasantness, I certainly will not retain my seat: for I will not endanger my life by being compelled to breathe such an impure atmosphere as that of the House of Commons is now. Yesterday, I, in company with Dr. Arnott, examined the House, and if Honourable Gentlemen will give me their attention, I will read that gentleman's report: —

Memorandum of an Inspection made by me this day, the 22d of December, 1837, of the Arrangements for ventilating and warming the House of Commons.

In regard to ventilation, I found the great chimney pump acting strongly and ably, with a small part of its power, to change the whole air in the House in half an hour, or less.

In regard to heating, I found a collection of flat iron boxes filled with hot water, and sufficient, apparently, to warm as much air as can be required for abundant ventilation in a cold day.

But, in regard to ventilation, I found the fresh air entering the House through numerous small openings in the floor, and then through a carpet, on which, necessarily, is deposited a quantity of mud and dust from the boots and shoes of the Members. This deposit is soon, by the passing warm air, converted into a fine or subtle dust, and is carried up to be breathed by the Members present.

And, in regard to warming, I found that the air was merely heated, but not tempered by moisture. Now, atmospheric air, everywhere on earth, has naturally a quantity of moisture in it, bearing a certain proportion to its temperature, and which moisture is essential to the health of the organised beings living in it; and it is on this account that, over the continent of Europe, where dwellings are generally warmed by close stoves, vessels of water are always placed on the stoves to diffuse moisture.

The two defects mentioned account sufficiently for the dry throats, cough, feverish heat, &c., complained of by Members, and for the much dust found in their dress, and the little left to be swept away, as of old, from the floor.

The remedies are, 1. To give moisture to the air in any of the usual ways, as by suspending in the heating-chamber a sufficiency of cloth, kept wet. 2. To admit the fresh air into the House through openings, not in the floor, but above the floor, in the perpendicular surfaces around, and which openings shall be of sufficient amount to prevent the current through them being at all felt by persons sitting near them. These, or equivalent remedies would, I am sure, have been suggested by Dr. Reid, the proposer of the present arrangements, had he, by being in London, had the opportunity of seeing the present defective working of his plan, and if they are adopted, the objects will still be attained according to his general principles. N. ARNOTT.

Bedford Square, Dec. 22. 1834.

Now, I trust the House will consider that this is not a matter of slight importance. The dust the Members are swallowing daily, as the House is now built, is dreadful; our throats will at length become perfectly macadamised. If it is agreed that something should be done to obviate the inconvenience, I am sure that the Speaker will give the necessary directions for it during the recess; and I have every reason to believe, that the expense necessary for making the alteration will be found very trifling.

Mr. WARBURTON.—I pertectly concur with the statement of Dr. Arnott, as to diffusing moisture through the House. It is well known that, where air stoves are used, water is required in order to generate moisture. It has been suggested that the letting in steam would, for this purpose, be preferable to using water; the alteration necessary would be very trifling, and great benefit would be derived from it by Honourable Members.

Mr. HAWES. — As chairman of the committee of regulations for promoting the comfort of the House, I beg to offer one word on this subject. I trust that the House will not decide upon making any material alteration, without consulting the gentleman who proposed the mode of ventilation which we have adopted. As to diffusing moisture through the House to correct the dryness of the atmosphere, a great improvement has been made in that respect; for canvas has been strained over poles in the sides of the House, which is kept constantly wet; and the House will hardly credit the fact, that no less than forty palls of water are consumed by Honourable Members in this way during a single evening's sitting. The effect produced by this plan has been generally considered as most agreeable. The plan of descending air would have been adopted by Dr. Reid, but it involved great expense; and there has been such difficulty in getting the Treasury Gentlemen to advance any money for the purpose, that the plans proposed by Dr. Reid were necessarily stinted in their execution. I believe that that gentleman has not yet been remunerated for the important services he has already rendered us. I hope, however, that he will be consulted again on this business.

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE. — I myself have felt the unpleasantness complained of; and yesterday went over the House and examined the apparatus with Dr. Arnott and the Honourable Member for Finsbury. The plan proposed by Dr. Arnott seems perfectly feasible, and involves but little expense. I think the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Hawes) is mistaken in supposing that Dr. Reid has not been remunerated. I believe he has received a certain sum of money. I am sure, however, that if he has not been adequately remunerated, the House will be quite ready to order a further sum to be paid him. I beg to thank the Honourable Member for Finsbury for calling the attention of the House to this matter, and I hope some alteration will be made during the recess.

SIR E. CODRINGTON.—I, also, can bear witness to the present defective state of the ventilation of the House. I have frequently, after a long sitting, gone home with a severe headach in consequence.

Mr. A. WHITE.—I hope the Secretary of the Treasury will not grudge any sum of money that may be necessary to alter the House, so that Members may attend without being subject to such inconvenience. I have myself suffered from a cough frequently, in consequence of the state of the House.

Mr. HAWES. — I have no doubt but that, with Dr. Reid's assistance, the inconvenience complained of might be remedied.

Mr. BARING.—I have no objection to offer to any alteration being made; but I also think that no measures should be taken without consulting Dr. Reid. I am not aware that, on the part of the Treasury, there has been any reluctance to advance money for such plans as might be thought necessary; but they certainly have objected (and I think properly) to incur expense for merely trying experiments, such as lowering the house to improve the hearing. It was my impression that Dr. Reid had been remunerated; but as the Honourable Member for Lambeth has stated that it is not so, I will ascertain the fact immediately, and see that he receives a proper remuneration.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Although Dr. Reid

has greatly improved the ventilation of the House, yet great knowledge has been acquired on the subject since then, and I think that Dr. Arnott has done much towards its acquisition. With respect to ventilation by the roof, as was once proposed, my own opinion is that it would not succeed; as the rush of air from the top would force down the carbon, and thus the health of Honourable Members would be endangered. If Dr. Reid entertains any prejudices on this subject, he may be aided by some other person who is not of the same opinions.

Mr. HAWES. — I would suggest, as it is intended to make improvements in the House, whether it would not be advisable to have two doors, so that, at the time of a division, the Members may not be so long detained in leaving and returning to the House, as they now are.

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE. — The Noble Lord at the head of the Woods and Forests has, I understand, already given directions for an additional doorway to be formed, in order to facilitate divisions.

Mr. G. F. YOUNG. — It would also, I think, be very desirable if a few cross-benches were put up, at the same time, according to the suggestion made by the Honourable Member for Finsbury the other night, for the accommodation of those Honourable Members who agree with neither Whigs nor Tories.

The House adjourned at two o'clock, till Tuesday, the 16th of January.

CANADA.

LORD GLENELG. — I have to present to your Lordships, by command of her Majesty, certain papers relating to the affairs of Canada, which are a sequel to those which were presented to the House about three weeks since. I should have been very much disposed, in laying these papers on the table, as far as my own wishes were concerned, to have entered, this evening, upon the subject to which they refer. I am aware, however, that in so doing there would be some informality, as the more regular course would be to give notice of the subject to be brought under the consideration of the House. I am quite ready at this moment to enter into the question; but the consideration of the informality induces me to submit to the judgment of your Lordships, whether I ought to do so, or whether I should take the usual course of giving notice that I will call the attention of your Lordships to the matter on an early day? If it be your Lordships' wish or opinion that I had better not enter on the question now, then I shall give notice that I will on the earliest day possible, — on Thursday, — move a humble address to her Majesty on the subject of the affairs of Canada.

The Noble Lord then laid on the table copies or extracts of correspondence relative to the affairs of Lower Canada (in continuation of paper presented on the 23d of December last).

LORD BROUGHAM. — Having, from accidental circumstances, and other causes, taken some considerable interest in this subject, and having been, when one of his late Majesty's servants, much occupied with the disputes between Canada and this country, and having, also, taken an anxious share in the deliberations which have taken place in this House on this question, I cannot help, without any delay whatever, expressing my decided opinion to my Noble Friend, that the most convenient course for him to take will be to give notice of his intention to bring the subject forward; and then to call on the House to agree to any measure he may deem it necessary to propose at the earliest possible period. I am clearly of opinion that this would be the fairest course of proceeding towards her Majesty's Government, the fairest towards your Lordships, and the most just and satisfactory to all the parties concerned.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I beg leave to state the reasons which induced me to take a different course with regard to this question, from that which it was the intention of the other House to adopt. My Noble Friend (Lord John Russell) gave distinct notice of his intention this day, to make a motion upon this subject. I certainly said that I should call the attention of your Lordships to it, but I did not give any distinct notice for a particular day on which I might bring it forward; nor were your Lordships summoned. I, therefore, did not think that it would be right to enter upon the matter at present; but again, I thought it inconvenient and scarcely fair to your Lordships, that a statement should be made in the other House on this subject to-day, and none in this. It was thus out of respect to your Lordships, that I suggested to my Noble Friend the propriety of making a general statement to your Lordships of the course intended to be pursued. I, however, feel that the course now suggested is the most proper and convenient; therefore, I hope my Noble Friend will be allowed to give his notice of motion for Thursday next. I have said thus much to prevent its being considered that there is anything like a contrary feeling between the two Houses, in consequence of the course which the Government have adopted. I will, however, repeat, that it is out of respect to your Lordships that I propose this course.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I did not at all complain of the course pursued by the Government.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—My Lords, I am very desirous to know what will be the nature of the proceedings which will be recommended by the Government at the next meeting of the House. I confess that I have a very strong opinion on this subject. It is my belief that the course of proceeding by way of an address from this House and the other House, in the first instance, is not the regular course. It is my opinion, that as a case of war has been made out, hostilities having been already committed, the authority for our proceeding ought to be a message from her Majesty, and in answer to that the House should present a humble address to the Throne containing the sentiments of your Lordships on the subject. That is, in my opinion, the most natural course, and I feel the more anxious about it, because I believe that such a course of proceeding would be most likely to put a speedy and successful termination to the unfortunate state of affairs between this country and the colony to which these proceedings relate. My opinion is, that her Majesty and her Majesty's Government ought to speak out on this subject, and that we, the Houses of Parliament, and the country, ought to understand on what ground her Majesty and the Government intend to stand on the question with relation to this country and Canada; for the sooner that is understood the better, and the more speedy will be the termination of this unfortunate business. I have no doubt whatever that, before long, her Majesty's Government will be under the necessity of calling upon Parliament to support her Majesty in these transactions, and I hope they will call upon Parliament to do so in such a manner as that Parliament will be enabled to pledge itself to support her Majesty in these transactions; and that the preparations for bringing them to a conclusion will be made on such a scale, as to render it quite certain that they will be brought to a conclusion at the earliest possible period after the season opens. If this be the case, it is my determination to support her Majesty's Government, and to persuade others to do so, in carrying these proceedings to a speedy termination. But, my Lords, I intreat you, and I intreat the Government, not to forget that a great country like this can have no such thing as a little war. They must understand, that if they enter on these operations, they must do it on such a scale, and in such a manner, and with such determination as to the final object, as to make it quite certain that those operations will succeed, and that at the very earliest possible period after the season opens. The question which I wish to put to the Noble Lord is as to the precise nature of the motion he intends to propose on Thursday. In putting that question, I have thought it proper to open my mind on the subject, and to say what course I think the Government ought to adopt,—which course in my opinion ought to have been adopted before.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I agree with the Noble Duke as to the general principles which he has stated. I entirely concur with him that an explicit and decisive tone ought to be assumed by the Government, and that the preparations which may be made for putting an end to the present state of things ought to be on such a scale as to afford a hope of bringing the matter to a speedy conclusion. Perhaps it would have been the more usual course to proceed by bringing down a message from the Throne in the first instance; but the papers which have just been brought down to the House may be considered as in the form of a message from the Throne; and, in fact, it would be very inconvenient to bring down a message on a subject, the principal matter of which is already before the House. The Noble Duke has expressed a hope that her Majesty's Ministers will speak out on the present occasion. Undoubtedly they will do so. I am willing to admit that, if a message from the Throne had been sent down, it might have given greater solemnity and weight to the present proceedings; but I think there would be some difficulty in adopting that plan now. Yet I trust that, by the course we have taken, an opportunity will be given to the Government, and to both Houses of Parliament, to adopt such a tone as shall make it clear to all men that this country is determined, consistently with a due regard to the rights of others, to maintain its dignity, and to uphold its station among the nations of the earth.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Though her Majesty's Ministers have not brought down a message, the House ought to understand what is the nature of the address to be proposed on Thursday. I trust, therefore, that the Noble Baron (Lord Glenelg) will give the explanation which has been asked for by the Noble Duke. A message from the Throne is usually accompanied by the papers relating to the subject of the message; but the Noble Viscount has said that, in this case, the papers are tantamount to a message from the Throne, because the matter for consideration is contained in them. I must say that the matter is not in the papers; they only inform the House that a war going on, but they do not show how or when the war commenced, though that intelligence must have been received. I trust that the Noble Baron will distinctly inform your Lordships what are the terms of the address he means to propose. I, for one, cannot acquiesce in any address which will support or approve the course which the Government have followed,—I mean that course which it is shown they have pursued by the correspondence already before your Lordships. With respect to that correspondence, I must say that the Noble Baron ought to furnish more papers; for at present it is very defective. The Noble Baron has talked of the documents he has just brought down being the sequel of the correspondence; will he have the goodness to tell your Lordships when the papers were received? I never knew yet of despatches being laid before the House, and the date of their writing being given without the date of the receipt. It is impossible to know whether certain parties have properly performed their duty unless the date at which the papers were received be given. There is a great hiatus in the correspondence; and perhaps the Noble Baron will be prepared to fill it up. I see that, on the 20th of November, 1836, it was stated by the Noble Baron, in a letter to Lord Gosford, —"I shall very shortly have to address you fully in explanation of the course of proceeding which it will be necessary to adopt in order to arrest the progress of these controversies." Now, I can find no despatch whatever from the Noble Baron between that date and the 11th of March, 1837. There is one, indeed, merely on financial matters; but, in that of the 11th of March, the Noble Baron says,—"Although I am unable, at the present moment, to enter fully into an explanation of the reasons, as the occasion might seem to require, for the course which her Majesty's Government have felt it their duty to adopt in relation to the affairs of Lower Canada, nor into a statement of the duties which will consequently devolve upon your Lordship, I feel it incumbent on me to avail myself of the first opportunity which has offered since the affairs of Lower Canada have been brought before the House of Commons, of informing you of the proceedings of Parliament in reference to this subject." And then the despatch proceeds to repeat the resolutions adopted by the House of Commons. That is no more than just what Lord Gosford could have gleaned from the newspapers. Now, I wish to know, have there been any despatches from the Noble Baron between the 20th of November, 1836, and the 11th of March, 1837? If there have been, can they be communicated without detriment to the public service? I wish to know, will the Noble Baron keep his word in this respect, and enter into an explanation of the intentions of her Majesty's Government?

LORD GLENELG.—When I laid before the House the papers referred to, I certainly did intend to follow them up with the despatches since received. I have not looked to the dates of the last despatches, nor do I now recollect the particular date to which the Noble Baron has alluded. I certainly shall examine as to the paper referred to, and whatever despatch can be produced between November and March without detriment to her Majesty's service, shall undoubtedly be produced. My impression now is, that the entire correspondence is before the House.

LORD FITZGERALD AND VESCI. —I presume that the Noble Baron did, agreeably to his promise to Lord Gosford, in his despatch of November 20th, 1836, enter into a full explanation on the subject, and that such a despatch was written during the interval between that date and the 11th of March, 1837.

LORD BROUGHAM. — There are several other hiatuses in the papers before this House. I assume — for I am bound to assume — that her Majesty's Ministers, as men of business, and knowing their own business, have examined all the archives of the Colonial Office, and have found no other papers that bear on the points in question, except those which were delivered to the House before the recess. As to what has been referred to by the Noble Lord (Lord Ellenborough), it appears to me to be a very extraordinary lacuna indeed; for, without the instructions furnished by the Noble Baron, Lord Gosford could not have acted. I, however, take it for granted that there are other papers to be produced than those before this House. There are many other blanks in this correspondence; but I cannot now point them out without entering into the whole question. Perhaps, however, my Noble Friend will supply the defects which have been referred to between this and Thursday, or the matter may be proceeded with to-morrow.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. —I beg leave to ask the Noble Baron whether he can lay a short paper on the Table to-morrow exhibiting the dates on which the correspondence was received?

LORD ABINGER. — As the House will be called upon for a vote on the subject, it ought certainly to know what sort of an address will be submitted to it.

LORD GLENELG. — I have not got the terms of the address with me; but it is to be a general one, expressing regret at the events which have occurred in Canada, and a determination to support her Majesty's Government in maintaining the dignity and station of this country.

LORD BROUGHAM.—That is to say, just the same address which was presented by both Houses of Parliament in the month of March, 1775.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — No, no; quite different.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — It will be extremely important that any despatches from Sir J. Colborne be laid before the House.

The EARL of RIPON. — The seat of the Government in Upper Canada has been attacked by persons having the same object in view as those who have created the insurrection in Lower Canada, but the papers produced have no reference whatever to anything that has taken place in that province. It appears that a certain Mr. Mackenzie was enabled to get temporary possession of the capital of Upper Canada. Well; the reason why he had a chance of doing so was, that Sir F. Head, in compliance with his orders, received by Sir J. Colborne, sent all the troops out of the province of Upper Canada into the Lower province. It appears to me that the two provinces are so connected together, that I am much surprised the House has had no information on this subject, unless, indeed, it happen to be in the papers which have been presented to-day.

LORD GLENELG. — Upon the subject to which my Noble Friend has just alluded, I have no official account at all. The papers I have just now presented contain a correspondence between Sir F. Head and Sir J. Colborne, respecting the transfer of troops from the upper province to the lower. I have no official account as to the correspondence between Sir John Colborne and Lord Gosford.

The papers were then ordered to be printed.

ELECTION PETITIONS.

Pontefract Election. — MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that Henry Gompertz, Esquire, who petitioned this House upon the 4th day of December last, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Pontefract, had not entered into a recognisance in respect of such petition, according to the directions of an Act passed in the ninth year of the reign of his Majesty King George IV., intituled "An Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to the Trial of Controverted Elections or Returns of Members to serve in Parliament." — Order for considering petition on Tuesday, the 22d day of May next, read, and discharged.

Dudley Election. — MR. Report of the examiners of the sureties read, as follows: —

Martis 16^{o} die Januarii, 1838.

Borough of Dudley. Petition of William Meryweather Turner.

In pursuance of the order of the Right Honourable the Speaker of Commons, dated the 4th day of December last, and herewith returned, we, the examiners thereby appointed, do hereby report, that, on Tuesday, the 26th day of December last, being the last day of the extended time granted by the House for the examination of the sufficiency of the sureties, when we had appointed to meet for that purpose, one of us, Francis Cross, Esquire, was prevented by serious illness from leaving his own house; and that the other examiner, in announcing this to the parties, informed them that the examination might nevertheless proceed, provided they mutually agreed to adjourn to the house of the said Francis Cross; but that the agent for the sitting Member objected to any such adjournment, so that no examination could be had of the sufficiency of the sureties.

Given under our hands the day and year first above written.

JOHN RICKMAN.
F. CROSS.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker.

Order for considering petition on Tuesday, the 24th day of April next, read, and discharged.

Papers presented by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, being copies or extracts of correspondence relative to the affairs of Lower Canada (by command). —To lie on the Table, and to be printed.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented, viz.: —

Marine Insurance, — By Mr. GEORGE F. YOUNG, — from Tynemouth, for the repeal of the duty thereon.

Post Horse, &c. Duties, — By Mr. GEORGE FREDERICK YOUNG and Mr. DIVETT, for the repeal of the duties thereon,— from North Shields and Tynemouth; and innkeepers and others in the counties of Devon, Dorset, Hants, Somerset, and Wilts.

Canada, — By Mr. HUME, praying the House to refuse their concurrence and support to the war now prosecuted in Canada, — of members of the Brentford Political Union, and inhabitants of Stonehouse.

Factories Act, — By LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH, — from Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe, for repeal or amendment of.

Window Tax, — By LORD DALMENY, — of inhabitants of Stirling, for repeal.

Tithe Commutation Act, — By Mr. BROTHERTON, — from Stretton-upon-Dunsmore, for repeal of certain parts thereof.

Edinburgh University, — By the ATTORNEY GENERAL, — of the Lord Provost, magistrates, and town council of Edinburgh, complaining of the graduates of that university being obstructed in their practice by the privileges of certain corporate bodies in England.

Licensed Victuallers, — By CAPTAIN PECHELL, — from licensed victuallers of Brighton, or protection from liability.

SHERIFFS' COURTS.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I wish to ask a question of the Honourable and Learned Attorney General, namely, whether it is the intention of the law officers of the Crown to undertake the management of the Bill called the Sheriffs' Courts Bill, which the Learned Attorney General gave the House reason to suppose that the Lord Chancellor had under his consideration, and which the Learned Attorney General also promised to mention on the first day of the meeting of Parliament?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I am authorised by the Lord Chancellor to state, that he is engaged with the judges in preparing the Bill to which the Honourable and Gallant Member refers, namely, a Bill for extending the jurisdiction in all cases tried by the sheriff to the amount of 50*l.*, and in all actions of whatsoever kind. I hope that the Bill will contain other enactments for the establishment of courts for the recovery of small debts, likewise for assisting in the administration of criminal justice at quarter sessions.

HAND-LOOM WEAVERS.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS.—I wish to ask the Noble Lord, whether the inquiry into the distressed condition of the hand-loom weavers is to be conducted by commissioners, or by deputy commissioners? I am induced to ask the question, because a very strong feeling exists on the subject in the manufacturing districts; and I am led to believe that, if the inquiry is directed to deputy commissioners, the result will not be satisfactory, and that no responsibility will attach to their Report.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg to say, that it is the intention of the commissioners to conduct the inquiry in the manufacturing districts through assistant commissioners. Those assistant commissioners have been appointed, and are about to proceed on their duties, if, indeed, they have not already commenced in those districts. The inquiry will, in reality, be conducted in a manner similar to that which was adopted with respect to the poor laws; and I have no doubt but that it will lead to a satisfactory result, and that we shall have an able Report, going into the whole subject.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I beg to inquire, whether it is intended to extend the inquiry into Warwickshire and throughout England?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Yes.

DUDLEY ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I beg to call the attention of the House to a special Report which has been laid on the Table this evening, in consequence of which the order for extending the time for completing the sureties in the case of the Dudley election petition was discharged. The facts of the case have been already recapitulated in that special report of the examiners which you read, Sir, to the House; and therefore the simple question is, whether the petitioner has not done all that was required of him by the Act of Parliament? I hope that the House, if such be the case, will interfere, and not allow the petitioner to be deprived of his rights by circumstances over which he had no control. I will, as a preliminary step, move that the order for discharging the previous order be itself discharged.

Mr. WYNN. — I apprehend that the House cannot proceed in the matter without a petition from the party, or without hearing evidence at the bar. The best plan for the Honourable Member to pursue will be to give notice of motion for to-morrow.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I sincerely thank the Right Honourable Gentleman for his suggestion; and if the House will allow me to do so, I will give notice of a motion on the subject for to-morrow, provided, upon searching the books, I can find any precedent to support me in making such a motion.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Mr. Speaker, I rise, in pursuance of the promise which I made to the House on a former occasion, to bring under its consideration, at the earliest possible opportunity, the state of the affairs of Canada. In proportion to the satisfaction which I feel, whenever it falls to my lot to propose any measure ensuring additional advantages to my fellow-subjects, or an improvement in the laws, is the pain which I now suffer in having to treat of measures of an opposite nature in regard to a part of her Majesty's dominions, in which the horrors and misfortunes of civil war are now prevailing, and to ask the House to suspend, though only for a time, the constitutional liberties of that portion of the British territories. But, though I feel that I approach the one of these subjects with satisfaction and the other with sorrow, the one is a duty no less incumbent upon me than the other. I feel that I can no longer delay to ask the House for power to maintain the authority of her Majesty in Lower Canada. If it were only on the score of humanity, I feel that, instead of preventing bloodshed, I should be only giving the word for all the horrors of civil war, were I to follow the advice which has been tendered by some, and withdraw the troops of her Maiesty from that part of her dominions. With these feelings, therefore, it is my duty to propose to the House, in the first place, that an address be sent up to the Crown, stating the concern of this House at the revolt and disturbances which exist in Lower Canada, and pledging itself to assist her Majesty in restoring tranquillity in that part of her dominions; and in the next place, to move for leave to bring in a Bill by which, for a certain time, the calling of an assembly in that province, which is now incumbent on the governor for the time being, may be suspended, and, by the means which I shall state to the House, adequate authority be provided to meet the emergency, and to provide for the future government of the province.

In bringing this subject before the House, I think that I shall not obtain its assent unless I refute two propositions which have been confidently put forward. The first of these assertions is, that the course pursued by this country in respect to Lower Canada has been unjust; and the second is, that whatever be the justice of the case, it is expedient to abandon the colony, and make an early separation between it and the mother country. In debating the first of these propositions, it becomes necessary for me, in many respects, to arraign the conduct of the Assembly of Lower Canada. I am sensible, Sir, how invidious a task it may seem to arraign, in this place, the conduct of any other assembly; but I feel that without so doing, in the present instance, I could not make out the case which I wish to establish,—"that in our present breach with the Assembly our conduct has been founded in justice,—that the course which we pursued last year was necessary,—and, further, that we shall be justified now in suspending the constitution of that province."—I say, I shall be obliged to arraign the conduct of the Assembly of Lower Canada; but in what I say, and also in the course of policy which we may have to pursue, I wish that neither Parliament, nor the Government to which I belong, may seem to be chargeable with the vice of intemperance. In an individual, intemperance may be combined with the best feelings and dispositions; but in a government, it is the worst quality it can be guilty of. In a despotic government it becomes tyranny, whilst in that of a free country intemperance, influencing the passions, produces endless confusion, and, finally, the subversion of the constitution. In considering the conduct of the Assembly of Lower Canada, we must look at the nature of the government by which this country first proposed to govern that province. The title of this country to Canada depends upon the treaty of peace of 1763. Soon after that treaty a proclamation was published respecting the mode of government which it was intended to apply to it; but, in point of fact, for some time English courts, pursuing the method, and regulated by the decisions of English courts, held jurisdiction in the province; and, according to a report from General Murray, who succeeded General Wolfe in the government of the province, many hardships and grievances were suffered by the French Canadians in the administration of justice. But, whatever these hardships or grievances might have been, a remedy was applied to them by the Act of 1774. Sir, I apprehend that never was a stronger inclination evinced by any country to act according to the feelings, habits, and prejudices of a dependent colony than in that Act of 1774. By that Act the Roman Catholic religion was established in the province, and the clergy of that persuasion were to continue to receive the tithes and other dues which they had been accustomed to receive; and further, the French laws of property, and indeed in all matters except the criminal law, were to govern the colony.

Now, Sir, with respect to the former of these provisions, it should be borne in mind that it was passed at a time when nothing was less favoured by Parliament than the Roman Catholic religion, as was shown in Ireland, where the severity of the penal laws had been scarcely relaxed. With respect to the laws of property, nothing could be more adverse to the feelings of this country than the old feudal system of tenures which still prevailed in Canada. It had always been one of the greatest efforts made by the Parliament to wipe off what Blackstone calls "the slavery of the feudal tenures." That was at length accomplished, in the reign of Charles II., and the writer whom I have just referred to says, that the benefit thus entailed to the country was not less important than that of the Habeas Corpus Act itself. Sir, those tenures were considered, and I think rightly, of slavish origin. According to Montesquieu, the very terms used in them had a slavish import; for instance, that he who paid cens was a serf, and he who did not was free. Then, in adopting the French law in this respect, the English Parliament was a party to the introduction of a species of law contrary to the genius of the British constitution, and to which all settlers in that colony would naturally feel the strongest objection. But the reason why it was adopted was the same as that for the establishment of the Roman Catholic religion, namely, because it was most congenial to the feelings and habits of the French portion of the inhabitants of that province. Sir, this constitution remained in force till the year 1791. In that year it was proposed to frame a new constitution; and I must say, looking to the debates of that period, and to the enactments of the law itself, with the light which experience affords, I do not think that law was very wisely framed, with a prospect of permanent continuance, or of permanent harmony between the colony and the mother country. Sir, the policy of this country, with regard to her colonies, has been generally one of great lenity. In some colonies, where the population was chiefly British, and the feelings and habits were therefore chiefly British, the British laws and constitution have been introduced, so far as they were applicable in the different state of society in the colony and the mother country; and, according to that constitution, the people have been left to regulate their internal affairs. In other colonies, which were of foreign origin, there has been a power of governor and council more despotic in its nature, without the form of a real constitution; but, at the same time, the inhabitants were always left to enjoy whatever was congenial to their habits or feelings, in the laws of Danish, French, or Dutch origin, or whatever other it might be, under which the colony was originally founded, and by which its concerns had been formerly regulated. Sir, looking back to the past, with the guide of experience, I think that what was proposed by Mr. Fox, at that time, would have given a better prospect of permanent tranquillity than the constitution which was then adopted. Mr. Fox maintained that it was not wise to separate the Upper from the Lower province, but that it would be better to encourage the influx of British settlers in both, and endeavour to introduce, by degrees, British laws, with, as he said, a due weight of aristocracy. It may be doubted whether it would have been proper, at that time, to leave the introduction of British laws to the gradual operation of custom and the influx of British emigrants. I own that it appears to me, that the only wise course would have been, when we were introducing a representative constitution, instead of the more despotic governor and council, at the same time to make a settlement with respect to the English and French laws, adopting only so much of the latter as should prevent the French inhabitants from being disquieted in their possessions; and that, having so done, we should have made arrangements for a Legislative Council and a representative House of Assembly. This, however, was not the course taken in that day; and a law was passed, on the presumption that the French would entirely inhabit one province of Canada, and the English the other; Lower Canada being assigned to the French, and Upper Canada to the English. At the same time was introduced into each province an Assembly, consisting of representatives of the people, at rather a low rate of franchise, and a Legislative Council, partly consisting of members having hereditary titles, and partly of members named for life by the Government. With regard to the latter part of this arrangement, I do not think that it was a just application of the British constitution. With regard to the House of Lords, though every privilege may be liable at times to abuse, yet we all know that there must be some distinction of eminence, or some consideration of large property, to justify a Minister in proposing to the Sovereign to elevate a commoner to the House of Lords. In Lower Canada the case was not the same: the person on whom the distinction was to be conferred was not so easily pointed out, and there was not that great and paramount check upon the exercise of this privilege which exists in this country. With regard to the House of Assembly, also, I think that that constitution was not wisely framed when the state of education in that colony is considered. However wisely or unwisely this constitution was framed, there can be no doubt that it was given with a view — a sincere view — to enlarge the privileges and provide for the welfare of the people of Canada. No one can doubt that it was intended, not to draw any undue influence to this country, but to provide mainly, and in the first instance, for the welfare of the colony itself.

Then, Sir, I think I may say, that neither in the constitution of 1774, nor in that of 1791, was this country an oppressor. I do not wish to state this for the purpose of making a debtor and creditor account between Lower Canada and this country, as relates to benefits mutually given and received — still less for the purpose of imputing ingratitude to the people of that colony. On the contrary, I am happy to say, that whilst the intentions of the Legislature were those of kindness towards Canada, — on two great occasions, namely, in the war with the United States, and towards the conclusion of the last war with France, the Canadians came forward with loyalty and zeal to show their affection for this country; so that if we have been kind on the one hand, we have met with a return of affection and loyalty on the other. But, Sir, as I have already said, I think the constitution then framed contained within itself the seeds of difficulty, though for some time the difficulty was not sensibly felt. In 1810 there was some violence on the part of the Canadians and the House of Assembly, which ended in the dismissal of the Assembly, and left some angry feeling; but the dissensions, upon which much of what has subsequently taken place originated, began in 1818. It had been for some time the practice in Canada to vote certain sums for the maintenance of the government, and whatever further supplies were required were voted by this House. It was then petitioned that all the supplies should be received from the colonial Assembly, and that they should not be dependent in any way upon this country. This petition was at first rejected; but when the Duke of Richmond was there a new mode of voting supplies was adopted, and they were given by what were called chapters. Afterwards, under Lord Dalhousie, a permanent grant was required, which led to great dissension in the Assembly, who maintained that they had the only right to give the supplies, and the votes were given item by item, and only for an annual period. After a time Mr. Huskisson, who was then Colonial Secretary, thought proper to bring the question before Parliament, and caused a select committee to be appointed to consider the question then at issue with the House of Assembly. Before I state what the Report of that committee was, and the result of what was done, I wish to call the attention of the House to the instructions which were given by Sir George Murray, who was subsequently Secretary of State under the Duke of Wellington, before the Report of the committee had been taken into consideration. I wish to quote this in order to show that the policy of the Government of that day was what has been the policy of every Government since; namely, a policy of forbearance and moderation, evincing a constant desire to consult the interests and to meet the wishes of the Lower Canadas as far as possible. Sir George Murray found, according to the opinions of the law officers, that there were some duties imposed by an Act of the Imperial Parliament of 1774, in lieu of certain other more oppressive duties which had existed —before, applicable to the public service of Lower Canada. He accordingly instructed Sir J. Kempt in what manner these duties were to be applied. The following is an extract from Sir George Murray's instructions to Sir James Kempt, 29th Sept., 1828.

> The proceeds of the above-mentioned duties, and of the territorial revenue of the Crown, with the produce of fines, forfeitures, and other incidents of that nature, appear to constitute, however, the only fund which his Majesty's Government can lawfully apply, at its discretion, to the defraying the expenses of the civil government, and those of the administration of justice in the province. It is, therefore, to be understood for the future, as a fixed and unalterable principle, that, with the exception of the funds already mentioned, no part of the revenue of Lower Canada must be applied to the public service, nor to any object whatever, except in pursuance of an Act of appropriation passed by the three branches of the local Legislature. I am by no means insensible to the consequence which must necessarily result from the recognition and the observance of this principle. So long as the Assembly is called upon to provide for and to regulate any portion of the public expenditure, it will virtually acquire a control over the whole. If the entire charge of the civil government of the province could be limited to the amount of the crown revenues, it might be possible to act without any dependence on the Assembly. But whether such a result would be desirable, or would be really conducive to the welfare of the province at large, it is unnecessary for me to inquire. It is sufficient to say that, under the existing law, the Executive Government of Lower Canada cannot be relieved from a state of virtual pecuniary dependence upon the Assembly, by any constitutional means; and methods of a different nature must not be resorted to.

This instruction clearly shows that Sir George Murray meant to bind himself, and the Government to which he belonged, to a precise and exact observance of the constitution. I next come to call the attention of the House to the course adopted by the committee of 1828. This committee made a Report containing many valuable suggestions, and which was spoken of, in an address of the House of Assembly of the 21st of November, 1828, in the following terms: —

> As soon as the inhabitants of Lower Canada made known to the King the sufferings of the country, and suggested the remedy for those evils — as soon as their humble petitions were laid at the foot of the throne, the Sovereign, ever inclined towards constantly faithful subjects, positively ordered that those petitions should be forthwith submitted to the supreme tribunal of of the empire. The charges and well-founded complaints of the Canadians, before that august senate, were referred to a committee of the House of Commons, indicated by the Colonial Minister; that committee exhibiting a striking combination of talent and patriotism, uniting a general knowledge of public and constitutional law, to a particular acquaintance with the state of both the Canadas, formally applauded almost all the reforms which the Canadian people and their representatives demanded, and still fervently demand. After solemn investigation, after deep and prolonged deliberation, the committee made a Report — an imperishable monument of their justice and profound wisdom — an authentic testimonial of the reality of our grievances, and of the justice of your complaints, faithfully interpreting our wishes and our wants.

One would have supposed, when the House of Assembly of Lower Canada spoke of a Report of a committee of this House as "an imperishable monument of justice and profound wisdom," that if the Government of this country were to apply itself anxiously to do all that was recommended in it, some degree of satisfaction would have been expressed towards it by that Assembly. So far from this being the case, however, after an attempt was made to comply with every one of the recommendations of that committee, and to remedy every grievance mentioned in it, the complaints of the Assembly were made in a louder tone and a bitterer form. If any one wishes to go through the various particulars of the occasions on which the Government has attempted to comply with the recommendations of this committee, I will refer him to the very clear minutes drawn up by Lord Aberdeen, and intended for the guidance of Lord Amherst in the government of this colony. It had been stated by the committee that the revenues under the Act of 1774, ought to be given up to the Assembly, but at the same time that the judges should have their salaries for life, and not by an annual vote. In this recommendation there was much good sense; and there arose one circumstance which, perhaps, will scarcely gain credit in this House. A certain judge having, some years before, expressed an opinion which was not approved of by the Assembly, the House of Assembly thought proper to refuse his salary. I will read an extract from the resolutions adopted by the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, Dec. 6., 1828: —

> Resolved, — That on the permanent settlement before mentioned being effected with the consent of this House, it will be expedient to render the governor, lieutenant-governor, or person administering the government for the time being, the judges, or executive councillors, independent of the annual vote of this House, to the extent of their present salaries.

Resolved, — That amongst those questions not particularly mentioued on the present occasion, this House holds, as most desirable to be admitted, and most essential to the future peace, welfare, and good government of the province, viz., the independence of the judges, and their removal from the political business of the province; the responsibility and accountability of public officers; a greater independence of support from the public revenues, and more intimate connection with the interest of the colony in the composition of the Legislative Council; the application of the late property of the Jesuits to the purposes of general education; the removal of all obstructions to the settlement of the country, particularly by crown and clergy reserves remaining unoccupied in the neighbourhood of Rood and Settlewaite, and exempt from the common burdens; and a diligent inquiry into, and a ready redress of, all grievances and abuses which may be found to exist, or which may have been petitioned against by the subjects in this province, thereby assuring to all, the invaluable benefit of an impartial, conciliatory, and constitutional government, and restoring a well-founded and reciprocal confidence between the governor and the governed.

Now, Sir, I will state what has been done in respect to these grievances. With respect to the independence of the judges, Lord Goderich fully concurred in the reasonableness of this recommendation, and suggested a measure for the consideration of the Assembly. But what was the conduct of the Assembly? Instead of following out their own recommendation, they passed a Bill in accordance with it, but tacked to it some other provisions relating to the civil government, and for the appointment of a court for the impeachment of judges. This manner of treating a recommendation of this nature was such as might lead to a grave suspicion that the object which they had in view was not what they asked. The recommendation for a Bill for the independence of the judges was itself a good position, but the tacking to it of other provisions which could not be agreed to, was, in my opinion, a proof that they did not wish to get rid of the grievance of which they complained. Sir, I know that in former times, when the Crown asked from Parliament other provisions than had been formally made, other provisions were included in a Bill; but I own I never heard that when a Bill wholly for the benefit of the subject was proposed, it was ever clogged with provisions which would make it wholly impracticable.

The next demand, Sir, is for the responsibility of the public officers, and a more intimate connection with the colonies of those persons composing the Legislative Council. Now, with regard to that subject, on which, unfortunately, there has been a wide difference of opinion between the Assembly of Lower Canada and this country, there was no objection, no opposition, to a compliance with the terms of that resolution of the Assembly. It was determined at once that the judges ought not to sit, with the exception of the chief justice, in the Legislative Council. A number of persons were added totally independent of the Crown, having no connection with office, and giving, on the whole, a great majority to those in the Council who were altogether unconnected with office. There was likewise an attempt made to introduce — which I always thought proper to be done — a greater proportion of French Canadians into the Council, by far the majority of new members of the Council being French Canadians. The Assembly might yet have said that these were persons not agreeable to their wishes or possessing their confidence. But the question is, whether they were not independent of office, and selected in connection with the interests of the colony. If other persons could be found, who, from their circumstances in the colony, and their independent position, deserved to be placed in the Legislative Council, that was a matter of arrangement and compromise, and not such as that the tranquillity of the colony should be disturbed with respect to it. Sir, I believe, as the matter stands at present, according to the last determination of Lord Gosford, approved by her Majesty's Government, there are forty members of the Council, of whom no less than eighteen are French Canadians, of whom many of those who are of English extraction are not likely to attend, being removed from the colony, and thus giving a majority on the total number of forty to the French Canadians, and of whom seven only hold any official connection with the government of the province. I say, therefore, that so far as the demands made in the year 1828 on this point went,—so far as the proposition then made set forth the nature and extent of the grievance complained of,—a remedy in both respects was willingly applied. Another question arose as to the application of the property lately possessed by the Jesuits to the purposes of general education. This demand was so far assented to that the whole of the property was applied to the purposes of education. The only grievance that now remained, and to which a subsequent resolution applied, was, that leases of the property were given to one person when there were other persons desirous of obtaining them. To that grievance — unless we were to say that the whole administration of this property should be intrusted to the friends and nominees of the Assembly — it would be quite impossible to give a further remedy. Another question related to the removal of all obstructions to the possession of crown and clergy reserves. Now, on this subject I will refer the House to a despatch of Lord Ripon, which I think does the highest honour to the wisdom of that nobleman, in which he says that he is ready to put an end to the former system, while, at the same time, he states that he is not ready to adopt the remedy proposed by the House of Assembly. The Noble Lord further states it to be his opinion that none of the particular lands alluded to, nor any lands in the possession of the Crown, should be given except for an adequate consideration, and points out that they should be sold at a fair price without any distinction being made or favour shown. The Assembly particularly adverted to the management of the waste lands, in consequence of which, they declared, applicants were excluded from competition, and prevented from holding the land by secure titles without much expense and delay. Lord Ripon says, "I must dissent from the view here taken by the Assembly, and must say, that a careful consideration of the subject induces me to think that the prevention in some degree of the extreme facility of buying land, instead of being injurious to the occupants of the crown lands, would be found favourable to their success, no less than to the welfare and prosperity of the province at large." Having stated this, he goes on to say, "I am of opinion that an end should be put to the system of setting apart any portion of waste lands to the support of the Protestant clergy, since a system which would be objectionable in rendering the Government independent of the Assembly would be still more objectionable when applied for the support of the ministers of religion." Lord Ripon adds, that in order to guard the governor against the slightest suspicion of partiality in the disposal of the lands, the utmost freedom of bidding should be encouraged, the greatest publicity given to the sales, and the lands, as a matter of course, secured to the highest bidder.

Now, Sir, I ask whether that proposition of Lord Ripon was not one more calculated to benefit the province, more fair in itself, less liable to any suspicion of partiality, and less open to the charge that Government might hereafter derive influence from the disposal of those lands, than that which the Assembly itself had made; and whether, for this grievance, a full and adequate remedy has not been proposed? Sir, there was another grievance, as I before stated, or rather another dispute. It was the dispute with respect to the duties derived under the Act of the 14th of George III. With regard to those duties it was urged, and no doubt rightfully urged, by those who then held the government of this country, that that law bound the Treasury abroad to appropriate the sum derived from those duties. It was urged, on the other side, though the argument proceeded rather by inference on the spirit of the constitution than on the letter of the law, that the Acts of 1778 and 1791, taken together, made it fit that the appropriation of these duties should be left to the Colonial Assembly. A committee recommended that the suggestion of the Assembly should be adopted, but recommended, likewise, that a permanent settlement should be reserved for the salaries of the judges and other officers. The Assembly, while it agreed to be responsible for what it had itself proposed, did not consent to carry the whole recommendations into effect. But what then was the conduct of the Government of this country? There was introduced into this House, in the year 1831, an Act, introduced by Lord Ripon in the other House of Parliament, which entirely repealed the power of appropriation by this country, and left it to the Assembly of Lower Canada (without condition, without stipulation) to dispose altogether of those duties. Now, I ask, could any remedy be more full — less hesitating? Could there be any remedy which showed a more generous confidence than that with which Lord Ripon proposed to meet the grievance that was submitted? It has been urged, certainly, and it may be contended, that the Government of that day went too far in making that concession. It may be said that this was an incautious assent to the demand of the Assembly. I am not of that opinion. I think, if Lord Ripon had made such a stipulation as that intimated, he would have been keeping up a cause of quarrel not sanctioned by the opinion of the mother country, and on a ground on which it was not safe to stand.

These questions of revenue, as stated in contradistinction to the House of Assembly, are most difficult questions to maintain; but when it was a question of duties, and of duties similar to those of which the Assembly had had the control, there were, no doubt, great arguments drawn from analogy in favour of other claims which had been urged. Well, then, if we had made it a condition that the revenue should be given up unconditionally, I think that we should have excited a quarrel with the Assembly on a point not sanctioned by the approval of this country, and one upon which it was still less likely that the other provinces of North America would have agreed with the Government of the mother country, and sympathised with the demand of the rights which she sought to exercise. For this reason, Sir, I think that the course which was taken by Lord Ripon embraced a wise as well as a generous proposal; but at the same time I am of opinion that it might have been expected that, after having made that concession, after having remedied whatever grievances were complained of, in the full manner which was proposed by the course to be taken by the Government, a disposition would be shown by the Assembly of Lower Canada to meet what had been done with a conciliatory disposition, and to consider the remaining grievances in a friendly and amicable spirit. I regret to say that this was not the case. In the year 1833, at the time that these questions had been either settled, or proposed to be settled, conformably to the wishes of the Assembly, a supply Bill passed that House of Assembly, containing the most unusual conditions, and providing that the persons holding certain offices should not be allowed salaries unless they ceased to hold certain other offices. Sir, these propositions may have been in themselves just or unjust, reasonable or unreasonable; but the Bill was rejected on the ground—which the Noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), who was then Secretary of the Colonies, approved — that these propositions were tacked to a money Bill, which, therefore, as a matter of supply, could not be passed in that shape. I think the Noble Lord was right in urging that these questions should have been proposed in a different shape. But, Sir, the supply Bill having failed in that year, in 1834 the Assembly met again, and adopted a new course, which has led to the present difficulties. I say that it adopted a new course, which led to the present difficulties, because, with respect to all that had been before stated — with respect to the investigation of the committee of the year 1828, which furnished the Report that was described as "an imperishable monument of wisdom and justice" — and with respect to their own statements in the reports and petitions of their Assembly, every grievance had been met, fairly considered, and adequately removed. Well then, Sir, what was the result — contentment, satisfaction in voting the supplies, and a more harmonious working of the Canadian constitution? Quite the reverse. The course taken was, that the Canadian Assembly passed ninety-two resolutions, some of grievance, some of eulogy, some of vituperation; some directed against individuals, some against the governor of the province, some against the Government at home; but all amounting to a long and vehement remonstrance, which they passed their whole session in framing, and they separated without passing any supply Bill whatever. This was the point of departure taken by those who caused a new breach in the proceedings of the Assembly. Those who on former occasions appeared before us as the able interpreters of their wants and wishes, at this time deserted the prosecution of their grievances. They comprised men whose names are known to this House, who have been most familiar with the history of Canadian affairs, and who had been the most able and intelligent in laying before the Legislature their grievances, and in many cases urging just grounds for redress — these men, when they saw that the object was to put a stop to the machine of government, and to make impracticable conditions, at once withdrew from the contest, and separated themselves from the violent party who took part in it. And on this occasion let me call the attention of the House to the benefit which is to be derived by giving a remedy to every real grievance.

There are some, prompted either by national pride or by a mistaken sense of honour, who say, "This petition is couched in unseemly or disrespectful language;" or, "This petition is pushed too far, and let us not, therefore, listen to it." Sir, it is the duty of this House, and of those who have the administration of public affairs in this country, to examine every real grievance, and to remedy it; and then you may be sure that, although there may be factious persons who may for a time lead the people astray, those who are sincere and honest in their complaints, those who seek not individual aggrandisement, but have the welfare of their country at heart, having obtained these, will support the Government in resistance to ulterior demands. Thus, by every remedy which you have applied, you gain additional strength in the new contest which is about to commence. Such, I believe, will be the effect, and such, we have already seen, has been the effect in the unfortunate contest of the present hour. But to return to the events which I feel it to be my duty to lay before the House, more especially as the whole case has never yet been submitted to its consideration. After the passing of these resolutions in the year 1834, there has been no occasion whatever on which the Assembly has voted the supplies to carry on the government. Yet, Sir, the Government of this country was not weary of endeavouring to remove all real grievances. At the end of the year 1834, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Sir Robert Peel) became Prime Minister of this country. That he did not intend to adopt any harsh course with respect to the Canadian Assembly may be concluded, not only from his language in this House, but from the appointments which he made. One of the appointments made under his Government was that of Lord Amherst, who was sent out not only as a governor, but as an officer enabled to investigate and redress all grievances affecting the administration of the province. Sir, the character of Lord Amherst himself,—even if the object of his appointment had not been announced in the Gazette which contained it,—would show that at that time was appointed a person who, by his mild and conciliatary character, would remove every thing which he might find really affecting the interests or to injure the welfare of the Canadians. Sir, on the retirement of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite from office, and the resignation by Lord Amherst of the post to which he had been appointed, the Government of Lord Melbourne, which succeeded, proposed to send a commission to Canada for inquiry into the grievances which had been alleged, giving them great latitude, as may seen by the instructions with which they were furnished, and appointed Lord Gosford as governor, with certain directions for his guidance. I shall take the liberty to quote the instructions which were thus given, because they show the spirit in which the Government thought that the affairs of Canada should be managed, and because I think they constitute an answer to some charges which have been made with respect to the government of the colonies in general. Lord Glenelg said, in his despatch to Lord Gosford, dated July 17., 1835:—

> It may, not, however, be improper to address to your Lordship one caution of a different nature. Whatever may be the ground of the disputes which have so long prevailed between the Executive Government and the House of General Assembly of the province, it could not, with any degree of truth, or even of plausibility, be alleged, that they have either originated, or have been prolonged, with a view to any interests, real or imaginary, excepting those of the people of Canada themselves. No motive could possibly be assigned as influencing British policy towards this part of his Majesty's dominions, except the advancement of the social welfare of the inhabitants, and the development of the resources of the country. In promoting these great ends, the King has found an object worthy of the noblest ambition and of the most earnest solicitude. Even if the counsels submitted to his Majesty for the government of Lower Canada were admitted to be as injudicious as they have been sometimes described to be; yet, even on that supposition, the singleness and disinterestedness of the motives by which his Majesty's confidential advisers have been actuated would be beyond dispute. What has Great Britain to gain by the misgovernment of so important a portion of the British empire? There is no single ground of national competition which could induce the metropolitan state to abuse her authority, or which should make that authority a subject of reasonable distrust to the Canadian people, if it could, with any justice, be supposed that those who are honoured with a place in his Majesty's more immediate counsels could be diverted by the sordid desire of patronage from the upright discharge of duties so clear and important as those which they owe to British North America. Yet it is demonstrable that so unworthy a motive has not exercised the slightest influence on their deliberations. I do not find, for many years past, a solitary example of any place, excepting that of the governor himself, and one or two of the chief officers of customs, having been conferred, in Lower Canada, on any person, except the settled inhabitants of the province, or in consequence of any recommendation but that of the governor. No British minister, during the present or the last reign, has ever used the patronage of British North America, either to promote his political power, or the personal advantage of himself or his connections. I need scarcely add, that his Majesty is firmly resolved to enforce the observance in future of the same just and liberal policy.

Sir, I believe it is impossible to deny the truth of the allegations made by the Noble Lord who is now Secretary for the Colonies. I believe it to be impossible, too, to deny that Lord Gosford, in undertaking the charge which he did, entertained an anxious desire to second the Government in their attempts to allay animosity, to remedy the grievances which were found to exist, and to establish harmony between the different parts of the Legislature of that province. I stated, last year, the various recommendations which were made by the commissioners, on the subjects which were proposed for their consideration. I am sorry to say that these recommendations were not even waited for by the Canadian Assembly. That Assembly thought proper to continue in the resolution which they had adopted, of determinedly refusing the supplies. They adhered to this course during the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, except on one occasion of a vote for six months, and that was given in so objectionable a manner that it could not be sanctioned. Their resolution, then, has been to put an end to the machinery of government, to stop entirely the possibility of carrying on the government; and thus have they made it necessary for this House to interpose with respect to the important questions which are submitted to it. I have stated, on a former occasion, that the course adopted by this House, in proposing to appropriate part of the revenues of Lower Canada, was not a measure of finance, but of defence. I adhere to that statement. In a constitutional government it is quite impossible, if the supplies be refused year after year, that the machinery of government can go on. If they were refused in this country, even for a single year, the most calamitous consequences would be produced. To refuse the supplies, is to disorganise the army; to refuse the supplies is to shake public credit; to refuse the supplies is almost to dissolve the constitution. Well, then, what was to be done on the refusal of the supplies by a provincial Parliament? There could be, in such a case, but one of two courses left to adopt; either to accede to all the demands, or to take some means by which the mischief might be remedied. It is quite impossible that the courts of justice, and all the other means by which the civil government is carried on, should be brought continually to a stop, in consequence of the refusal of the Legislature to vote the supplies. It, therefore, becomes necessary that one remedy or the other should be applied. Sir, I have already stated to the House, that as to the former alternative, it was impossible to adopt it. With regard to an elective council, the Report of the commissioners sent out by this country gives it as their belief, without discussing the abstract question of an elective council,—still less the policy or impolicy of its establishment in the North American continent, — that the consequence of such a change in the Legislature of Lower Canada would be to place the government in the hands of one of two extreme parties, and that from the resistance of the other party must arise the additional danger of a civil war. I fully believe the truth of the statement of the commissioners. I am persuaded that, after the dissensions which have prevailed, an elective council, representing the passions, the violence, and the desire for extraordinary changes found to exist in the Assembly, would be considered by the British settlers of the province as nothing else but a declaration that their interests would not be protected, and they would be thus driven to some other means to produce a change in the constitution.

Their next demand is, that the Executive Council should only be responsible to the House of Assembly. Sir, I stated, on a former occasion, that there was one place in which the power of the Executive could be thus entirely controlled, and that was at the seat of the Imperial Government. If the Sovereign of this country were to select those who had the confidence of the Crown, but who possessed none of the confidence of the House of Commons, there must be a speedy change in the Administration; and the constitution could only proceed in consequence of that change. But, in a colony, if the Legislative Council are to be named according to the will of the Assembly, there is another question which arises, namely, what is to become of the orders given by the Imperial Government to the governor of the colony? Are they to be placed in abeyance? Is he to be held responsible only to the Assembly, and to dismiss or drive away from the colony British troops, and to admit the ships of a power, perhaps at war with this country, into the ports of Canada? If the House of Assembly have not the power to make such restrictions, the Government must be made responsible to the Imperial Legislature. If they have it, then they are a supreme and independent nation, and a governor from this country has no place in that colony. Not only should there be, in that case, a responsible Executive, but every judge and public officer should be appointed, not according to the laws of the constitution, or the rule of the Imperial Monarchy of the mother country, but in accordance with the institutions and usages of that new and independent republic.

Another question in these proceedings was, whether a repeal should be granted of an Act passed by this country with respect to land in Canada, under which certain rights had accrued. Your commissioners said, and most justly, that it was impossible to take these away without doing an act of flagrant injustice to rights and titles granted under the sanction of an Act of Parliament. Another subject, on which we declared we had no objection to enter, was with respect to the Tenures Act. We stated, that we had no objection to any alteration that might be proposed in that Act, provided the rights, which could not be set aside without injustice, were justly and duly maintained and preserved. As we were obliged to declare that we could not, consistently with our duty to the mother country, and with the interests of our fellow-countrymen in Canada, concede these demands of the House of Assembly; and, as they had declared repeatedly that these were the only conditions on which they would consent to carry on the ordinary business of the constitution; I say, by their own act, and without any interference of the Imperial Power, the constitution was ipso facto suspended by themselves. Therefore we proposed, in that difficulty, —in that extremity, —when this House could not agree to the propositions of the Assembly, that some measure should be taken to remedy this extraordinary embarrassment, and that some measures should be adopted by which the judges and others, holding official situations, should receive what otherwise would have been voted, for the payment of their salaries, by the Assembly, and that the governor should have the power to appropriate these sums. Sir, I do not think that we went at all beyond the necessity of the case. At the same time, it was evident that the House of Assembly of Canada must either continue to suspend the constitution altogether, or must reconsider the grounds of their complaints. They had repeatedly declared that their misgovernment was owing to the Colonial Secretary of State, or to the Executive Government of this country, and that they relied on the wisdom of Parliament to remedy their grievances. On receiving, however, the resolutions which were passed by the British Parliament, they did not take the peaceful part of the alternative. They did not agree to look to other methods for the redress of the grievances of which they complained. Be it remembered, that when we said we could not agree to their demands, I stated expressly, myself, that if any mode of arranging the differences which at that period existed, could be pointed out otherwise than by the appointment of an elective council, we should be ready to undertake the consideration of it, and if possible to adopt it. I proposed, myself, certain mitigations as to the manner of appointment in future. Instead of having persons chosen by the governor, unknown to the inhabitants (a matter which has been frequently complained of), it was determined that the Executive Council should send their opinion with respect to the fitness of the persons intended to be appointed. When Mr. Roebuck, formerly a Member of this House, proposed that the Legislative Council should be abolished, I did not at once say that the proposition was inadmissible; but I wished to know whether the Assembly of the province proposed any remedy for that of which they had themselves complained? I did not propose the remedy which was suggested. I was not disposed to think it was well considered; but I felt that the course which was to be taken should not be one, in the face of the repeated resolutions of the Assembly, — declaring that the Imperial Parliament could not otherwise act for their benefit than by repealing all those Acts which they had described as inimical to their welfare. I could not, therefore, suppose that that proposition, which was entirely new, and at variance with all that had been suggested by the members of the Legislative Assembly themselves, would have been acceptable to the colonists. But what was the answer of the Assembly, in their meeting of August, 1837, to the resolutions of the House of Commons? Their answer was, that they would not suggest anything, — that they would not propose anything; but if the Government of England should think proper to propose certain modifications in the Legislative Council, they would endeavour to determine whether, for a time, the government of the colony could be carried on beneficially by such means. What was the meaning of this? After the repeated evasions which had been resorted to by the House of Assembly, it is evident, by this last proposition, that if we had introduced a plan for effecting any such change in the elective council, the House of Assembly would have said, "We rejoice that we have got rid of the Legislative Council, as an obstacle to our desires; but you have not fulfilled the whole conditions on which we rest our case, and we must insist, still, upon an elective council as the only means by which future harmony can be established." Is it not obvious that such would have been the answer? Is it not clear, from the spirit in which the controversy has been conducted, that this would have been the reply of the Canadians in answer to concessions volunteered by the Government? In August, 1837, therefore, the Assembly, having met, refused altogether to comply with the request of the Governor to grant the supplies, and persisted in their former demands, with the trifling admission that there might be a possibility of going on for a time. They were accordingly prorogued without granting any supplies.

Now, Sir, with respect to all that has happened since the events of which I have been speaking, as there is a sufficiently succinct narration to be deduced from the papers which have been laid before the House—I do not, therefore, mean to refer to the despatches that have passed between Lords Gosford and Glenelg in any particular or detailed manner;—contenting myself, as those despatches are already in the hands of Honourable Members, with a simple reference to their most prominent features. It appears that soon after the reception of the resolutions of which I have just spoken, meetings were held in Canada, at which these resolutions were violently arraigned, the government of the colonies held up to odium and scorn, and at which, not unfrequently, the example of the United States of America was invoked as the one it behoved the Canadians to follow. Still it seemed, by repeated despatches from Lord Gosford, that he did not consider these demonstrations of much importance; and even in his later communications, he has more than once said that he thought the system of agitation had failed in producing the effect which was desired by its abettors; that a better spirit was beginning to prevail, and that many, who were but a little time previously favourably disposed to the alleged objects of the movement party, had lately expressed themselves as better inclined to the Government of the mother country. But, Sir, it appears that after the meetings I have described had gone on for a considerable time, others began to be held, which were certainly of a more formidable character. Lord Gosford's attention having been called to their existence, and to the propositions discussed before them, he conceived it to be his duty to dismiss from the militia certain officers who had taken part at these violent, and I will say, seditious assemblies. Upon this the people met, and after most violently impugning the conduct and motives of the governor for their dismissal, they proceeded to elect officers for themselves; and passed resolutions pledging themselves not to submit any case of theirs to a magistrate holding authority under her Majesty, and concluded by declaring themselves ready to act in any manner they should be required under certain "pacificators" appointed by themselves, these being the officers of the militia who had been dismissed by Lord Gosford. It was obvious from the very selection of these officers, and from the people proceeding to obey their commands, that the intention was to throw off all allegiance to the mother country. But, unfortunately, matters did not stop here. These seditious assemblies continued to be held; and, goaded on by the inflammatory declamation of the orators, the mob proceeded, in many instances, to acts of personal violence against all who refused to obey the mandates of these illegal meetings. Parties went round at night threatening with destruction all who refused to join the ranks of the disaffected; in many instances houses and property were destroyed, and the extreme vengeance of an infuriated rabble was held out to menace those officers of the militia who had not been dismissed by the governor and evinced an inclination to perform their duties with loyalty and fidelity. On the 2d of September, Lord Gosford, in a despatch to Lord Glenelg, says:—

> It is evident that the Papineau faction are not to be satisfied with any concession that does not place them in a more favourable position to carry into effect their ulterior objects, namely, the separation of this country from England, and the establishment of a republican form of government. M. Papineau has gone such lengths, that he must now persevere in the course he has taken, or submit to a defeat, which would annihilate all his power and influence. The plan he pursues clearly shows that he is determined to do all that he can to obtain his ends. The violent and unjustifiable attacks which have been made by the ultra Tory party upon the French Canadians generally, have caused an animosity which M. Papineau does not fail to turn to acccount, and I attribute much of his influence over so many Members in the Assembly to this cause. M. Papineau has emissaries in various directions; and though I do not conceive there is any ground for alarm, still great caution and vigilance are required to guard against the evils that might follow from the attempts making to excite discontent among the people by the most abominable misrepresentations. The executive requires more power, and under my present impression, I am disposed to think that you may be under the necessity of suspending the constitution. It is with feelings of deep regret I state this, but duty compels me to communicate it to you.

On the 8th of September he again writes,—

> We can now make no terms with Mr. Papineau; you must either put him down, or submit to let him put you down; there is no halting between two opinions. By at once increasing the power of the executive, and suspending the constitution, you at once paralyse the designs of these mischievous men. It would establish confidence in the minds of those disposed to peace and good government, and, at no distant period, you might be solicited to restore the constitution to the province, under arrangements better calculated to afford satisfaction, than could be accomplished by any effort or proposal in the present state of things; for, until you nullify Papineau's power, you can never be in a position to treat on anything like fair and liberal terms, with a man of his extravagant, uncompromising, destructive views, exercising, as he does, complete > control over the minds of many who have been too long accustomed to be under his yoke.

Notwithstanding the positive tenour of this despatch, I find that on the 9th of September Lord Gosford wrote to say that he did not believe the disaffection to be wide spread. He observes in this despatch —

> That this state of affairs seriously augments the difficulties of carrying on the government and operates most injuriously upon the welfare and prosperity of the province, muss be quite obvious. With the exception of some of the counties in the district of Montreal, I believe the mass of the population is contented and loyal, and that the attempts that are making to shake its allegiance and to create confusion will be unsuccessful.

At a further period, however, there did occur a collision in the streets of Montreal between two parties, the one calling themselves the followers of M. Papineau, and the others adherents to the constituted government, under the designation of the Doric Club. This was very soon after followed by information of so alarming a tendency, that the governor of the province conceived it to be his duty to send the Attorney General to Montreal to collect all possible information upon the subject, and to write to Sir John Colborne to ascertain what might be his means of putting down any disturbance that might arise. It appears that the Attorney General very soon obtained what he conceived sufficient evidence of secret and unlawful organisation; and in consequence he determined on putting on trial, for what was termed high treason, several of the leaders in these disturbances in the Montreal district, and the requisite orders for their immediate arrest were issued. Accordingly a troop of mounted police and volunteer cavalry were sent out upon this service. They seized the individuals who were so charged, but were subsequently obliged to relinquish their prisoners, and came back without having accomplished their purpose. It appears that afterwards, when Sir John Colborne, in the exercise of his duty, sent out troops to obtain possession of the guilty parties, an armed rebel force was found prepared, in the villages of St. Denis and St. Charles, to resist the Queen's troops, and then an open insurrection broke out. I imagine, Sir, that when matters came to this point, there could be no doubt on the mind of any man loyally disposed as to the object really sought: no man so disposed would deny—indeed, I hope, no man so disposed would attempt to deny—that it was the duty of the governor of the province in which these acts of insubordination and rebellion took place, to take every means his position afforded him to restore tranquillity and protect the well-disposed of her Majesty's subjects. Fortunately, Sir, most fortunately, the person who is intrusted with the military command of the troops in Canada is one intimately acquainted with the country in which he has to act, and endowed with all the vigour of intellect and firmness of purpose requisite for his highly important station. Sir John Colborne immediately adopted the steps the occasion required; and, Sir, as far as we have been able to learn, up to the present moment he has been successful; the result of his measures has been the defeat of those who were in arms against the troops of her Majesty, and the restoration of tranquillity at least for the present, to a great portion of the disturbed district. So far, therefore — although in common with all I must lament that civil war should prevail in any part of her Majesty's dominions — I think we have all common cause of congratulation; I think, Sir, there can be but few — I think there can be but very few — to whom it can be a matter but of great satisfaction that her Majesty's troops have been successful in the performance of the service they where legally and constitutionally employed upon. I do trust, Sir, that, in the course of this or any subsequent debate on this subject, we shall hear no more of those inconceivable wishes, of those guilty hopes, that the armies of her Majesty may encounter defeat, and the British flag be covered with dishonour!

I do trust, Sir, and I do believe, that if such a feeling exists at all — and the balance of my opinion, I am bound to say, is against its existence — it is confined to a very limited portion — I will not say of this House, but of the whole population of the empire. This, at least, is clear, that with respect to other portions of our North American colonies, with respect to Upper Canada — although a base traitor of the name of M'Kenzie has attempted to disturb that province — that in Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, the feeling, altogether worthy as it is of the British origin of the inhabitants of those colonies — I may say the universal feeling—has been one of loyalty to the British Government, and attachment to the connection with the mother country.

Sir, we have seen that not only have the regular authorities connected with the Government of Lower Canada exerted their faculties to the utmost to suppress these unfortunate disturbances,—not only has Sir J. Colborne acted with a promptitude worthy of his character, but even in the disturbed province, as well as in others, meetings have been held, and volunteers have come forward, to exhibit the depth and sincerity of their attachment to the constitutional government, and the desire for the continuance of the connection between the provinces and the mother country; and, Sir, while upon this subject, let me state, I was asked, at the commencement of this Session, whether the Government had not received intelligence of an increased amount of desertion among the British troops employed in Canada? At the time this question was asked, I was not aware how the fact was, and I answered accordingly; but I am most happy in now being able to state that, upon inquiry, I find desertion among the troops in Canada, so far from having been on the increase, has, during the past year, considerably diminished in amount. I will not deny, nor is it to be wondered at, that British soldiers in that province should feel sensible of the temptation of independence, high wages, and plentiful living, held out to them as the consequences of leaving their regiments. But my belief is, that those soldiers who have yielded to these temptations and abandoned their posts have done so, not from any desire to embarrass the Government, but under the conviction that their places would be filled up by new recruits. The Honourable Gentleman who asked me the question may, perhaps, be surprised that, with the addition to his ordinary duties, the prospect of a civil war, a winter campaign in Canada, and the very severe hardships to which, under these circumstances, he must be subjected, —these should not increase the desire to desert on the part of the British soldier; but when I tell him that my supposition, the reverse of his, is based on these very circumstances, I think his surprise will be increased. My impression is, that the British soldier in Canada, as elsewhere, when the question is, whether he shall remain in the discharge of his duty, to become actively engaged in the maintenance of that allegiance to which he has sworn, — the honour of that country to which he is attached, — liable to all the hardships to which he may be exposed — will only be the more induced to remain; not only will he not hesitate as to the course which it will be proper for him to pursue, but, defying all these hardships, in such circumstances of danger, he will be found true to his sovereign Queen and to the country from which he has sprung. I state this as my sincere conviction. I know not what may be the impression entertained by the Honourable Member for Westminster; but the opinion which I have stated to the House I believe to be the general one upon the subject.

I have now, Sir, stated the course which has been pursued by the British Government from the commencement of our connection with Lower Canada to the present time. I think, Sir, I have sufficiently shown that there is no just ground for reproaching her Majesty's Ministers with tyranny or oppression, with corrupt or sinister ends in their government of that colony. I come now to a question which has been argued in a very different temper — in a temper and a manner for which I must offer my meed of praise to the Honourable Gentlemen who have taken part in it. The question is, whether it is for our interest, setting apart all consideration of the justice of our cause, to abandon Lower Canada altogether, and separate that colony from the British Crown? Now, I will reply at once, that I, for one, cannot bring my mind to that conclusion. I say, at once, that those motives to which I have referred, of attachment upon the part of a considerable portion of the population of Lower Canada to the British Crown, and the situation to which they would be reduced if this country were to abandon them, — these considerations, alone, form a sufficient reason to induce me to answer "No!" to such a proposition. I ask the House, would they be ready to desert the men who are now so nobly evincing their loyalty — would they leave them exposed to the angry passions of a hostile and excited people — to leave them open to the plunder that would be inevitable on a separation? And if they would, I then ask them, could they do so consistently with justice, and with the maintenance of the high character of the British nation? But, if the reasons I have mentioned were insufficient, there are still other considerations which should induce the Government to oppose any project of abandonment. If we were to acquiesce in such a proposition, the Upper province would, doubtless, place themselves under the protection, and become part, of the United States; and, in my opinion, they would have good reason for doing so. Then, supposing the St. Lawrence under the command of the United States, and a Canadian republic established at Quebec, does any one believe that the other provinces, the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, could be retained without a contest? Should we not, at a very early period, have to undergo a contest in which the question would be, whether we should regain Lower Canada, or abandon North America altogether? I am not prepared for such an alternative. I do believe that the possession of our colonies tends, on the one hand, to the wellbeing of the colonies themselves, and, on the other, it augments the power of the British empire. On the preservation of our colonies depends, in a very great degree, the continuance of our commercial marine, and on our commercial marine mainly depends our naval power, and on our naval power depend the strength and stability of the nation.

It is to these considerations I look more particularly, and not so much to the abstract question of the right of a particular party to declare themselves independent; and I say, Sir, as regards our policy, and in justice to a large number of our fellow-subjects in Lower Canada, that we cannot, with any consistency, abandon Lower Canada. Sir, I have thought it necessary to address the House at this great, I fear too great, length on the subject of our affairs in Canada, because I do think it is most important that Parliament and the country should be put in possession of the whole of our proceedings, with respect to that colony—that the case should not be confined merely to the insurrection at this moment under discussion, but that we should review, and be prepared to argue and discuss, the whole of the question of our former conduct. I say, for my own part, if I thought our conduct was founded in injustice to any party, I should at once be prepared to retreat from it. I say, also, that if I thought it was not to the interest both of the colony itself, as well as of the mother country, that the existing connection between them should be continued, I should then be prepared to consider the question as to what manner an amicable and advantageous separation might be best effected in; but coming, as I do, to a decided conclusion—a positive determination—upon both these questions, I am prepared and now propose to enter into the further question, such being our determination, as to what course we should, under existing circumstances, pursue. No man who admits these premises can doubt that the first duty of the Government, and the House, if it concur with the Government, will be to propose the adoption of sufficient means to put down the insurrection. I am not about to argue the question whether or no the present Government are to blame for not having, at the present moment, a greater military force in Canada? The question which I wish to propose, this evening, to the House is, whether they are prepared to maintain the authority of the Crown in Lower Canada—and not whether her Majesty's Ministers are to blame? I see a Noble Lord opposite who is reported to have said, that Ministers ought to appear at the bar to account for this insurrection having broken out. If that Noble Lord, or any other Honourable Member wishes to raise that question, let him raise it. The Government will then be prepared to meet him. If, at the same time, the Noble Lord considers that there was an inadequate military force in Canada, I would advise him to consider two points—first, whether any authority, civil or military, or any body of persons, last year, held the opinon that the force then in Canada was inadequate and ought to be increased; and secondly, whether that force has, up to the present moment, been found to be inadequate for the suppression of the disturbances? In reference to the first point, we should inquire whether Lord Gosford, Sir John Colborne, or any of the other civil or military authorities of Canada, had given reason to the Government to apprehend that it would not be found sufficient? But, as I have already said, I do not wish now to argue that question. If, at any future time, any Honourable Member shall think fit to bring this question before the House, I shall be prepared to maintain that we, her Majesty's Ministers, are in no way deserving of censure for the course we have adopted. The question for consideration to-night is, what means we ought to adopt with a view to the maintenance of her Majesty's power in the colonies. The question is, as to the means which we are all disposed to concur in. In the first place, it is absolutely necessary that a very sufficient force should be landed upon the banks of the St. Lawrence upon the opening of the navigation in that river during the ensuing spring. For my own part, I have no apprehension as to what may be done in the mean time by these insurgents, who seem to have been led by very few, and to have been abandoned in the hour of need by their original instigators—abandoned, too, by the greater portion, not only of the British, but of the French Canadian population. Of the results, I say, I feel little apprehension. But it is obvious, that when insurrection has once broken out, there will be a temptation, which to many will prove probably irresistible, to shake the British power in that quarter. When I say this, let me not be understood as intimating that there is likelihood of any treaty being violated, or of any relation at present subsisting between Great Britain and the other great Powers of Europe, as well as the United States of America, being broken through in connection with this question. What has been already done upon this subject, by the authority of the United States, points, in my estimation, to a result quite the contrary. But it is also evident that there are, both in Europe and in America, individuals whom the inducement of prospective plunder, held out by these "Sons of Liberty," as they style themselves, in Lower Canada, will prompt to endeavour to obtain possession, by means of the sword, of that property in America which they have vainly sought to secure at home; and it is for this reason, even though circumstances may, in the end, prove that the precaution is unnecessary, that I think it will be quite proper that we should be prepared for action by the next spring, and have in the St. Lawrence, ready for disembarkation, a force sufficient to put down every vestige of the insurrection. But the next question to be considered is, with respect to the civil government.

After what has taken place, it is quite impossible to think of convening the Assembly of Lower Canada, or of asking that body to pass any laws for the government of the province, or to meet the existing state of affairs. Unhappily, some of the most prominent persons in that Assembly are involved in this treasonable conspiracy which has been entered into, whilst among other of its members so much of prejudice and irritation prevails, as to render it totally useless to call them together. No good could be expected from such a step; and, in fact, they have already suspended the constitution, and almost rendered such a proceeding impossible. It remains, therefore, to be considered, what can be done to meet the exigencies of the case, without convening that Assembly, to restore peace to the province, and to put an end to the insurrection which has taken place. The plan I propose in the Bill which I shall presently ask leave to introduce, is, to suspend such parts of the Constitutional Act of 1791, as render the meeting of the Assembly imperative, and to create a council for assisting and advising the Governor during the period that the constitution, as far as relates to the Assembly, may remain so suspended. At that council I propose that there should not be less than five persons, and every measure on which it shall deliberate shall originate with, and be brought forward by, the Governor. I propose that the powers of the Legislature which may be necessary for the government of the province, should be entrusted to that body. I do not, however, propose that they should have the power of changing the constitution of the Assembly, or that by any rule enacted by that Governor and Council, the system of representation in this colony should be altered, or that the connexion with the mother country should be disturbed. Any Acts that may expire, and which it may be necessary to renew, or any new Acts which circumstances may call for, will be provided for by that body.

But while these measures will tend to give greater authority to the Government, and enable them more effectually to restore peace and tranquillity to the province, the question still remains, — what manner of constitution is to be given to Lower Canada? It is, undoubtedly, the intention of her Majesty's Ministers that a free constitution should exist in that colony; and for this purpose I would not limit the authority of the governor, but the authority of the law which he will have to administer. If there be any who think that the present occasion ought to be taken to adopt any other than a free government in Canada, or that the English party should have a concession made to all their wishes, and that the French Canadians should be subjected to a form of government unpalatable to them, or one from which they could not expect full justice, or the due consideration of their interests; — I have only to say, that to such a proposition her Majesty's Government will be no parties. We propose but to do that which we consider the interests both of the mother country and the provinces require. We do not propose to govern Canada in any other way than that which must tend to the welfare of its inhabitants. I am firmly of opinion that the difficulties which have hitherto prevented an adjustment of this question have entirely arisen from the peculiar constitution of the House of Assembly (convened, unfortunately, at the will of one ambitious demagogue) and of a Legislative Council, in the composition of which, by former governors, the interests of the provinces and the characters of the individual men were not sufficiently consulted. I think, therefore, that with respect to the Legislative Council, the mode of representation, and the tenure of lands,—these being the principal questions on which the alleged grievances of the Canadians are based,—a satisfactory adjustment may, in the course of time, be arrived at. I think, however, that it would be most unwise to enter into any details of the measures to be adopted in regard to these questions, because, in the first place, I doubt very much whether we have before us all the elements upon which to form a right decision; and, also, because I know that, in America especially, there is a considerable degree of jealousy felt as to the precise terms of such an adjustment. I think, nevertheless, we have sufficient before us to justify our expressing an opinion that a consummation so much, in every sense, to be desired, is not considered by us either impracticable or even difficult. I shall propose, therefore, that the governor and his council, with a view to this final adjustment, shall have recourse to the opinions of the American authorities themselves, summoning, for that purpose, a kind of board, to consist of twenty persons, of whom ten shall be representatives of the Upper, and ten of the Lower province; and a council composed of three members from each of the present Legislative Councils, thus making, in the whole, a council of twenty-six members. I do not, however, propose —I should not be justified in proposing —that the final settlement of this matter should be left to this body, in conjunction with the Governor. The Imperial Parliament is naturally the supreme legislative authority in the British empire, and I do not think we should, on this occasion,—on this so important and solemn occasion, — depart from the principle so invariably advocated by every great statesman and lawyer, of leaving to it in such matters the supreme control. I therefore propose that the propositions which may emanate from this Assembly, after having been assented and agreed to by the governor, shall be transmitted to this country, and then proposed to Parliament, with a view of making such modifications in the constitution of 1791 as may conduce to the interests of all, and eventually prove the foundation of an harmonious, and, I would add, a free constitution for the people. I do not despond. I say that such a foundation may be laid.

At the same time it is, I think, most important that the person to be sent from this country shall be one whose conduct and character should be beyond exception —that he shall be possessed of all those qualifications that are necessary in order to ensure success in such a matter. He should be conversant, not solely with matters of administration, but with the most important affairs which are from time to time brought before the Parliament of this country. I think he should be conversant also with the affairs of the various states of Europe; and, moreover, that it should not be supposed by his nomination that he was at all adverse to opinions the most liberal, but that he should rather have a leaning to popular feelings and popular rights, than have the smallest tendency to arbitrary power. Having said this much, I know not why I should refrain from stating that her Majesty has been pleased to entrust the conduct of this affair, and these high powers to one whom her advisers think in every respect fitted for the charge, namely, the Earl of Durham; and the Earl of Durham, having accepted the office, will be duly nominated to it.

Such is the outline of our plan; and without going into further detail, I will simply state my conviction, that all the questions in dispute are capable of settlement, and I look with confidence to a final adjustment of them. I will now proceed to say a few words as to what I think are the advantages which are at present enjoyed by the people of Lower Canada, and which would make it most desirable for them to continue their connection with the mother country. It is the general opinion of all persons who are conversant with the subject, that there is no people on the face of the globe who are in a condition of greater comfort and ease, or who enjoy more extensive and peculiar advantages, than the habitans of Lower Canada. Such is their present condition. Let us consider also, that while they are permitted the full enjoyment of those laws which are congenial to their own habits, feelings, and prejudices, they have all the benefits which are derived from British laws also. It is certainly true that, with all these advantages, they do not enjoy complete independence: that is, they do not enjoy that absolute freedom, which can belong only to the mother country. But, Sir, in return for that disadvantage (if, indeed, it be a disadvantage), there are circumstances which go far to compensate them. Among the first of those circumstances is the privilege which they possess of being defended from foreign attack by the armies and by the navies of this country, without any charge or expense to themselves. In the last year a sum of 220,000*l.* was voted for the naval and military defence of Canada, of which sum not above 1200*l.* or 1500*l.* was paid by the Canadians. What would they have to pay if they were in the situation of the United States? In the last year the charge for the naval and military expenses of the American states was little less than 5,000,000*l.* Then, again, with regard to taxation. The taxes in the Canadas are exceedingly light. The disposition of the revenue is also in the highest degree favourable to the interests of the people. The largest annual sum that has been voted in Lower Canada (I speak in round numbers) was 157,000*l.* Of that sum 57,000*l.* was appropriated to the expenses of the civil government; 70,000*l.* to the expenses of roads, enclosures, and other internal improvements; and 29,000*l.* to the purposes of education. Now, Sir, if we were in this condition, if all we had to pay for the expenses of the civil government and for the maintenance of our establishments, was no more than one third of our revenue, and that the remaining two thirds were applied to the purposes of education and for the benefit and improvement of the country, I think we should be considered to be in a much more enviable situation than we are now. But, Sir, if the people of Canada have no great reason to complain of the laws under which they live, — if they have no great reason to complain of the taxes which are imposed upon them, — if they have no great reason to complain of the disposition of their revenue, — still less reason have they to complain on the subject of trade. With respect to trade, it has always been admitted that an Imperial Legislature has a right to compel a colony to receive the produce of the mother country, and a right to restrict that colony in its commerce with other nations. But I would ask, if the Canadas were separated from Great Britain, — if Great Britain and Canada were two independent nations, — could there be any treaty of commerce entered into so favourable to Canada as the system which is now pursued by this country towards that colony? Why then, Sir, if this be the condition of Lower Canada, — if the people are so happy with respect to their internal condition, to their laws, to their finances, and to their trade,—I think I have a perfect right to come to this House and to ask it to agree to the proposition which I am about to make to them.

Sir, the address which I mean to propose, after "thanking her Majesty for her gracious communication of papers relating to the affairs of Canada," and after assuring her Majesty that the anxious consideration of this House shall be given to the preparation of such measures as the present exigency may require, proceeds, "to express to her Majesty our deep concern that a disaffected party in Canada should have had recourse to open violence and rebellion, with a view to throw off their allegiance to the Crown. To declare to her Majesty our satisfaction that their designs have been opposed, no less by her Majesty's loyal subjects in North America than by her Majesty's forces; and to assure her Majesty, that while this House is ever ready to afford relief to real grievances, we are fully determined to support the efforts of her Majesty for the suppression of revolts and the restoration of tranquillity." Sir, I think I have laid quite sufficient grounds to induce all to consent to repose this confidence in her Majesty and her Majesty's Government, who are, with me, not prepared to give immediate independence to the British provinces in North America. Although, I repeat, that I am not prepared to give such immediate independence, this I will say, that if the time were come at which such an important change might be safely and advantageously made, I should by no means be indisposed to give the 1,400,000 of our present fellow-subjects who are living in the provinces of North America a participation in the perfect freedom enjoyed by the mother country. If this were a fit time, if circumstances of all kinds were such as to render such a change desirable, I think it would then be proper for the British Government to say, that those colonies might with propriety be severed from us, and formed into a separate and distinct state, in strict alliance, offensive and defensive, with this country.

MR. HUME and MR. WARBURTON. — Hear, hear!

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Honourable Member for Kilkenny and the Honourable Member for Bridport cheer this sentiment. I repeat, that if circumstances had arrived at such a state in the colony as to justify us in saying that the time for such a separation had arrived (which I utterly deny), we should then have, as allies, men influenced by the most amiable and affectionate feelings towards the mother country; not men who would wish to see the British arms defeated, or who would entertain the aspirations that the power of Great Britain might sink into insignificance and contempt. On the contrary, I am convinced that we should find in them men who would cheer on the efforts of this great empire, who would reverence our character, and enjoy our triumphs. But for such a change, the time, if ever it shall come, has not yet arrived. It is not for the interest of Britain, nor of those provinces, which enjoy great advantages from their connection with this country, nor of that population which is proud of their position in regard to the mother country, that a separation should take place. Then, Sir, if the time is not come for a final separation of the two countries, I would say, do not think of separating to benefit a party who have carried their ambitious designs to the length of open rebellion. If you were to do so, you would, indeed, create a civil war; you would, indeed, give occasion for bloodshed, for you would cause the destruction of property; you would excite to plunder and pillage; you would give the signal for a long and sanguinary interruption of public tranquillity: and if it be supposed that a free, a happy, and an orderly républic could be thus established, in that expectation you would most signally fail.

Sir, such are the reasons and such are the grounds on which I ask this House to assent to the address which I am about to propose. I feel confident that the House and the country will do her Majesty's Government the justice to believe that they entertain no wish to avail themselves of the means which, they trust, will be placed at their disposal — for purposes of severity, still less of vengeance, with reference to the misguided people who have been induced to take a part in this insurrection. I am sure that no one can be more anxious than the Noble Lord the present governor of Canada, and I am sure that no one will be more anxious than the Noble Lord who will succeed him, to make the present warfare as little attended by circumstances of a painful and sanguinary nature as possible. I feel confident that they will consider clemency the best road to reconciliation; for I also feel confident that the defection of the greater portion of those who have been led into rebellion in Lower Canada may be justly attributed to ignorance. The few really guilty, the designing men who have exasperated others, and induced them rashly to appeal to arms, will hereafter be held in detestation by their own countrymen. Confident as to the issue of this contest, I shall feel it my duty, when that contest is terminated, to call upon this House to reward those who have been faithful to their Sovereign, to their country, to their oaths, and to the integrity of the empire. I now move, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, to thank her Majesty for her gracious communication of papers relating to the affairs of Canada.

"To assure her Majesty that the anxious consideration of this House shall be given to the preparation of such measures as the present exigency may require.

"To express to her Majesty our deep concern that a disaffected party in Canada should have had recourse to open violence and rebellion, with a view to throw off their allegiance to the Crown.

"To declare to her Majesty our satisfaction that their designs have been opposed no less by her Majesty's loyal subjects in North America than by her Majesty's forces; and to assure her Majesty, that while this House is ever ready to afford relief to real grievances, we are fully determined to support the efforts of her Majesty for the suppression of revolt and the restoration of tranquillity."

The address was then put from the chair

Mr. HUME. — I am very unwilling to trespass upon the House, but am, nevertheless, desirous to state, shortly, the view which I take of the question under consideration. There was one observation made by the Noble Lord which gave me great satisfaction. The Noble Lord has stated that he is sure the House and the country would be anxious to have all the facts relative to the occurrences in Canada fairly and fully before them. Now, it is because I know that the House and the country have not all the facts relative to the occurrences in Canada fairly and fully before them, that I cannot agree to the proposed address, and still less to the proposition for suspending the constitution of Lower Canada. I know very well that the Noble Lord has a great advantage over me in calling the attention of the House to the subject, without having previously given the smallest intimation of what it was his intention to propose. The Noble Lord has carefully concealed his plans from every body; and now, after a long statement of the past history of Canada, he comes forth with a proposition to suspend the constitution of Lower Canada. I will take upon myself to say, that the Noble Lord has not dealt fairly with the House in stating that they were in full possession of the facts which have led to the present condition of things in Lower Canada, and which ought to induce them to adopt the extraordinary and unconstitutional course which the Noble Lord now proposes. I agree with the Noble Lord in one statement, that it was the intention of Parliament in 1791 (and I will not enter at all into the Noble Lord's previous statements) to give to the people of Canada all the advantages of a representative body, similar, in every respect, to the House of Commons in the mother country. If, however, the Noble Lord would read the speeches of Mr. Fox, and the other Honourable Members of that period, correctly, he would find that the Legislative Council was an experiment to try whether a body could be introduced into the Canadian constitution similar to the House of Lords. That experiment has been made, and it has entirely failed.

The Noble Lord has admitted that the avowed object of the Act of 1791 was to provide for the welfare of the Canadian people. The Noble Lord, however, has utterly failed in showing that it has had that effect. The Noble Lord has entirely omitted this part of the case; he, however, has dwelt much on what he terms the violence of the people of Canada; but if he had attentively weighed what has been done, he would have found that the fault did not rest with the representatives of the people of Canada, but with the Legislative and Executive Council, which did not represent them. The governors and their assistants were to blame, with perhaps one exception. It was stated in 1828, by the Right Honourable the then Vice President of the Board of Trade, that it was the intention of the British Parliament to give to the Legislative Council an infusion of a majority who represented the popular feeling. It is, however, folly to say that anything of that kind has been done; the great majority of the Legislative Assembly was then, as now, composed of French Canadians; if, therefore, a disposition existed at the period to which I allude, to bring the different bodies into a state of accordance, that could only have been accomplished by giving the same party a majority in the Legislative and Executive Councils. Could any rational person suppose that the Government of so distant a colony could be satisfactorily carried on by two parties so differing in opinion, and whose interests were so opposed to each other, as the Legislative Council and the House of Assembly in Lower Canada? There can, then, be no doubt that the intention, in 1828, was, that the people of Lower Canada, being fairly represented in the House of Assembly, the Legislative Council and the Executive Council should contain so many persons who had a stake and interest in the country, that it would be probable the opinions of those councils would coincide with the opinions of the House of Assembly. That intention, however, was not carried into effect. On the contrary, the persons who are selected as members of the Council are not such as are at all calculated for that purpose. This the Noble Lord has, in fact, admitted. Ought he not, then, to pause, before he comes to this House to propose the entire destruction of the representative body? The Noble Lord was, in my opinion, to blame, in so severely commenting upon the conduct of the House of Assembly. The Noble Lord ought to have looked at the proceedings during the government of Lord Dalhousie. I could have wished that the Noble Lord had told us what, in his view of the question, were the powers vested in the House of Assembly; and had then proceeded to show in what respect that body had exceeded their authority, and what charge existed against them of a nature so serious as to demand their destruction. Could anything be more legitimate than that they should employ themselves in examining, item by item, the articles of the Civil List? From the year 1820, when Lord Dalhousie was governor, the right possessed by the House of Assembly to exercise this scrutiny has been acknowledged. And now, if the acting upon this acknowledged right be termed by the Noble Lord an offence, in my opinion the Noble Lord will entirely fail in proving it to be one. Whoever knows anything of the privileges of the House of Commons, must acknowledge that one of the most valuable of those privileges is, that of investigating the Civil List. Instead, therefore, of being a charge against the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada, their exercise of this privilege ought to redound to their praise. It is the Legislative Council who have, on all occasions, thrown impediments in the way of beneficially governing the country.

The Noble Lord has referred to the instructions which were given by Sir George Murray, when he was Secretary of State for the Colonies, and said that those instructions were liberal in their character. I admit it. But have those instructions been acted upon? I can state, on the authority of those who, being on the spot, are perfectly competent witnesses, that they have not. I by no means blame Sir George Murray, whose intentions I believe — and I have always said so — were good. But I also said, and I still say, that it is impossible satisfactorily to govern any colony at a distance from the mother country, if the persons in authority in that colony have no feeling in common with the inhabitants of such colony. Up to the present moment, the persons in authority in Lower Canada have been aliens in that colony. This was proved by the petition to the House of Commons in 1828, signed by 87,000 inhabitants of Lower Canada, nineteen twentieths of whom were landed proprietors, forming an overwhelming majority of the population. In the Legislative Council of Lower Canada, there was only one person interested in the soil. The other Members of that council were either official persons, or people from England, who had no interest in the soil. Was it possible that Sir George Murray, or any other colonial Minister, could satisfactorily administer such a government as that of Lower Canada under such circumstances? Out of 340 civil officers, only forty were Canadians; the rest were persons such as I have just described. Here is the origin of all the evils that have occurred. Could anything be more extraordinary than that, at a time when we were anxious to be relieved from all the expenses of the colony, we should refuse to listen to the proposition of the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada, when they stated their perfect readiness, — provided they were permitted to fix the amount of salaries to be paid to each officer, and the number of civil officers which they thought necessary, — to take the whole burden upon themselves? Why was so reasonable a proposition refused? and who would have supposed that offence would be taken by the colonial government upon that ground? The present system of lavish and extravagant expenditure has been maintained only for purposes of abuse and corruption. I have frequently stated that the people of England are taxed, not for the benefit of the colonies (for they do not want it), but for the benefit of a few individuals. We have voted away the public money in this House for the purpose of continuing a system of abuse and misrule in our colonies. Is it fitting that the House of Assembly should be blamed for endeavouring to perform one of their most important functions, — that of examining any branch of the public expenditure, item by item?

I can show the representations of the governor of that day, stating what would be the result if the people of Canada should succeed in obtaining what they ask for in that respect; the result so much feared was, that the large salaries which many of the members of the council enjoyed would be interfered with; and therefore it was that that body systematically set their face against all measures of improvement. Nearly ten years ago I stated in this House that Sir James Kempt was the only governor of a colony I had ever known, against whom no complaint had ever been sent home; and I will take upon myself to say, that if Sir James Kempt had been permitted to act in accordance with his own wishes, and as he did on one occasion, the present posture of affairs would never have existed. One of the grievances of which the Legislative Assembly complain is, that the same individuals hold judicial offices in addition to five or six other appointments, to all of which salaries are attached. Now it has been charged against the Legislative Assembly that they have refused to pass the Supply Bill necessary for paying the salaries of the judges and other public officers in the colony, and by their refusal have brought the Government to a standstill. I can show that this is incorrect. I can show it from Lord Gosford's address in February, 1837. Lord Gosford, in his address to the House of Legislative Assembly at that time, said, that he had directed the estimates for the year to be laid before them, as also the account of the arrears of the three years preceding. These accrued under the government of Lord Aylmer, when the supplies were stopped, as the Legislative Assembly had a right to do, because the Legislative Council had refused to assent to certain most useful measures which the House of Assembly had passed. When Lord Gosford addressed the House, they stated that they were willing to vote the supplies, but that, having waited for twenty years for the redress of the grievances of the colony, they wished to know what were his instructions as to the remedy of those grievances? Lord Gosford did not state fully what those instructions were, but omitted some very important parts; and it was only when the whole were published by Sir Francis Head in an unfortunate moment, that they became known in Lower Canada. Notwithstanding all that the House have heard from the Noble Lord, and notwithstanding the many bold assertions which the speech of that Noble Lord contained, I contend that the people of Canada had a right to tell the Government of the mother country that they would not pay up arrears till they first obtained a redress of grievances; let it, however, be recollected, that a declaration of this nature was made concurrently with another proceeding of the Canadians, which plainly and strikingly evinced the sincerity of their expressions of good feeling towards England. What was the language of the House of Assembly as expressed by their Speaker to Lord Gosford? They said —

> It is right we should tell you, and through you the British Parliament and the British Government, that, until you redress our grievances, which are of so important and so grievous a nature, we will not pay up the arrears; but in order to show you how sincerely desirous we are that the machinery of government should go on, we will, notwithstanding the severity of the measures which you now adopt towards us, vote the supplies for the current year, so that you may have sufficient time so write home to the Colonial Office, and to ascertain whether, in that quarter, there is any disposition to accede to those claims which we deem just and reasonable.

And they acted not only upon the spirit, but up to the very letter, of this declaration. They took the estimates of 1833 as the groundwork upon which to frame those for the current year, and they voted a sum of 54,640*l.*; and would the House have believed, if they had not the evidence of their own senses to prove the fact, that a Minister of the Crown should now rise in his place in this House, and state that from the year 1832 the House of Assembly have uniformly and obstinately persisted in refusing the supplies? Could the House, I ask, believe it, when I hold here in my hand a despatch from Lord Gosford, in which that Nobleman says, "The House of Assembly has entered item by item into the account for the supplies." The House of Assembly in fact not only entered into the account item by item, but actually voted the salaries of all the chief officers of the Government. It is true that they had attached certain conditions to their votes; but those conditions were only just and reasonable — conditions not only justiable in themselves, but in many instances absolutely necessary to the proper discharge of the duties of the situations filled by the different officers. Does the Noble Lord mean to say that the House of Commons has no right, in voting money for the public service, to affix conditions upon which that money shall be granted? If he admits that this House has that power, upon what grounds will he contend that the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada has not the same privilege? Public opinion in England had declared against plurality of offices. Was it not fit and proper, therefore, for the Canadian House of Assembly to say that it would vote certain salaries to certain officers only upon condition of their abandoning places which were wholly inconsistent with their official situations? Was there anything unjust, unreasonable, or improper in their declaring that the auditor of the land-tax, the clerk and registrar, the clerk of the Legislative Council, and the master in Chancery, should severally be paid the salaries attached to those offices, only upon condition of their ceasing to be members of the Legislative Council? Was there any thing inconsistent in the House of Assembly declaring that men holding subservient situations, as clerks in different offices, should not continue to be members of a body which in the colonial legislature was ranked in the same place as the House of Lords in Great Britain? I, for one, think that the House of Assembly, instead of being subjected to blame for the course they took towards the suppression of an abuse which is no longer tolerated at home, are deserving of the highest praise. I will mention only one or two other instances, just to show the nature of the conditions made by the House of Assembly, and for which the Legislative Council afterwards threw out the Bill of Supply. For it must always be remembered that it was not the House of Assembly which refused, but the Legislative Council which rejected, the supply necessary to carry on the official duties of the Government. One officer received a salary as clerk of the registers, and was also a member of the Legislative Council; the Assembly thought the duties of his office inconsistent with those of a member of the Legislature, and they refused to vote his salary unless he ceased to be a member of the Council; the next item was the salary of the Speaker of the House of Assembly, this they voted with this proviso, that he should not at the same time receive an equal or a higher sum from any other situation under the Government. This was nothing more than a declaration against pluralities — a declaration, in adopting which the House of Assembly did nothing more than follow the example that we, the House of Commons of this country, had previously set them, and for which we take credit to ourselves. Next came the salary of the clerk of the Legislative Council: the condition affixed to that vote was, that he should not also continue to hold the situation of a member of the Executive Council. Could there be anything more reasonable? What would be said, here, if a clerk of the House of Lords were to hold also the situation of a Cabinet Minister and enjoy salaries from both offices? I am sure that no reasonable man would attempt to say that the two offices were compatible, or that their duties could be rendered consistent with each other. The House of Assembly sought to provide against this abuse in the government of Canada, and in justice and fairness the Ministers of the Crown ought not to heap obloquy upon their heads for doing — what? For proceeding upon the principles which the House of Commons in the mother country have over and over again recognised and insisted on, and which the public opinion of this country has solemnly sanctioned. The salaries of the clerk of the Crown and of the master in Chancery were also voted subject to the reasonable condition, "that they should not continue to be members of the Executive or Legislative Councils." Much has been said about the salaries of the judges being left unpaid. Now that has been entirely misstated: the salaries of the judges were voted. The Noble Lord is, therefore, quite wrong in laying that as a charge at the door of the House of Assembly. Lord Gosford, in his despatch of March, 1836, distinctly states that the House of Assembly would pay the salaries of the judges, provided they did not hold other offices. Was that an unreasonable condition? Is it fit that the judges should hold other offices? Is it permitted to the judges in England to hold a plurality of offices? And if it be not permitted here, is it right that the Noble Lord (J. Russell) in making out a case against Canada, should say that the judges were left unpaid and that justice could not be administered, when the only bar to their payment was their holding a multiplicity of situations, utterly at variance with their office of judges? Such an allegation was nothing more than an excuse on the part of the Noble Lord to induce the House to agree with him in a most unjust and unconstitutional measure; a measure founded upon statements and assertions which the documents in the Noble Lord's own hands will not bear out. The salary of the Chief Justice was in fact voted without any condition at all; and the salaries of the puisne judges were also voted, subject only to the condition that they should not hold other offices under the Government at the same time. The salary of the Judge of the Court of Vice Admiralty was also voted, subject to the same condition, and that he should not continue to receive fees wholly unsanctioned by law in addition to his salary: and in my opinion the House of Assembly were not only justified in making these conditions, but they would have neglected their duty as representatives of the people had they neglected to do so.

I take all these facts from the despatches of Lord Gosford, which have been published by order of the Government; and when I mention this circumstance, I think I have stated sufficient to prove that the Noble Lord (Russell) was not warranted in his assertion that the House of Assembly refused to vote the supplies, and had thereby prevented the administration of justice and the carrying on of the government in the colony. But these despatches go further: in one of Lord Gosford's communications, he distinctly states that the Bill of Supply was introduced into the House of Assembly on the 25th of February; it was passed with very little delay, and sent up to the other House in March, subject only to the conditions which I have adverted to relative to plurality of offices; and Lord Gosford adds, and to this I would particularly direct the attention of the House, "I have no hesitation in saying such was the feeling, such the disposition of the House of Assembly, that but for the untoward publication of the instructions by Sir Francis Head, the House of Assembly would have voted the whole of the supplies for the year without conditions." Is it not wonderful, then, that the Noble Lord, to-night, with such evidence in his hands, should have the hardihood to come forward, as a Minister of the Crown, and declare that the House of Assembly had obstinately refused to vote any supply? The fact as I have already stated, was, that the House of Assembly proposed the measure of supply, and sent it up to the Legislative Council, where it was read a second time, but afterwards dropped. Hence the want of supply. Who was to blame? Not the House of Assembly, but the Legislative Council, the nominees of the Government, of whom it may be justly said, "that they are aliens in blood, in interest, and in religion," from the people of Canada.

I have thus shown, from the correspondence of Lord Gosford, first, that the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) is not supported in his statement; and secondly, that the conclusions which he has drawn are erroneous. The Noble Lord alluded to the Report of 1828, and to certain resolutions which were agreed to by the House of Assembly; and the Noble Lord has attempted to show the ingratitude of the House of Assembly by those resolutions. But what is the fact? I hold in my hand a series of resolutions, in which the House of Assembly express great thanks for the inquiry which was instituted by this House. But let us consider what has been the result of the inquiry for which, according to the Noble Lord, the House of Assembly ought to be so extremely grateful? Have any of the recommendations contained in the Report of the committee been carried out? The House of Assembly are the best judges of that. The House of Assembly have gone through that Report item by item, and have clearly proved that not one of the recommendations has been acted upon. They, therefore, thanked the home Government for benefits which seemed to be promised, but which, in fact, were never granted. If the recommendations contained in the Report of 1828 had been fairly and honestly carried into effect, there would have been nothing of the unpleasant distractions which have existed almost from that time to the present hour. There would certainly have been nothing of that armed resistance which unhappily has of late been offered to the constituted authorities. I maintain, therefore, that the Noble Lord, when he quoted the Report of 1828, quoted it against himself; or at all events only to be told that none of the recommendations which it contained had been carried into effect. There may have been a few petty and insignificant attempts at reform; but all the principal grievances of the Canadians remain unredressed. The Noble Lord also alluded to the minute of Lord Aberdeen. I wish that the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had acted more in the spirit of that nobleman. I believe that the intentions of Lord Aberdeen were good; and had that nobleman remained in office up to the present time, I have no doubt, from the great attention which he paid to the facts brought before him, and from the manner in which he drew his conclusions, that there would have been none of the rebellion, none of the disturbances, which we are now compelled to regret.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I am bound to say so; taking it for granted that Lord Aberdeen would have acted upon the reasoning adopted by him during the short time he was at the head of the Colonial Office, and which, if carried into effect, would certainly have done much good. The Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) has enumerated five different charges or complaints which he alleges have been made. The Noble Lord referred to the Jesuits' property, the church and crown revenues, and the constitution of the Legislative Council; but the Noble Lord evaded the real question in dispute.

I was certainly surprised to hear the Noble Lord assert that the Canadians have no reason to complain of the constitution of the Legislative Council. Why, the whole question is, whether responsibility and accountability shall, or shall not, exist? The complaint of the Canadians is, that that body, as at present constituted, is subject to no liability; and that, as long as it is continued in its present shape, they can have no power over their revenues, over their laws, or, in fact, over anything that concerns their welfare; because, whatever their own efforts may be in the House of Assembly, the Legislative Council have always the power, without any kind of responsibility, to step in and mar all. The Noble Lord passed over a period of ten years in a couple of paragraphs, with scarcely an allusion. He said that responsibility was recommended in the Report of 1828, and that the Canadians were very unthankful in not having expressed their acknowledgments for the recommendation. But what is the extent of reform that has been given to the Canadians in consequence of that Report? Why, an addition of ten in the number of the Legislative Council, and three in the number of the Executive Council. Could the Noble Lord for a moment imagine, that the alteration which has been made in the Legislative Executive Council would give the least satisfaction to the people of Canada? Does he not know that public meetings have been held, at which the new regulations introduced by the Noble Lord were complained of as making the Legislative Council worse than it was before? But, says the Noble Lord, the majority of the Council are French Canadians. Why, does not the Noble Lord know, that the people would rather have persons appointed direct from England, not at all connected with the colony, than men who are renegades from their former opinions, and in every way obnoxious to the great majority of the Canadian public? And when was this alteration made, which was to give so much satisfaction to the people of Canada, and for which, according to the Noble Lord, they ought to have evinced so much gratitude? Why (the House will hardly believe it), this boasted improvement was not made until the latter end of October last, — ten years after the period at which an alteration in the constitution in the Legislative Council was originally recommended by the committee of the House of Commons. The reform in the Council, which ought to have taken place in 1828, was not attempted till 1837, when the addition was made in the number of its members which I have stated, but leaving it just as objectionable, and as little calculated to satisfy the people upon the score of responsibility, as it ever had been. Never was there such a mockery upon the people of Canada as this alteration of the Legislative Council; and, in my opinion, nothing could be more complete than the failure of the Noble Lord in his attempt to establish a ground for interference. The Noble Lord has said that, since the year 1831, the conciliatory measures of Government have not been met in a corresponding spirit on the part of the colonists. Now, I want to know, what real measures of conciliation have ever been held out without being successful? What concession was there in sending out the resolutions of last year, declaring that an Act of Parliament would follow, to rob the Canadian Exchequer, and to put down resistance in Canada? And what was the effect of those tyrannical resolutions? Why, the moment they were known in the colony, meetings were held in every county to protest against the conduct of the mother country; for it was felt there, as it must be felt here, that never were measures so utterly reckless of principle as were those resolutions which the Government succeeded in passing through Parliament last Session. And what has been done by the Government in consequence of the strong expression of popular feeling which was called forth by their resolutions? Measures of conciliation were certainly promised, and we were led to suppose that, as soon after the recess as possible, they should be sent out. Yes; the Colonial Office are always "about to do" something great, but never do it. Nothing is done by the Executive, no hope is held out by Parliament, and the dearest rights of the colonial population are outraged; and now no power but that of force is to be used:—nothing of relief, nothing of conciliation, nothing of justice. It appears that, up to a very late period, assurances were received from Lord Gosford that there was nothing to excite any serious alarm in the state of the colony, although he, at the same time, expressed a doubt whether the spirit of dissatisfaction which had exhibited itself could be put down without a suspension of the constitution. The argument of the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) is, that the disaffection existing in Lower Canada is by no means general, that a portion only of the people of the province are discontented, — merely a few demagogues who have practised upon the ignorance and credulity of a small portion of the people. If that be really the case, — if the evil extends no further than that, what pretence can there be for punishing the whole of the province? If a few only have offended, why are all to be deprived of the benefit of their constitution?

It is not yet known — we have had no proof of the fact—whether or not M. Papineau is in any way connected with the present disturbances in Canada. We have no proof that he was in any way privy to the revolt. Indeed, my own opinion is, that the armed resistance to the Queen's troops was not premeditated, but arose out of the heat of the moment. The Noble Lord, the Governor of the province, thought proper to issue a proclamation, forbidding the people to meet and express their sentiments upon a matter materially affecting their wellbeing. Now, we all know that proclamations are not law; and certain persons, conceiving this proclamation to be an infringement upon their rights, proceeded to tear it from the church doors. The Attorney General was instructed to prosecute two gentlemen who took part in these proceedings. He did so; but the indictment was thrown out. Having failed in this, he proceeded to file ex officio informations against them; and Lord Gosford struck out of the list of magistrates every man of liberal opinions, and substituted none but Orangemen and Tories in their places. Having thus obtained a subservient or congenial magistracy, Lord Gosford proceeded to arrest twenty-eight individuals in one day. These were the proceedings that startled the whole Canadian people, and excited that strong feeling which at length has led to the opposition of the constituted authorities. Nobody knew on what authority or on what evidence these arrests were made. Everything was done with the utmost silence and secrecy. The people became alarmed; and this led to the rescue which, as I before said, I firmly believe was wholly unpremeditated. Does the Noble Lord mean to say that the House of Assembly knew anything or had anything to do with the rescue? Does the Noble Lord mean to say that anything but an attempt to interfere with the administration of justice in a degree so flagrant as that adopted by Lord Gosford would have led to the rescue which has since given rise to such unhappy consequences? Had the same conduct been pursued in Ireland, would not the consequences have been the same? If every liberal magistrate had been struck off the list in Ireland, and the commission of the peace filled up only by Orangemen and Tories — men entirely hostile to the feelings of the great mass of the people — would not the same resistance to the law have been offered at all events? Saying that Ministers had allowed the expression of discontent to arise to so great a height in Canada, and especially after the admission of Lord Glenelg, that complaints from the colony had been increasing ever since 1828, I think the measures now proposed to be adopted are too severe

To deprive the whole province of its liberties because a few have offended, gives to the proceedings of the Government an appearance of vengeance rather than of justice. I think the best course would be to send out an individual like Lord Durham, to whom I see no sort of objection, armed with ample powers to do whatever he might deem necessary to preserve the tranquillity of the province,—but not accompanied with this disgraceful Act which is to suspend the liberties of the whole of the people. If I were to advise any course it would be, that Government should declare a general amnesty. Let Lord Durham go out and declare an amnesty. Let him go out with full powers so to act, and then it would appear that revenge was not our object, but that justice was what we wished to effect. But at present what have the Canadians to expect? What, after the Government have suspended their charter, have they to look for? Will they not look at every act with suspicion and jealousy that this country might do? Will they not feel a want of confidence in all that we proposed? If, then, the Noble Lord wishes to prevent the shedding of blood, let him pass an Act of amnesty, and send out Lord Durham to declare it. Did not Sir Charles Grey tell you, after a residence of twelve months in Canada, that it was essential to interfere with the Legislative Assembly? A spirit of opposition has been excited that requires an appeal to force; but I, for one, hate and detest war,—above all, civil war. Civil war is the most to be abhorred; and to avoid such a calamity, I think the Government ought not to stand upon any punctilios. But let us see what is now proposed? The Noble Lord proposes to send out Lord Durham. Can Lord Durham do anything unless he has the powers? No. What, then, does the Noble Lord propose to do? He does not intend to give Lord Durham any such powers as would enable him to accomplish the only object it is necessary he should effect. This being so, Lord Durham will go out to Canada under such circumstances as will cover him with the like disgrace that has visited Lord Gosford. It is not Lower Canada alone that demands redress. The other North American colonies are equally anxious to obtain justice from this country. If, then, the Noble Lord be not disposed to make a permanent settlement with these colonies upon a constitutional basis, is he prepared to keep them down by mere physical force? Is the state of our Exchequer so flourishing that his Right Honourable Colleague (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could recommend an expenditure of half a million for such a purpose; and does the Noble Lord imagine that the people of England would submit to the burden of additional taxation in order to support him in such a course of policy? The Noble Lord has said, that the feelings of the people are generally with him. I differ from the Noble Lord in that respect. I believe the people are anxious to put an end to bloodshed, and to effect a conciliation. This the Noble Lord may succeed in accomplishing by passing an Act of amnesty in favour of those who have been placed in their present predicament by the extraordinary and unaccountable proceedings of the Colonial Government. If the Noble Lord will do that, I am perfectly satisfied he may make amends for much that he has done. It is not the man who sheds blood, but the man who stimulates him on, that is the more guilty party.

I maintain that it was the resolutions of the Noble Lord which stimulated the people of Lower Canada to revolt and bloodshed. It was the unjust conduct of the House of Commons in violating the rights of the whole province of Canada that led to the bloodshed that has taken place. I am sorry to have been obliged to intrude upon the patience of the House at so great a length, but I felt it a duty both to myself and to the cause which I advocate to advance the opinions I have declared, and I will now sit down by expressing my deep regret at the course which the Noble Lord has proposed to the House.

LORD ELIOT.—I shall detain the House but a very few moments, in offering one or two observations upon the subject which has been brought under our consideration, and at some length. It is not necessary for me, in replying to that Honourable Member, to say that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has attacked the Noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell) pretty severely. I will not follow the example of the Noble Lord, by going through the history of the Canadas from the earliest period of their connection with this country. I will merely ask whether there have not been two great boons granted to that colony?—first, the Act of 1791, by which the House of Assembly was conceded? Now I find in that Act an oath to be taken by each member of that Assembly to the effect that he will be faithful and true in his allegiance to his Majesty the Sovereign of Great Britain; that he will maintain those provinces of the Canadas for the King of Great Britain; and that he will do every thing in his power against any traitorous conspiracy, or any attempt that may be made against the Crown or its dignity; that he will do his utmost endeavour to discover and make known to his Majesty all such treasonable attempts; and he swears this without any equivocation or mental reservation. Having said thus much with regard to the Act of 1791, I will leave to the Honourable Member for Kilkenny the task of accounting for the conduct of those persons whose cause he has this evening advocated. The next great concession made by this country to Canada was by the Act of 1831, by which the whole of the crown revenues were, as remarked by the Noble Lord, made over to it in a spirit of generous, perhaps too generous, confidence. Now I would ask the House what return has been made for those concessions? Has the declaration of the Government, that they were prepared at once no longer to allow the judges to hold place during pleasure, but during good behaviour, been responded to by the Colonial House of Assembly? Certainly not; and it is equally true that the House of Assembly have altogether refused to make any permanent provision for the Governor, the Executive Council, or the judges of the province, in conformity with their own declaration. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has treated us to a sort of historical retrospect of Canadian grievances; but those grievances no longer exist. I will say, at least, that almost every one of them has been gradually removed. I readily admit that grievances have existed; but of those now complained of, the principal, I believe, is the constitution of the Legislative Council, which the colonists wish to have made elective. Against such a proposition I think the Noble Lord has stated the most satisfactory reasons; in addition to which, I will take the liberty of saying that an elective Legislative Council is incompatible with the constitution of Lower Canada. It certainly was the intention of Mr. Pitt to establish an hereditary peerage in that country, if he could have discovered the materials for it; but these were not to be found. From the very law founded upon the custom of Paris, by which the division of property took place, and to which the Canadian proprietors were attached, no hereditary land proprietary could be found. If, therefore, an elective council were formed, it would be composed of precisely the same material as that which now constitutes the elective Assembly.

The next complaint of the Canadians, is with respect to the tiends. And we have been told that land in Lower Canada will not fetch more than five shillings per acre, whilst in the upper province it is worth from twelve to fifteen shillings; and that this great difference in value is owing entirely to the tenures under which the land is held. My own opinion is, that in the very first instance we ought to have abolished the feudal tenures in Canada. But upon this subject, as well as all others, the Government and the present Parliament have at all times evinced every disposition gravely and calmly to consider the subject, and to remove, as far as possible, all the grievances of which the Canadians have complained. I entirely concur in one observation of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny; that is, that it is not those misguided people, but the men who have stirred them up to acts of intemperance and disloyalty, whom we ought to blame. No one more deeply regrets the prospect of a civil war in Canada, or the bloodshed that has already occurred there, than myself; but those who have drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard must abide the consequences of the only remedy that can now be applied,—that of military force. I intend to offer no sort of opposition to the motion of the Noble Lord. But I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise, I may say, indeed, my regret, that the Noble Lord has not thought fit to express any intention of satisfying what, I must say, is the just expectation of the country. Certainly her Majesty's Ministers ought to assign to the House and to the country some sufficient grounds to show why this very valuable colony has been allowed to be placed in such imminent jeopardy. I think no man can look at the correspondence which has been placed in the hands of Honourable Members, and say that proper means were taken to guard against revolution and its train of fatal consequences. I think the better course would be to appoint a secret committee to examine into this question, and before whom all the papers and explanations on the subject might be laid. I will not longer intrude upon the indulgence of the House, but I do think that the suggestion I have thrown out is deserving of some consideration.

SIR J. CARNAC. — I think, Sir, that it cannot be denied by any person who will take the trouble, fairly and without prejudice, to examine the history of the colony of Lower Canada since its connection with this country, that the conduct of the British Government towards it has been, from the very first, the most liberal. In addition to the benefits of British laws, all their old habits and prejudices in favour of French customs have been respected. They are the most lightly taxed, I believe, of any people in the world; and the prospects held out to them are more gratifying than those enjoyed by any other colony. The constitution of the Legislature in Canada is as popular as that of the mother country; but, not satisfied with representing the popular interest, the House of Assembly have ventured an aggression upon the other branches of the colonial constitution; they seek to control both the executive and the legislative councils. The question is then, shall we, — Canada being a part of the British Empire, contributing to its grandeur and its strength, — shall we continue to afford it that protection which is due from a mother country to its colony; or shall we leave it to the mercy of a few designing and ambitious men, who have at heart only their own personal aggrandisement? What are the demands of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada? First, that the Upper Chamber should be made elective. Now this is going considerably farther than we do in this country. Their next demand is for an alteration in the law with respect to landed property; or, in plain words, a compromise of the interests of the English settler for the benefit of the French; such an alteration of tenures as would entirely destroy those rights which have been granted by the British Government to English emigrants.

Now, Sir, are these demands such as can be consistently granted by a mother country to its colony? But, whatever may be urged in favour of the claim of the Canadians upon these two points, I say that this is not the time to discuss them. Our present duty is to uphold the rights and honour of the British Empire and the Crown. I admit that Canada has a right to be well governed; but I will not admit that we ought to consent to a separation between the two countries, merely because a few disaffected persons have set themselves in opposition to the constituted authorities. But would the colony itself be benefited by a separation from the mother country? On the contrary, I believe that, if such an event were to take place, it would be the greatest calamity that could possibly befall it. I believe that it is as much the interest of Canada as it is our own, to maintain the existing connection. And it is also my firm opinion that by far the great majority of the inhabitants of the colony are favourable to the British Government, and are averse to separation. Is this House, then, prepared to say that those persons who have invested their capital in the colonies upon the faith of the promised protection of this country, shall not have that protection extended to them? Sir, at all proper times, I am ready to consider the real grievances of the people; but when we are called upon to put down rebellion, then, I say, we ought to show our confidence in the Government, by affording them every assistance in our power; and I will venture to assert that this is the feeling of the country at large. Sir, a successful and happy result of the proposed measures is what all good subjects must hope for, and at which every good man will rejoice. The Government will have a full opportunity of exercising generosity and conciliation, where necessary. And I was glad to hear the Noble Lord say that he should be willing, after the revolt shall be put down, to consider whether some judicious alteration might not be made in the constitution of the Legislative Council. Nothing can be more proper than that differences arising between the two branches of the Colonial Legislature should be referred to the mother country for adjustment; and I hope that, whatever alterations may be made in this respect, the interests of all parties will be duly consulted. These are some of my views upon the subject. I will now conclude by again expressing my hope that no project for separating the colony from this country will be entertained; but that that protection which has been guaranteed to the British emigrants will continue to be extended to them.

Mr. GROTE. — Sir, I did expect that the Honourable Baronet who has just sat down would have favoured us with some of his own views as to alterations in the constitution of a Legislative Council. I hope, however, that the latter part of the Honourable Baronet's speech will make a greater impression upon the House than the former; for I am convinced that no measure which does not remedy the complaints made against the Legislative Council will suffice to produce the desired tranquillity in Canada. Till I came into the House, I was entirely ignorant of the intention of the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud, as to the course which he meant to pursue; I knew not whether the Noble Lord meant to move an address to the Crown, or for leave to bring in a Bill; and I do think that the House has some little ground of complaint at being thus called upon to deliberate upon the present address, without having received any notice of what they were to be required to assent to. I confess, also, that the Address, as now proposed, does not meet with my notion of the sentiments which ought to emanate from this House; for, although I acquiesce — and entirely go along with the Noble Lord—in the conviction which he entertains of the necessity of restoring tranquillity, yet I think that it is not right to express that conviction, without, at the same time, recording a sentiment which is equally strong in my mind, that full redress should be given to all grievances, and ample provision be made for future good government.

I feel, Sir, on these grounds, totally unable to acquiesce in the address which the Noble Lord has proposed; nor can I concur in the argument which has been adduced in support of it by that Noble Lord. Indeed his argument, as it seems to me, if it proves any thing, tells directly and most conclusively against his own case. The system on which Canada has been governed by this country, the Noble Lord would have us believe, has admitted not of mistake. Canada has had most exemplary colonial governors under the most exemplary of colonial governments, —one after the other,—and yet the discontents of the Canadians have got worse and worse; until, at length, the people have broken out into open revolt. If the Noble Lord be so enamoured of the past state of things, on what does he build his expectations of any better condition of them in future? Surely, if this argument of the Noble Lord proves anything, it is in favour of the case of the Canadians, and against his own resolutions. I, for my part, think there has been much to blame in the policy and conduct of the colonial department. I think it admits decidedly of much improvement; and, if I did not think so, my views upon this question might be of a very different character indeed. The Noble Lord has touched upon a great number of antecedent events connected with the proceedings of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, during the last fifteen years; and he has endeavoured to show that, for every one of the concessions which, from time to time, has been made to that country, the British Government has experienced nothing but ingratitude and unkindness. Before Honourable Gentlemen, however, suffer themselves to be carried away by the eloquent complaints of the Noble Lord, I would beg them to recollect this important fact, — first premising that, to the conclusion at which I have arrived, as a friend to the separation of the mother country, that that separation is desirable (and this opinion whether others may deem it a treasonable one or not, I do not hesitate to avow), I have not been driven by the same train of argument which has been followed out by the Noble Lord.

Now what I would desire Honourable Gentlemen to recollect is, that, with reference to the statements which have been made by the Noble Lord, there are no persons here to answer them who can properly be said to represent the people of Canada; thus the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, the late Member for Bath, is no longer present among us, unfortunately — [Laughter] — to answer for them. But still I must contend that no gentleman who reads the interesting but voluminous reports, which at different times have been presented to this House, with sufficient care and attention, can fail to be impressed with the conviction that, in the speech of the Noble Lord, there were many errors and inaccuracies, with regard both to the conduct of the House of Assembly in Canada, and the conduct of the Colonial Office here. If, however, I have not that acquaintance with the state of the Canadas, which would enable me to lay this case, with as much perspicuity, before the House, as the Honourable and Learned Gentleman would have done, had he been here (from his great knowledge of the merits and details of the question), I am yet competent, in common with other Honourable Gentlemen who have carefully studied these reports, to form a judgment upon the errors and inaccuracies in question. I agree perfectly with the Noble Lord in the encomiums which he has passed on the conduct of Sir George Murray, in his capacity of Colonial Secretary. No one can read the correspondence between Sir George Murray and Sir James Kempt, without seeing that the former of these gallant and distinguished officers was animated by the most wise and rational views of colonial policy ever entertained, perhaps, by any of our colonial secretaries. I may instance particularly that passage in which it is stated that, "if the House of Assembly were called upon to vote a certain portion of the revenue, it would acquire virtually a control over the whole."

It is impossible not to perceive, from these passages, that Sir George Murray had an accurate knowledge of the true state of the country, and that, if his advice had been attended to, the differences would have been adjusted; and that, if accidental circumstances had not prevented, in 1829 or 1830, the introduction of an Act repealing the Act of 1774, the grievances then complained of would have been fully adjusted. The revenues would have been given over to the Assembly on terms satisfactory to both parties; and I cannot now understand why, when Lord Ripon became Colonial Secretary, the same arrangement was not carried into effect. But a circumstance to which the Noble Lord (J. Russell) did not advert, happened while the Noble Earl was Colonial Secretary, which completely frustrated this amicable settlement. Lord Ripon thought proper to advance a claim, not only for the appropriation of the casual and territorial revenues, without the consent of the Assembly, for the purposes of civil government,—a claim which had been made by former governors,—not only did he claim the right of seizing those revenues, but the right, also, of diverting them from the purposes of civil government, and making them over for the purposes and the support of the Established Church. I do affirm that it was the advance of that claim, and that claim alone, which disturbed the settlement of the financial disputes between the House of Assembly and the colonial Government. This claim, in point of fact, left the House of Assembly in a worse situation than it was before, by many thousand pounds, which were taken away from that control which the House of Assembly had formerly possessed over these monies, and applied to the maintenance of the clergy of the Established Church. This claim was thought to be no less novel than it was preposterous and unreasonable. If the financial dispute had been met with a disposition to do justice, it would have been settled at this time. And the same remark applies to the other disputes in every particular. If this Government had only placed the Legislative Council in harmony with the feelings of the people, they never would have demanded an elective council. If any corroboration of this statement were wanting, we should find it in the correspondence contained in the authenticated papers extending from 1828 to 1833. This demand was never made till 1833, when the Council was still as unacceptable to the people as it was in 1828, at which period Lord Aberdeen had recommended that the Legislative Council should be made acceptable to the Canadians. If the Government seriously intended to apply this rule of conduct, how was it that they so signally failed in finding proper men to appoint to the office? Was it so very difficult to lay their hands upon fitting men for those appointments? or was it that they were not very strictly sought for? Between 1828 and 1833, there was an interval of five or six years, during which there was ample time for the English Government to secure such services from the most competent individuals. The Legislative Council of 1833 was just as distasteful to the Canadians as it had been in 1828; and during the administration of the colonial department, which my Honourable Friend behind me very properly commends, I infer that it was the evident intention of the English Government to render that body more popular with the great majority of the Canadian people. The great argument which has been advanced against this proceeding seems to have been that, thus qualified, it would become very troublesome to the Executive Government.

I agree with the Honourable Member who has stated that the Legislative Council, as at present constituted, with every single quality which can render the House of Lords in England obnoxious to the people, is without a single one of those redeeming qualities which render the House of Lords, to a very large body of the English people, an object of respect. What, then, I ask, was left to the people of Canada, when they saw that the whole legislative power of the House of Assembly was nullified by the Legislative Council? I should be glad to know how the Noble Lord can safely reconcile the course which he is now adopting with this anomalous and important fact? The House of Commons having resolved, last year, that important alterations in the composition of this Council should be made, how happened it that Lord Gosford, when the House of Assembly met on the 16th of August, was not instructed to afford to the House of Assembly a fair chance of resuming their duties with the advantages arising from those alterations? To pass over such an opportunity—was that giving them the fair chance I speak of? It was your duty, after the circumstances which had occurred in the preceding year, to afford the House of Assembly this eligible opportunity for re-entering upon its functions. It would have been more honest on the part of Earl Gosford, or of the Colonial Government, to have acquainted the Assembly with what had occurred on this subject; and to have omitted so obvious a mode of approaching the Assembly with effect, does, in my mind, render either the governor or the department liable to the imputation of very great neglect. When questions are asked in this House respecting these points, we are answered, that nothing is known about them. I do say, that from the tone and tendency of the speech of the Noble Lord, and considering them in connection with the fact of the absence from that speech of anything approaching conciliation, it is not difficult to foresee a long series of difficulties — a protracted course of disaster with respect to our Canadian possessions. The Noble Lord seems to me, together with the rest of her Majesty's Ministers, not unwilling to undertake what has ever been a difficult task with all who have attempted it, — I mean, that they are not unwilling to risk the Herculean effort of attempting to rule in defiance of the recorded sense and express wish of a majority of the inhabitants to be governed; a task which has been thought sufficiently impracticable for other governments, even when separated from unwilling subjects by a distance less than several thousands of miles.

By what means is this object to be accomplished? To what can they look but force, constraint, to prevent the outburst of dissatisfaction, which will still smoulder beneath the surface of fancied security? We should recollect that it is not the same thing to put down by armed restraint, and to eradicate discontent. I do hope, however, that the Noble Lord will not think it beneath his attention to consider that the Canadians are bordering on the United States of America, and that, however considerable may be the vast power of England to keep down a most reluctant people, yet these people could not fail to imbibe something of the feelings and the habits of that vast and flourishing republic which occupies so large a portion of that continent, and which is so close to the limits of Lower Canada. It seems to me, that to rule in the manner proposed is to saddle on England a great burden and inconvenience, and to entail on the province itself nothing but what is oppressive and intolerable. Let the Noble Lord say whether, with the best intentions on the part of the Colonial Office, he thinks it would be practicable to prevent, in so distant a colony as Canada, the possession of power which might be turned to the private purposes of a small knot of individuals, of a little oligarchy, who govern there for their own benefit, but under the name of the Colonial Office. I will venture to say this,—that even if you send Lord Durham to Canada, he will find no men more ready to thwart his views than this very Legislative Council, for whose sake her Majesty's Ministers appear inclined almost to decimate the people of the province. He will, I predict, find nothing but jobs, which it will be his duty to put down, and he will discover the most gross mismanagement; and if he agree to go out armed with nothing but pains and penalties, unsuited to the genius of a free country, he will be thwarted as well by the Legislative Council as by the people at large. To the Bill suggested by the Noble Lord I shall certainly feel it my duty to give my strenuous opposition in its passage, through every stage; for I think that the Legislative Council has not done anything to justify a measure so stringent and so severe. The Government have taken up the worst ground which it could occupy, when it said to the Canadians — "You shall either have a Legislative Council unfriendly to the great body of the people, or you shall have no constitution at all;" and I confess that I entertain no very sanguine expectation from the success attending the Governor going out after such a measure as is now advocated. I doubt not but that Lord Durham will introduce into Canada the measures which the committee of 1828 suggested long ago; and I beg the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) especially to recollect that even at that time the committee recommended that the Legislative Council should be formed of men of impartial and conciliatory dispositions; — yet that this recommendation has never been carried out, down to the present time. If the Council have been made thus impartial and conciliatory, how does it happen that the people do not gratefully acknowledge the change? Let us look at a case in point, to which I am sure that the Noble Lord, of all men, will find no objection — let us look at Lord Mulgrave's Government in Ireland; as to which I say, that my position is fully made out; — let us look at the altered feeling that seems to actuate the people of Ireland, when they really deem that there is in the Government something like a recognition of their wishes and a desire to act an impartial and conciliatory part. And why has not the same feeling been discovered in Canada, if there be the same cause for its existence? If this feeling had been fostered, if the people in Canada had been dealt with in a conciliatory, friendly, and kind manner, I entertain a strong conviction that the demands which they have put forward would have been disposed of satisfactorily — that either they would not have been so strongly pressed, or they would have been susceptible of an easier adjustment. If the House now pass a Bill suspending the Canadian constitution, unaccompanied not only by distinct promises but by any earnest signs of a redress of grievances, there will be nothing but increased troubles. The discontent engendered by the Noble Lord's resolutions will be still further confirmed and still deeper rooted; for let the House read with attention Lord Gosford's statement, that there are many men in Lower Canada who, though they disapprove of the proceedings of the House of Assembly, disapprove of the Noble Lord's resolutions still more: mark that well, I say, — that most important passage, — and remember that every such act as this will leave a far deeper and a sharper sting behind, and will render conciliation more difficult. Let us redress the Canadian wrongs, and not begin with more coercive, and in my opinion more unjustifiable, proceedings than any which have yet taken place on this question. If we carry out the Noble Lord's proposal, where are we to stop? If rebellion by part of the people justifies a suspension of the constitution of a country, why does not the Noble Lord propose to suspend that of Upper Canada, for there has been a revolt there also? I do not object to this omission, for, thinking that the proposal is, in itself, unjustifiable, I am glad to find that it is not to be extended; but still the same argument may be adduced in support of such a proposition. I can see no benefit which can be gained from severity and coercion, whilst, on the other hand, I apprehend from them the great evil of continuing in the minds of the inhabitants a feeling of despair that justice will be done to their country. I need not say that to govern a colony tranquilly, the people must be animated with a feeling of resepect towards their governors; and I am sure that coercion will never redound to the profit, and still less to the honour, of the mother country. For these reasons I must oppose the address; and I sincerely wish that it had been more distinct in recognising the principle of redressing the Canadian grievances.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — The Noble Lord, in the course of the speech with which he commenced this discussion, brought under our consideration two most important questions; the one, — the propriety of an address to the Crown, pledging the House of Commons to support the efforts which her Majesty may feel it her duty to make for the suppression of actual revolt; and the other, a legislative measure for the purpose of suspending the constitution of Lower Canada, and of investing an individual, who is about to proceed to that colony in order to take upon himself the administration of its affairs as governor, with dictatorial power. I am called upon this night to discuss, I apprehend, only one of those propositions, namely, that which respects the policy of voting an address, in which I shall pledge myself, as a Member of this House, to support the Crown in its attempts to suppress open revolt; and I must say, that it would have been more consonant with my own feelings if the two suggestions, — that, as to the suspension of the functions of the colonial legislature, and that other, as to the powers to be given to this governor,—had been kept perfectly distinct. I do think one of these to be of sufficient importance to require me to give my sentiments upon it; and when it shall be necessary to pronounce my opinion on the other, I will do so freely and unreservedly. I confess that I lament that so long a time should have been permitted to elapse, without the attention of Parliament having been called to this point. If I had been in the House on the night before the recess, when the affairs of Canada were discussed, I would have voted for the proposition that the House should, without delay, meet and vote an address similar to that now under discussion. Had you not received an intimation that a portion of her Majesty's dominions was in open insurrection? Had you not received official intimation that the Queen's troops were in arms, — in opposition to bodies of the Queen's subjects, — in support of the civil power? And I think that no time ought to have been permitted to elapse before the House of Commons was called together to take active measures, with the view of intimidating the rebels, and of encouraging her Majesty's loyal subjects in that colony. True it is, that it might be urged that Members had separated for the recess under the impression that no business of importance would require their attendance; but, when open rebellion was known to have broken out, surely the House ought to have given to the Crown its assurance of support. No reason existed why an adjournment for a few days should not have taken place, and an intimation have been given that the House would meet for the consideration of this subject,—and thereupon record the same assurance which will now he given so tardily, and, I fear, so ineffectually, that for the suppression of the revolt the Crown might implicitly rely on the support of the Legislature.

Perhaps, also, it might have been reasonably expected that a direct and formal announcement would have been made by the Crown to both Houses. But no Royal message has been delivered. We now merely know the fact that the Queen's troops have been engaged with some of her subjects in open insurrection, and that one section of these troops has been driven back by the insurgents. We see that martial law has been proclaimed, and we see that the governor of one colony has been pressing for a supply of troops from a neighbouring colony; and surely such circumstances would have justified a direct message from the Crown; but the House of Commons did not, till five o'clock this evening, receive even an indirect intimation that the Queen's troops had been in collision with the people. It appears, that before the adjournment of the House of Commons no accounts whatever had reached us of the result of the expedition under Colonel Gore; and it was not until to-night that the House of Commons were informed of the result of the engagement which took place between those troops and a large body of persons acting in open violation of the laws, and opposing the forces, of her Majesty. It is no answer to say that the despatches had not arrived, and that there had been no previous opportunity of communicating their contents. But it is not of this that I am complaining, especially; but I complain that the Crown did not send any message to the House, stating the circumstances attending the revolt, and soliciting the aid and support of the House of Commons in endeavouring to put it down; and I will venture to say that, in the history of this country, no event of so much importance as the insurrection in Canada has taken place, without its having been deemed necessary to communicate the fact specifically to the House of Commons, not by means of the publication of papers alone, but by means of a message from the Crown, in which a solicitation for support has been included. Now, to show that this has been the practice, I will begin with the events of the American war, and all the unfortunate transactions which took place with reference to that struggle for independence. In 1774, the memorable disturbance took place in Massachusetts, and the riots also broke out in Boston. Parliament was aware, at that time, of the unfortunate differences existing between that colony and this country, from the reports which had reached them; but the notoriety of the matter was not considered a sufficient reason to relieve the Crown from the necessity of making a formal communication of the facts to both Houses of Parliament, and a message was accordingly delivered, setting forth the circumstances, and soliciting the aid of Parliament in suppressing the disturbances which prevailed. The occurrences in Boston also took place in 1774; but they formed the ground of a distinct message from the Crown, and of a distinct application for the support of Parliament. The case of the rebellion in Ireland, in 1797, was another instance, the facts of which were perfectly notorious, and had actually even been the subject of discussion in the House, before they were introduced to its notice on the 1st of June, having been brought forward by Mr. Sheridan; but still, on the 1st of June, the Houses had a notification conveyed to them, by a message, that the rebellion had broken out, and their support was prayed. Taking the whole case of the Irish rebellion, before the year 1798, — in the year 1797, when Lord Camden was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, before the rebellion had developed itself; when disturbances, however, prevailed in Ulster, and when assemblages of armed people had already taken place, — the Government did not then leave the Irish Parliament to collect the circumstances from the public papers which were published, and the rumours which were afloat; but by a message they informed them of the whole of the facts, and prayed their support. In 1797, when the apprehension of two committees of the United Irishmen, in Belfast, had taken place, the same course was pursued; and, in 1798, on the 22d of May, before the rebellion actually broke out, a communication was conveyed from the Crown to both Houses, through the medium of the Lord Lieutenant. Then, again, in 1803, when there were no separate Houses of Parliament in Ireland, the Crown made a distinct appeal to the Imperial Parliament, by way of message. The substance of the message, on the subject of the rebellion, was, that his Majesty felt the deepest regret in acquainting the House of Commons that treasonable and rebellious opinions had been shown to exist in Ireland, and that his Majesty relied, with the most perfect confidence, on the wisdom of the steps which the House would take to afford protection to his Majesty's Irish subjects, and to secure the general tranquillity of the country.

Here, Sir, I ask, why has this course, hitherto apparently considered so necessary, been departed from? Why, when a revolt has taken place in Canada, sufficient to justify the suspension of all civil law, — to justify the declaration of martial law, — and to justify the interference of the military power to support the civil officers, — why, in such a case, has not the Crown thought it fit and necessary to make a communication to Parliament; and to confide to them the circumstances of this melancholy exigency, in obedience to strictly analogous precedents, and in a course which the whole stream of the practice hitherto adopted calls for and demands? There will not, I believe, be found a single instance of any case like the present, in which the Crown has left it entirely to Parliament to collect materials, and to determine upon the circumstances, without a direct communication. I am quite aware that there was, in the Queen's Speech, at the commencement of the Session, some reference to the affairs of Canada, but there was none whatever to the revolt, which, in fact, had not then commenced; and the Speech itself was delivered by her Majesty diverso intuitu. The paragraph alluded only to the events of the last Session, and in no way relieved Ministers from the necessity of making a formal communication to Parliament on the subject of a matter so important. Still, what I have thus urged as an objection to the proceeding, is to the form rather than to the substance of it.

[Loud cries of "Hear!" from the Ministerial Members.]

What then? Do Honourable Gentlemen really so much undervalue this point of form, when her Majesty's subjects, in one part of her empire, are in open insurrection against her authority — when a colony is at stake — when her Majesty is known to be about to increase her troops, and martial law is proclaimed in that colony — do they really think that, at such a juncture, a departure from the uniform course of forms and precedents did not look too much like undervaluing the importance and exigency of a great question like this, which it was obviously necessary to lay fully and distinctly before the Legislature, for their consideration?

[Loud cheers from the Opposition.]

The main question no doubt is, whether it is fitting for the House of Commons to give its cordial support to the Crown in a case like this, where the object is the suppression of rebellion. I never felt more convinced of the necessity of deciding a question with grave consideration, without passion, and, as far as our limited capacities may enable us, with a thoughtful forecast of the consequences which will flow from this proceeding; and it is not without due consideration of the circumstances, and an anxious and most serious reflection on the whole case, that I have come to the conclusion of offering my most cordial support to the Crown in the steps which are, as I understand, about to be taken in the attempt to suppress this revolt.

The Honourable Gentleman who last spoke has suggested considerations which I admit to be of great importance. He said, that the majority of the people of Canada are disaffected to the British Government, and he argues that, therefore, they ought to be released from their allegiance. He contended, that the more conciliatory the intentions of the Colonial Government had been, the greater must be considered to have been their failure; and the greater should be the apprehension that it would be impossible to establish mutual goodwill and harmony in the relations between the colony and the parent State. I admit the importance of these suggestions; but, at the same time, I must be permitted to ask, whether the principles which the Honourable Gentleman has laid down are to be applied to the whole empire? Let the House think of the whole colonial empire of Great Britain, — let it think, not alone of our possessions in North America, but of those in India, in Europe, and in the other quarters of the globe; — and then, let it not forget the extent to which this principle might be applied. The principle thus laid down is, — that on the first exhibition of dissatisfaction on the part of a colony, and on the first resort to arms to quell any disturbances which may have taken place, — that on the first expression of dissatisfaction with our government, and the first instance of resistance to our authority, — we should act, as upon a signal for abandoning our pretensions of superiority; and that it will be better for the mother country, thereupon, immediately to dissolve all connection with the colony. Now let me, for a moment, put the strongest case:—suppose Canada were an island, without any relations with any foreign state, which could act on those relations; would this country, after having acquired possession of that colony, by a series of brilliant conquests, and retained it for about seventy years, — would this country, after manifesting, unequivocally, her intention at least of doing equal justice to the people of Canada, — hold herself prepared, because that people, or a portion of them, happened to be dissatisfied, at once to relinquish it, and to give up all interest in and power over it?

If we lay down such a principle at all, can it be limited to a particular colony — or to colonies in general? Why might not the same reasoning, if it be true, as regards a colony, be equally applicable with regard to the integral parts of the British empire; and why might it not, with equal force, apply to all descriptions of persons? Why might it not extend to any one part of England which should think fit to declare its dissatisfaction with the government of the day? "The fact of dissatisfaction with our government," as the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Grote) contends, "is sufficient to show that the colony has been misgoverned; and then," he asks, "what is the good of ruling over discontented subjects?" Why, Sir, if we were to act on such a rule of public conduct, the glory of England would, in ten years, be utterly annihilated. All the mighty influence which we possess, in virtue of our vast colonial establishments, an influence which, as the Noble Lord has truly observed, is supported by our commercial marine,—all the enormous power we derive from our navy,—will soon pass away, and England, from the foremost rank which she now occupies among the nations of the earth, would descend to the situation of a subordinate and a fifth-rate power. Suppose the doctrine in question to be allowed to apply to some island not connected with the British empire; would it, even then, be applicable to the case of Canada? I think it would not be so. But, now — can Canada be considered otherwise than as a portion of this empire? And if not, would it be possible to apply the principle to the Canadians, considering their relation with other parts of the British empire in North America? First of all, there appears to be no reason for believing that the dissatisfaction which is represented to exist, especially in the Lower province, is either so general or so positive, — so fixed, or so deeply rooted, — as to leave no reasonable hope of its being got over by ultimate permanent arrangements. I have, to-night, and for the hundredth time, heard from some Gentlemen opposite, nothing but expressions of regret as to what the Noble Lord and his Friends have said and done, in reference to their exclusion of all Conservative Gentlemen from the Government, not on account of financial and domestic matters only, but of a thousand other causes. The House cannot but remember that the utmost delight was manifested, on the other side, at my exclusion from office. Yet, to-night, from that side of the House, we have been distinctly told that if the Conservatives had remained in office, the interests of the country would have been much better managed than they have been by her Majesty's present Government. Yes, Sir, to-night the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has declared, that he has no doubt if Lord Aberdeen had continued in office there would have been no insurrection in Canada.

["Hear, hear," from the Opposition benches.]

But there are two corollaries which may be deduced from this declaration; and the first of these is, that nothing could have been more factious and unprincipled than the opposition which effected my Noble Friend's expulsion.

[Cheers from the Opposition.]

"See," says the Honourable Gentleman, "the enclosure in Lord Aberdeen's despatch; that will show that there was every disposition on the part of that Government to make any concessions that might be consistent with the integrity and honour of the British empire." If, then, Lord Aberdeen had remained in office, this question would never have been brought forward. It was wrong, therefore, that his Lordship should have been excluded from office. But if these consequences never would have arisen had he remained in office, would it not be just, since our policy has been approved of, to give us another trial?

[Loud cheering from the Opposition.]

Will it not be unwise to apply the principle of separation with respect to the Canadas because there have been at Richelieu and St. Denis some slight insurrection or excesses? The Honourable Gentleman opposite says, at once, "Shake them off, for their connexion henceforth will become grievous and burdensome;" but I say, "No: try first those counsels which you admit might, if they had been carried out, have prevented these disturbances."

[Cheering from the Opposition.]

The Honourable Gentleman cannot deny this admission, for he has read an extract from Lord Aberdeen's letter, in which his Lordship refers to the grievances complained of in Canada, and points out means which he thinks may redress them; and the Honourable Gentleman's conclusion is, that had such principles predominated over this question it might have been settled,—not, indeed, by a hostile course, but by one that would have conciliated and satisfied the Canadians. There may be some who will say, that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has been indiscreet—that he does not see the force of his own admissions; but the Honourable Member for London also shares in his condolence. He, also, has one bright example—one great exception—to adduce; for he laments that Sir George Murray has not remained in office; and, moreover, that Sir James Kempt has not continued Governor. "If," said the Honourable Gentleman, "Sir George Murray had remained in the Colonial Department, and if the principles he has expressed had been allowed to predominate, the financial question in respect to these colonies would have been settled." But, I will ask, what is the question to-day? Is it not one of finance? Yes, it is one of feeling, but it is also one of finance. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny then deplored the exclusion of Lord Aberdeen from office, because the course he proposed would have conciliated the Canadians, and the Honourable Member for London, a consummate judge on such questions, deplores the exclusion of Sir George Murray, because the policy he adopted would have removed all their financial grievances.

This, then, surely affords collateral proof,—first, of a most factious combination to exclude honest and well-intentioned and successful Ministers, as we were, from power; and, secondly, the proof that we ought not lightly to dispose of these colonies, because unwise men may have succeeded us, whose policy has increased those disturbances; that it does not, therefore, follow, that there has not been room for the legitimate hope of settling this question by mild and conciliatory measures. But, even supposing the principle of the Honourable Gentleman to be applied to a separate dependency, such as Jamaica, I must nevertheless deny its application. Is this great country prepared to say to the people of a colony, on the first manifestation of any rebellious feeling, "Separate from us, and establish a government for yourselves," instead of recalling them to their duty? I think not; and that, on the contrary, the application of this principle is perfectly inadmissible. But if it applies to so distant an island as Jamaica, it will apply also to any one that is nearer,—even to those that are most contiguous to this country; for instance, the Isle of Wight. Suppose the people of the Isle of Wight should think fit to say, "We are satisfied, from the conclusions we have drawn from the rules of that philosophy that has lately been taught, that republics are as fit for small communities of 50,000 or 60,000 men, as they are for communities of millions; we wish to try our hands at a small republic, within sight of France, which shall be without taxation. There are several small Italian republics which we can show you, that are better managed than larger countries; and therefore, as we are separated from England by the Channel, and do not like your constitution, and have objections to your taxation, we will form ourselves into a small republic." Or, again, suppose this were said of the Isle of Man. If this principle be applicable at all, it is so with respect to those places that are the very keys of our security, but in which you ought, by this reasoning, at once to resign all interest or property. But the Honourable Gentleman, foreseeing that the Isle of Wight might be a temptation to France, and might ultimately fall under her power, would find it convenient to say, "No, we cannot permit you, the Isle of Wight, to separate from us; you are essential to our security, from your contiguity to Portsmouth, which you protect, and therefore England cannot admit of your separation." If, however, the Honourable Gentleman's principle be good in one case, it ought to be so in all. Now, in considering the case of Canada, some peculiar circumstances are to be taken into consideration which especially regard the political and local relations of the two provinces of which that colony is composed. Surely it is our duty to consider the consequences of a separation from the mother country, as they may affect our colonies in the immediate neighbourhood of Canada. If even it could be foreseen that on Canada erecting herself into an independent state, she would be wholly unable to maintain herself in a quarrel with the United States; and, on the first bonâ fide quarrel in which she might be involved with the United States, might fall to them, and be annexed to their other territories by the right of conquest; and, consequently, that our fellow-subjects in our British American colonies would thus be separated from each other;—we should still be bound, not only by the obligations we owe to the Canadians, but by those which we owe to every other part of the empire in the adjacent territories where British interests have been settled, and now flourish under the faith of British protection, to preserve the rights of those colonies, of which Canada, again, may be stated to be the key.

Suppose, now, that the Government should permit Lower Canada to establish herself as an independent state. What are you to do with the navigation of the St. Lawrence? Suppose, again, that the inhabitants of the neighbouring provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island were to say this: "We have emigrated hither and made settlements here, on the faith of your assurance that Canada was to remain in a subordinate position to, but as a portion of the empire of Great Britain. You gained it by brilliant conquest; and a treaty of peace, which ceded it to England, was signed, that has now existed upwards of seventy years, and you instituted a form of government there with the best intentions for the advancement of the colony; but although that government has not been successful, we decidedly object to the sacrifice of our own interests by your permitting the establishment of an independent American State, which may at any time stop up and prevent our communications with Upper Canada, and close the only outlet for its produce." I maintain, therefore, that the independence of Canada is not a simple abstract question, but one which cannot be fairly or politically considered separate and apart from the case of our other North American colonies. It appears that the situation of Canada, her geographical locality, and the physical aspect of the other colonies of this country in North America, must be considered together. This House and Her Majesty's Government can only look at Canada as an independent state, when the position of those other colonies of North America can authorise them to be considered as independent states. And what right have you to determine this connection between the colonies and the mother country, if the former have expressed themselves favourable to its continuance? The former, however, are prepared to perform all their duties to this country as colonies; and, therefore, I maintain that it would be the highest absurdity, on the part of England, to allow such connections to be lightly broken, or to overlook the impolicy of making the navigation of the St. Lawrence dependent on the permission of a new republic, whose boundary would be conterminous with the frontier of the United States. On this double ground I think it is incumbent on this country, for the honour of the British Crown, for the interest of the British dependencies, as well as of Great Britain herself, not to permit this revolt to be triumphant, or the British standard to be lowered in subjection to the successful efforts of a M. Papineau. At the same time I think it necessary to say, that I shall give my cordial assent to this address, though I must state that I do not mean thereby to imply any approbation of the course which has been pursued by his Majesty's Government throughout these proceedings;—I shall give, I repeat, an unhesitating and unqualified support to this address, from the firm conviction which I entertain (and this is a most essential motive) that this country has acted liberally and fairly towards Canada. It is impossible to look at the correspondence which has been laid upon the table, from time to time, and not to say that, occasionally, there have not existed some grave grounds of complaint. But how is it possible that it should be otherwise? How is it possible that even at home this country could maintain its authority and dominion, if on the first statement of every little grievance resort were to be had to arms?

I will not pretend to deny that during the late war the affairs of Canada may have been somewhat neglected, and that there may, sometimes, have been just cause of complaint; but of late years the affairs of Canada have been recognised as matters of essential importance, and I have never known an instance in which a mother country has manifested a greater desire to do justice to a colony, and to observe a conciliatory line of conduct towards it, than has been exhibited by this country in its treatment of Canada. In a passage of the address of the Assembly of Lower Canada, which has been already referred to by the Noble Lord opposite, it is stated that the Report of the committee of this House of the year 1828 which sat on the affairs of Canada, and the recommendations embodied in it, furnished "imperishable monuments of the justice and liberality of this country" in the consideration of those matters. But I beg the House to recollect, that Lord Aberdeen not only acted up to the recommendations of that committee of 1828, but went beyond those recommendations, in the course which he pursued; and in every case in which those recommendations were not acted upon, the delay arose not from the Government at home, but with the Canadians themselves. It is useless, therefore, now to discuss the question, whether or not, in recent years, this House has manifested a disposition to attend to Canadian questions. There is an end to the assertion that no such disposition has been shown. At the same time I am not the less prepared to admit that the habits, the feelings, the prejudices of the people of that country, are not like the prejudices, the feelings, the habits which actuate us here; and therefore large allowances ought to be made by us for the conduct which the Canadians, under their influence, have pursued. But these considerations relieve me from doubt or difficulty in the case before us; and I say that, convinced of the justice of our cause, of the folly that on any such allegations of grievances at least as are to be found in any part of the papers which have been laid before us, men should have proceeded to these lengths, — to organise revolt against the British authority, to commit high treason, to resist the authorities and the military power and the civil power, and the execution of warrants against those who stood charged with offences against the state, and with inciting the people to rebellion;—convinced as I am that if the authority of the Crown is to be maintained, either in Canada or at home, this revolt must be suppressed;—I shall, I repeat, give my unhesitating and unqualified support to the address which has been moved by the Noble Lord, and to whatever measures, at whatever hazard, may be necessary to carry the objects of that address into full effect. But I cannot imply, by that support, either general confidence in her Majesty's present Government, or (which, indeed, I am most anxious to guard myself against being supposed to feel) any approbation of the course which that Government have adopted in reference to this great question.

Sir, had it not been for what the Noble Lord has said in the course of his speech on opening this debate, this is a part of the question which I should have been content to pass over in utter silence. But it has pleased the Noble Lord to challenge these observations by a reference to the documents on the table, on which documents he went on to claim our approbation for the conduct of her Majesty's Ministers in the whole of this affair. I say that, upon these papers, it is clear that some measures of precaution were neglected, which might have been taken by the Government to prevent this revolt. But before, I come to this conclusion, I am recommended by the Noble Lord carefully to look through the papers which have been printed, and see whether, or not, the authorities in Canada complain of any want of military force in that country. Sir, I know not with whom the blame may really lie; but this I must say, that, after passing the resolutions of last year in relation to Canada, and looking to all the excitement and angry feeling which might naturally be anticipated as likely to arise in Canada after their adoption, somebody in power, either at home or in Canada, might, surely, have anticipated that some such result was very likely to follow, as this.

Yes, that is my impression. What they have to say for bringing in their resolutions, and not bringing in a Bill at the same time, when they related to the appropriation of the money of the people, actually to compel the payment of that money, — I know not; but surely never could a more delusive hope have been entertained by any Government, than to suppose that anything like a satisfactory issue could result from the passing of those resolutions. On what notion was it that you could "lay that flattering unction to your souls," that those resolutions would not increase the disaffection of the Canadians? If you did right in bringing forward those resolutions, why did you not follow out their spirit and their object by passing an Act founded upon them, immediately afterwards? If you did wrong, why did you persevere in pressing them on? Did you, the Government, imagine that you could pass those resolutions, declaring that the British Legislature could not trust the House of Assembly of Lower Canada with the management of the public funds of that important colony, although you did not go on to follow up such resolutions by passing a Bill in conformity with them,—without producing much of angry excitement and irritation in the province? For my part, I firmly believe that such a Bill might have passed last year. Any delay was most prejudicial. I consider that it has actually proved to be, in this instance, very unfortunate. I hold that you did very wrongly in not carrying your Bill through, before the recess, at once. Any delay like that which you have permitted was sure to encourage a belief on the part of the Canadians, that at home you were too weak to enforce your resolutions. Accordingly, the result has been to induce them to venture upon these evil courses under that fatal persuasion. There was not the slightest prospect that any delay in passing the Bill embodying your resolutions would conciliate the Canadians. Her Majesty's Government, on the contrary, immediately after passing those resolutions, might, I still think, have expected some such result as an insurrection. Exactly the same course was taken by the British Government of that day with the celebrated "Stamp Act." You passed the resolutions sanctioning the imposition of a stamp duty in what were then our American colonies, a Session before you brought in the Bill which was to give effect to them; and that Government contended, just as you did last month, that an objectionable mode of proceeding would be obviated by bringing forward the resolutions and postponing the Bill! Those Ministers said, almost in your own words, "that they hoped that that course would be a warning to our North American fellow-subjects, and that they felt confident the Bill would be unnecessary." The same result, however, then ensued as has happened in this case; for, by thus formally calling in question the authority of the local Legislature or Assembly of the colony, an insurrection was excited against the mother country. I therefore say, that from those resolutions, inasmuch as they related to the appropriation of money, her Majesty's Government might have expected increased disaffection among the Canadian population. In addition to this consideration, on whom were her Majesty's Government to rely for support? Why, on another party, who were also dissatisfied with the treatment they had experienced. But, then, says the Noble Lord, "what good would have arisen from this?" I know not. But I know what is the picture I find of the country, drawn so lately as the 12th of October, in one of these very papers. The writer says (I quote from a despatch of the Governor): —

> Some of the immediate fruits of the system now in operation, which, if not put down, must lead to the worst consequences, are to be seen in the apathy and inaction of such of the magistracy and persons of property who had not joined the revolutionary party; in the extreme difficulty of obtaining accurate and available information of what is passing; and, judging from recent events, in the little probability, even if evidence of sufficient weight could be procured to arraign the offenders, of a jury, taken from the district of Montreal, finding bills and convicting on them.

Thus did the Governor think it right to represent the inadequate power of the local Government! Such was, at this time, the state of the colony! In this manner was loyalty discouraged! Now let us see the way in which they have cherished those true men whom we are now thanking for their loyal conduct, — who have turned out to supply the place of the regular troops, and who were immediately denounced as Tories and Orangemen. Again, he says, —

> It is proper I should represent to you the inadequacy of the powers at the disposal of the general Government for meeting the difficulties that surround it. The law fails to afford its support; the civil authorities become, therefore, impotent; the Habeas Corpus Act cannot be suspended; the clergy, though well disposed and loyal, are reluctant to come forward. Any further appeal to the present Parliament would not only be inexpedient and useless, but positively injurious, and a dissolution offers no prospect of a more reasonable House of Assembly, nor any hope that the new House, which would be composed of a majority of the old members, would recede, in any particular, from the demands so pertinaciously insisted on by the present body. Indeed, a dissolution, if decided on at all, should not, at any rate, be resorted to before the whole of the arrangements and measures which you have in contemplation respecting this province, shall have passed into law and be perfected. In such circumstances, and seeing that the Imperial Parliament has solemnly and unequivocally stated that it will not accede to the Assembly's demands, I am forced, however reluctantly, to come to the conclusion that the only practical course now open for conducting the affairs of the province with any benefit to the inhabitants generally, is at once formally to suspend the present constitution, which both parties unite in confessing cannot now be worked, and which has, in fact, for the last twelve months, been virtually suspended; to increase the military force, and to strengthen the hands of the Executive, now almost impotent for any good and useful purpose.

Such is the lamentable state of this colony, in which, during a long period, the loyal inhabitants, as I have said, have been discouraged by the authorities. True it is, that they are now recognised in their real character; but at one time they were taunted in the manner and with the epithets I have described, when they were called on to stand forward and take the place of those troops which we ought to have sent, but did not send, to Canada. Let me once more refer to this document, to show, more specifically, the nature of the treatment to which these loyal inhabitants of the provinces were exposed.

> The mode of proceeding adopted for keeping up and increasing this feeling, is by parading, nightly, in the town of Montreal, large and organised bands of men, who, however, have as yet proceeded to no acts of violence or breaches of the peace; by inflammatory speeches at meetings; by seditious publications and resolutions of the central committees; by placing (in the most disturbed of the rural parishes) those who are loyal and hold opposite political opinions under a species of excommunication, and keeping them in dread of nocturnal injuries > to their property; by burning in effigy those in higher stations, and by subjecting them to a kind of annoyance, called a charivari, which is the assembling of a crowd before their doors, for the purpose of alarming them and their families at night with uncouth noises, hisses, threats, and other manifestations of popular displeasure. Sir John Colborne, the Honourable Mr. Debartzeh, and others, have been exposed to this kind of outrage, which, in a recent instance at St. Denis, in the county Richelieu, was unhappily attended with loss of life and property.

Such, then, was the mode in which the loyal portion of the population of the Canadas was disheartened — I should rather say discouraged; and surely they should never have been left, after those resolutions of last year had passed your House, without powerful military support and co-operation. The only way effectually to discourage true men of this character is, to be sure, to leave them without any adequate military assistance to protect them from such scandalous excesses. The Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) may ask again, if he pleases, whether any such military force had been required by the authorities in the colonies? Why, Sir, on this subject Lord Glenelg, himself, was so satisfied—so convinced—that the passing of those resolutions would increase the already avowed discontents of the Canadians, that, on the 6th of March, he wrote to Lord Gosford, stating that two additional regiments should be sent out to Nova Scotia from the colony. On the 12th of March he writes word, that he finds that the despatch of these would be so inconvenient, and the demonstration consequent upon the introduction of such a force would be so inexpedient, that the disadvantages would more than counterbalance all the possible benefits of such a proceeding. It is pretty evident, however, that this was not Lord Gosford's opinion. Lord Gosford, at a subsequent period, stated, so far from the presence of an additional military force there being attended with inconvenience, that he wrote to the governer that the arrival of a regiment in Canada, from New Brunswick, had been attended with the greatest possible benefit. But was the arrival of Sir John Colborne inconvenient? Did that demonstration of force prove disadvantageous? Why, the papers which have been laid upon the table of the House show that the measures of Sir John Colborne were absolutely necessary; for, in one portion of those papers he states, that the troops, which he himself had sent for, had not arrived in consequence of the advanced period of the year, although three expresses had been sent forward by him to hurry their march. It was generally understood, that the militia could not be called out to act, unless in the case of a war with the United States, — under the existing law. If, then, it was impossible, as it appears to have been, to procure, at certain periods of the year, any augmentation of troops from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick — (I care not what defence may have been set up, but this I shall continue to maintain, whatever opinions may have been given by others on the subject) —there must have been a lamentable want of foresight, either on the part of the Colonial Government, or the Home Authorities, when they passed such resolutions, influencing, as those of last year did, the state of all classes of the Canadian community, without taking care to secure to the loyal inhabitants of the province the support of an efficient force; thus leaving those inhabitants—an innocent and rural population, who were, of themselves, not disposed to revolt—to the machinations of the disaffected and designing. I know that it may be asserted by some, who imagine that they take a more extended view of the subject than I do, that permanent evil is likely to result from this rebellion. I do not agree in that opinion, although I believe that the insurrection has arisen from certain disaffected persons, whose arts have been brought to bear upon a people naturally unsuspicious and quiet. I trust that the insurrection will speedily be put down. The information, however, as to the extent of the insurrection, is not, as communicated by Lord Gosford, at all satisfactory or conclusive; for, in one despatch, he states, that the feelings of disaffection extend to so few that none need entertain any alarm at their progress; yet, in another despatch, dated only the next week after that which I have just now quoted from, his Lordship says, that "the communication with the troops which have been called upon to act in the disturbed districts, and to put down this sudden and extensively combined revolt, have been completely interrupted by the armed peasantry, assembled at different points in the line of march, and that the Queen's troops cannot move without having an enemy on their flank and rear."

With such evidence as this before me, will any man presume to tell me that blame does not rest somewhere? Sir, I say it was the duty of the Government to have been ready, after these indications, with such an overwhelming military force as might have crushed the rebellion, when it manifested itself, in the bud, and at once. They ought to have so ordered affairs, that there should have been the required means immediately available, to meet the exigency whenever it might arise. But when I see the varying and inconsistent communications of Lord Gosford to the Government at home,— his views changing from day to day,— now viewing the insurrectionary movement as confined to a few agitators,— now treating it as an extensive and organised combination throughout the greater part of the colony,— I am the less surprised at the vacillation and uncertainty which have marked the proceedings of her Majesty's Ministers in this matter. I very much agree with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny in one observation which fell from him in the earlier part of this debate. I think, with him, that the main responsibility rests, in this instance, with those who have induced a well-intentioned and a harmless people to plunge into a revolt,— and as I, in my conscience, believe,— happily a most hopeless revolt. There might be, by possibility, some palliation for their rushing into these courses under other circumstances. Whether that plea could avail them or not, morally speaking, had there been any chances of success in their favour, I will not inquire. But, in this case, when I see what is the very different aspect of these transactions,— when I have the evidence comprised in these printed papers, to the generous feelings of the loyal British inhabitants of the colony,— when I see that, in the province of Upper Canada, which the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Hume) has represented as being discontented and turbulent, the attachment of the British race to British connection is so decided, and a regard for the interests of the British crown so general, that the attempt at insurrection within that territory has been at once suppressed, without the presence of a single soldier of the Queen's service (all the regular force having been sent to Lower Canada);— when I see all this, I ask, what can they plead, of whom I must say, that they have manifested the most gross ignorance of their own prospects of success, when they embarked in the guilty project of involving an open-hearted and simple-minded population in such an insurrection as that of Canada? And when I heard the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume), with manly candour, and in terms of just reprobation, condemning those whose inflammatory language and rash precipitation had induced others to break out into this insurrection, my eye happened to glance at the following passage from the Report of the Committee of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada:—

> It appears from letters of Mr. Joseph Hume, addressed to some of the Ministers of the Crown, that he is desirous of representing himself as the agent, or, at all events, as being authorised to express the sentiments of the people of Upper Canada, on the subject of their political feelings, and the public affairs of the province. Your committee are of opinion that the honour and character of his Majesty's loyal subjects in the province require that it should be promptly and emphatically declared by their representatives, that Mr. Hume is among the last men they would select to advocate their cause, or represent their feelings or wishes to the British nation. The people of Canada recollect that, in the year 1834, Mr. Joseph Hume addressed a letter to a correspondent of his in this country, which, referring to his correspondent's recent expulsion from and re-election to the Assembly, contained the following treasonable language and advice:—"Your triumphant election on the 16th, and ejection from the Assembly on the 17th, must hasten that crisis which is fast approaching in the affairs of the Canadas, and which will terminate in independence, and freedom from the baneful domination of the mother country, and the tyrannical conduct of a small and despicable faction in the colony. The proceedings between 1772 and 1782, in America, ought not to be forgotten; and, to the honour of the Americans, and for the interest of the civilised world, let their conduct and the result be ever in view."

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from all sides of the House.]

And this, Sir, was the language which, in the year 1834, was addressed by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny to a recently expelled member of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada. How grossly he miscalculated the feelings and the loyalty of the inhabitants of the upper province, may be inferred from the following passage of the same document:—

> And when it is remembered with what indignation and disgust the publication of this detestable communication was received throughout the province, his Majesty's loyal subjects cannot but regard with abhorrence the idea that the person who had thus insulted them, should be supposed by their Sovereign, and their fellow-subjects in the United Kingdom, to be their accredited agent, that they held any communication with him, or that he was in any way clothed with authority to speak their sentiments, or represent their views, on any subject, public or private.

This, then, is the indignant declaration of the people of Upper Canada, through their representatives. Suppose we had applied the principle contended for, and the advice which has been given by the Honourable Member for London (Mr. Grote), as to colonies which have indicated any desire of separation, to this province of Upper Canada; — suppose we had credited the broad assurance of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that Upper Canada was ripe for revolt, — the same indignation, but in greater measure, with which the inhabitants of Upper Canada regarded the letter of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, would have been poured out upon you, the Legislature and Government of this great country, for your abject pusillanimity. And who was the correspondent to whom the Honourable Member for Kilkenny addressed this inflammatory language, urging upon him to bear in mind, and never to lose sight of, the successful struggles against British authority in those provinces now comprehended in the United States? It was that very Mackenzie, who has since made an ineffectual attempt on the loyalty of this province of Upper Canada, during the absence of her Majesty's troops, — that Mr. Mackenzie who now may well quote the authority of the Honourable Member for his proceedings, and say to the British Legislature, holding before them this letter, —"I acted upon the authority of one of your own body, now the Honourable Member for Kilkenny; visit not, therefore, this delusion on me, nor hold me to its consequences, who have been the mere agent and instrument of another; but visit them rather on your own Member, to whom I gave credit, not as to an obscure individual, but as one of the then Members for your metropolitan county, — for an adequate knowledge of British interests, and an intimate acquaintance with British feelings and opinions. I have been betrayed by the advice which I received from the Honourable Member for Middlesex; and, in apportioning the punishment to which I must be subjected for my misdeeds, I desire you to remember his own emphatic declaration" (that declaration which the House of Commons has heard from him this evening), "that the real responsibility for these revolts against authority rests, not with the humble executive agents, but with those who have given advice, and offered suggestions, disparaging to the interests and authority of their own country, and destructive to the integrity of the British empire."

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Although the Right Honourable Baronet who has just sat down has expressed his intention of voting in support of the address, which has been moved by my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, and although there was that in the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet in which I entirely and completely concurred; still there were some observations made by the Right Honourable Baronet in the course of that speech, — some remarks upon the past conduct of the Government with which I have the honour to be connected, — which I think should not be permitted on the present occasion to pass altogether without notice. The Right Honourable Baronet commenced his speech by dwelling, at a length hardly in proportion to the importance of the point, upon the mode of proceeding adopted by her Majesty's Government on the present occasion; and on his objection, — that the Government should think it proper to proceed in this question upon the mere presentation of papers, instead of upon a formal message from the Crown. The Right Honourable Baronet himself seemed to feel that this was a mere difference in form; and that the presentation of papers by command was, in point of fact, as satisfactory a communication of information upon such a subject as a Royal message. This being the case, I must own that the question of form, therefore, is not one of very great importance; but, for my own part, I think that, whatever advantage there may be on the one side or the other, that advantage is in favour of the course adopted upon the present occasion. For my own part, too, although I know it is necessary to adopt strong measures for suppressing the insurrection in the Canadas, I still think it proper to show some difference between the case of an insurrection by fellow-subjects, and that of a rising on the part of the enemies of the Crown.

The Right Honourable Baronet adverted to some remarks which, in the course of the discussion, have been made by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, and by the Honourable Member for the city of London, and has given the House an amusing account of the inferences which he draws from the panegyrics of those Honourable Members upon the acts of a former Administration, to which the Right Honourable Baronet himself belonged; and, in particular, he alluded to the supposed desire of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny to give the members of that Administration another chance. The Right Honourable Baronet desires the House to give another chance to the colonial administration of Lord Aberdeen —

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

Let me ask him on what grounds can he make this claim on the liberality of the House, to admit the great superiority of that Government in a wise and liberal policy, over the Government which has now the honour of serving her Majesty? The whole of the approbation which has this evening been tendered in favour of Lord Aberdeen for his conduct as colonial secretary, is founded on a minute which is printed among the papers that are now before the House. The whole object of that minute is to prove, and it does so, most conclusively, that during the administration of that party which now holds the reins of office, the grievances which were set forth in the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, which sat in the year 1828, upon the affairs of Canada, had been redressed. Now, this is the object of the minute in question, as drawn up by the Earl of Aberdeen; and I willingly give that Noble Earl the fullest credit for the great candour and liberality of feeling which has prompted him—a political opponent of those whom he succeeded in office—to affix his signature to such a document, prepared, as it evidently has been, by some person perfectly well acquainted with the details of this question.

With regard to the panegyric which was pronounced upon the merits of the colonial administration of Sir George Murray, by the Honourable Member for London, and which it pleased the Right Honourable Baronet, in the next place, to touch upon; the Right Honourable Baronet appeared to concur in, and to accept for his government, all the credit and praise which had been bestowed upon it by the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Grote), with whom he seemed distinctly to concur, in assuming that had Sir George Murray continued to hold the seals of the colonial office, the financial questions, which form so prominent a part of this business of Canada, would, ere now, have been settled. Now, it does appear to me that the Honourable Member for the city of London, cannot have read with much correctness or attention the papers which, from time to time, have been printed on this subject for the use of the House. He has read largely from the despatch of Sir George Murray; but it seems to me that he must have confined his examination of that document to the mere expressions of liberality contained in the despatch, without extending it to the acts of the Right Honourable Secretary himself, by whom the despatch was written. Now, what is the fact? The committee of the House of Commons of 1828 recommended in the strongest terms, that one great grievance, which had been constantly urged by the Canadian Legislature (namely, that they possessed no control over the colonial revenues), should be remedied by the British Parliament, by providing that the revenues arising under the Acts of 1774 should for the future be placed at the disposal of the House of Assembly. Now, what steps did Sir George Murray take — what did he do — in furtherance of this object, during the three years for which his government subsisted? Nothing; except, indeed, that in the last of those years he brought in a Bill, in a most imperfect shape; and for the remainder of the time, in spite of the liberal expressions contained in his despatches, he left the appropriation of the revenues raised in the Canadian provinces solely controlled and directed by the Treasury at home; and I have very little hesitation in saying, that if the Bill which I (acting, as I then did, under the Earl of Ripon's colonial administration) had the honour of bringing before the House, and which passed into a law in 1831,— I have little hesitation in expressing my belief, I say, that if that Bill had passed in 1828, after the Report of the Canada Committee, or even in 1829 or 1830, the result would have been very different from that which has now occurred.

It is not my intention to enter into any discussion on these points, on the present occasion; but when I hear Honourable Gentlemen on that side of the House make this sort of assertion, and when I find their admissions taken up by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Peel), and made use of with that amusing dexterity of which he is so perfect a master, and which creates impressions not justified by the real facts of the case,—I consider it only due to those who were concerned in those important affairs to make an endeavour to set the facts of each case in its true light. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, that, though he concurs in the address, he does not acquit the Government of a want of due precaution respecting Canada. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, that when the House passed the resolutions of last Session, it was the duty of Government to have despatched sufficient forces to Canada to maintain the authority of the Crown there; that it was perfect weakness and delusion in the Government, and an utter and fatal mistake, to suppose that the postponement of the Bill which was to be founded on those resolutions would prevent their having the effect of irritating the Canadians. I cannot but observe, that the Right Honourable Baronet is totally mistaken as to the reasons which operated to prevent the proceeding with that measure in accordance with the resolutions agreed to by the House. It was the anxious desire of the Government to proceed with that Bill, and we did not abandon it under a weak and miserable delusion, as he is pleased to suppose—for the Right Honourable Baronet must be aware that circumstances over which the Government had no control rendered it utterly impossible for us to go on, with any advantage, with that measure. It had been brought forward during the serious illness of his late Majesty, and on the demise of the Crown it was impossible to find in London a sufficient number of Members of this House to pass the measure in such a manner as its importance called for, and as alone could give it sufficient authority. Honourable Gentlemen who recollect the events of the last few weeks of the last Session, will bear me out in the assertion that at that time the state of the House was such as rendered it quite absurd to think of proceeding with any measures so serious in their nature as this. There was the most extreme impatience manifested on both sides of the House to conclude with the utmost despatch all pressing business then before it. These circumstances alone prevented the Government from proceeding with the Bill. But, then, admitting that those resolutions required precautionary measures, still the question which the Right Honourable Baronet has raised is, whether the Government had taken proper precautions, or not? The Right Honourable Baronet read a portion, and a portion only, of the despatch, of the 22d of March, I think, from Lord Glenelg to the Earl of Gosford.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—I referred to the despatch of the 6th of March.

LORD HOWICK.—Very well; but I apprehend that what the Right Honourable Baronet stated was, that whatever might be the soundness of the opinion that further military force was necessary, at all events, that was not the opinion of the Secretary of State. My answer to that is, that though the Secretary of State might think more troops might be wanted, still that there were those upon the spot whom he might conceive to be much better judges than he, in London, could possibly be, as to the time at which it might be advisable to send a further force into the colony. I conceived that until additional forces were actually required in the colony, their appearance might have been very possibly attended with considerable inconvenience. Nor was this apprehension a visionary one. I say that I thought it very possible that the appearance of such a force in a mere civil contest, instead of being of use or furnishing any real support to the authorities, might have had a very opposite effect; and the Right Honourable Baronet himself has read a description of the state of the colony, and of the dangers and difficulties with which the Governor had to contend. What were those difficulties? There were the resolutions passed at public meetings; there was the machinery of agitation; but there was nothing menacing open or wanton violence. True, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act might be wanted; but there was no necessity for a demand for additional forces. Regiments were not necessary to put down meetings,—they could not stop speeches. Regiments could not prevent the adoption of resolutions; neither could troops obtain juries to convict men for seditious practices. Additional regiments could not attain any one of these objects. On the contrary, the additional regiment which was sent appears to have produced considerable effect and sensation, and in the papers there will be found ample proof of this. I will refer to one of the enclosures in Lord Gosford's despatch, dated the 30th of October, 1837, giving an account of a public meeting which had been recently held, the object of which meeting was to increase the excitement that already agitated the Canadians; and one of the topics was the arrival at the time of an additional regiment in Canada, and one of the resolutions was to this effect:—"As a climax to our misfortunes, the present Governor-in-Chief has recently introduced, in time of profound peace, a large body of armed troops into this province, to destroy, by physical force, all constitutional resistance, and to complete, by desolation and death, the work of tyranny already determined upon and authorised beyond the seas."

Is it not obvious, that if an armed force was not actually wanted, its arrival before the insurrection actually took place would have been made a handle of by the factious, and would have extended the exasperation against the Government? This was the motive which induced Lord Glenelg to alter his opinion as to the expediency of sending troops to Canada. But, supposing that he did alter his opinion, did he therefore leave the governor without the means of obtaining an additional force? On the contrary, in the very despatch which the Right Honourable Baronet has quoted, in order to show that Lord Glenelg was aware that an additional force was necessary, it is stated that orders had been given to Sir Colin Campbell to forward an additional force from Halifax, on the requisition of Lord Gosford. That was the order given to Sir Colin Campbell: and I will tell the Right Honourable Baronet, that, though it is admitted that in the middle of winter no troops could be sent to Canada, there was no difficulty in detaching a force from Halifax to increase the force in Canada; and that is my answer to the Right Honourable Baronet.

It is clear, from these papers, that whatever troops might be taken from Halifax for a temporary service in Canada, would be sufficiently supplied, and in time, under the existing arrangements. Although I have felt it necessary, this being the first occasion on which the subject has been brought forward, to make these replies to the charges of the Right Honourable Baronet against the Government, I am aware that the charges, if insisted on, would; require more canvassing than would be convenient at the present moment. On a future occasion, if the charges should be pressed, I shall be able to complete the defence of the Government. There seems to me to be, on the present occasion, almost a general acquiescence in the propositions which have come from my Noble Friend. I am not aware of any substantive opposition to the motion.

Mr. C. BULLER. — If, as I fear, I am the party alluded to by the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel) as having shown, by my cheer, an insensibility with reference to his argument, founded on a laborious research for precedents, I am sorry if I have offended the Right Honourable Baronet by that cheer; but, if the Right Honourable Baronet had understood the cheer, he would have known that it meant to express my astonishment that a person of his intellectual powers should have expended so much of them on what I cannot help calling laborious trifling. The Right Honourable Baronet says, I am not sensible of the importance of the question, because I am not sensible of the importance of forms. I believe that the forms of the House have been matured with great wisdom; but I am more sensible of the importance of circumstances under discussion. A grave question like this should render us indifferent to forms. I am sorry if I judged hastily of the Right Honourable Baronet's speech, and of the part of it he considered most important; but I did think that the Right Honourable Baronet considered this opportunity most important, inasmuch as it enabled him to taunt his political opponents, and by a dexterous application of what had fallen from the Honourable Members for London and Kilkenny, to call upon them to aid him in turning out the present Ministers, and bringing back those excellent Ministers who had been removed from office by what he termed factious means. I wish to say, as a Member of this House, that it is my intention to vote, to-night, as far as I can, in support of the course adopted by her Majesty's Ministers. I must say, however, that the Noble Lord did show indications, in his speech, of a tone and spirit which did not lead me to expect any liberality on his part. But, when I had got over the little irritation at the tone of the Noble Lord's speech, and came to examine the proofs themselves, I found that I could offer no opposition to his motion. I could not offer any opposition to an address pledging the House to assist her Majesty to put down an insurrection. I do not mean to say that I would put down insurrection in every case, or that, if the British Government had misconducted itself, I would put down insurrection against it. But there is no middle course when insurrection rages; there are but two: the one course is, promptly and discreetly to yield to the claims of the insurgents, where you must acknowledge their justice; the other is, to put it down, and vindicate the majesty and authority of the law. If it be meant to consent to a separation, and leave Canada to itself, let that be done; but if it be meant that the general law should be maintained, the law must be vindicated without parleying with the insurgents, and it is the duty of Government to put down insurrection. If I were for separation, I would at once, and distinctly and unequivocally, say so; but I think there is not a shadow of ground for separation, — not a shadow of foundation for any such claim or pretension. And one ground of objection which I have entertained to the conduct of her Majesty's Ministers, and of those who oppose the claims of the Canadians, has been, that they have rather arbitrarily and unjustly assumed that their demands would lead to separation. I shall not, however, enter into the question as to this point. I have always thought that for us to accede to those demands would in nowise endanger the supremacy of the mother country. These are not questions, however which I will now discuss. I am certainly not an advocate for separation. On the other hand, I am not in favour of the old constitutions of the colonies; but I do not find that they make our colonies desirous of separation. I rely upon the wisdom of our ancestors, which, on this subject, I acknowledge; and on experience; and I hold cheap the arguments of those theorists who wish to brand me with a desire to bring about the separation of the colonies, when I wish them to have the old constitutions of Charles II.

I will not enter into the question of the value of this colony, but must maintain that it is owing to our misgovernment that the present state of affairs exists. I feel that it would be inconsistent with the interests of the colonists themselves to abandon them; but I also feel that it is our duty, at any cost, to repair the injuries which are the consequences of our own misgovernment. I would not have agreed to the proposition of the Noble Lord for putting down the insurrection, had it not been for the other part of the plan, which pledges the House to do ample justice to the inhabitants of the Canadas. And if the Noble Lord's plan had referred merely to Lower Canada, I should have been dissatisfied with it. I should have said an alteration of the present system was justly demanded as regarded an elective House of Assembly, and that we ought to grant it forthwith; but it appears to me, that the government of these colonies and of British North America in general, cannot be properly repaired without a far wider and more extensive and general scheme of legislation. It appears to me essential that we should provide something like a common system of government for the Canadas; and the only way of doing that effectually is, to alter the existing local divisions of the colonies. By what means are these plans to be carried into execution? To legislate effectually, here, in such nice matters, seems almost next to impossible. What, then, is the path to be pursued? It is clear that we should not proceed to legislate in a state of comparative ignorance on the subject. Whatever plan we may adopt, to have a prospect of success, must have the consent of the inhabitants; and with that object we must pursue some such course as is recommended by the Government; we must send out a negotiator to ascertain their wishes, — we must send out a governor with the power of conciliating and consulting the proper authorities. I am not prepared to admit the propriety of wholly suspending the constitution of Lower Canada; at the same time, I do not see that any great practical evil will result from suspending the power of the Legislative Assembly for one year, when its powers are already practically overridden by a superior authority. I hope that any plan which the Noble Lord has to explain to us will give to the people of Canada full security that their just demands will be complied with. We should bear in mind that their difficulties are greatly increased; we have now to disarm the people, to allay their discontent; and we ought to shape our measures so that, in in the first place, the people may be conciliated. That object effected, we may hope to obtain their co-operation. When the Bill is proposed, which I hope will be speedily, it will be time enough to discuss any improvements that may be suggested in it. I hope, also, that the Noble Lord (Durham) whose appointment I have heard of with great satisfaction, will repair, very soon, to a place where he is very much wanted, though it may be somewhat inconvenient to him to go immediately. I have no wish to put myself forward as the apologist of the extreme demands of the Canadians; neither am I the apologist of the revolt; but I trust that the House and the Government will recollect that the surest mode of pacification will be, to show clemency towards those who have committed themselves in the late improper proceedings, and who are now to consider themselves as vanquished. I rejoice that the insurrection has been put down, although I deeply lament the carnage and conflagration which have taken place. We may now consider that the armed resistance is at an end, at least for the time. I rejoice at this, because it appears to me to offer the opportunity of acceding, with perfect dignity and propriety, to the just demands of the people, which we cannot do without adopting a large and liberal and comprehensive scheme of government.

SIR A. DALRYMPLE. — Seeing that the resolutions were originally proposed by his Majesty's Ministers, I scarcely feel myself in a condition to find fault with the Bill before us. I have read through these papers very attentively; and this I must say, that I do not believe that, if you were to search through all the archives of all the governments of Europe, you could find greater indications of folly, weakness, wavering, and indecision, than in the papers which have been laid before the House on this subject. On the 6th of March, here is my Lord Glenelg saying that these troops, which he promises, are to be sent out. On the 22d of March following, he writes that they are not to be sent out to Canada. Is it not clear that, if the troops in question had been despatched directly, and landed at Quebec,—(and there was plenty of time to allow of their removal from Halifax for this purpose),—the traitors in Canada would have considered well and long before they raised the standard of insurrection,—if, indeed, they had not been utterly deterred from doing so?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—My Honourable Friend the Member for Liskeard appears completely to have misunderstood what I said in the course of my speech, and the tone in which I expressed that opinion, in reference to the Elective Council. The Honourable Member supposes that I have negatived every proposition for councils similar to those which existed in the old colonies; but I stated nothing to warrant that assumption. What I did say was, that I agreed with that part of the Report of the Commissioners in which they say, that, without determining whether elective councils may or may not be expedient, or whether they are or are not applicable to the North American colonies; the state of society in Canada, at any rate, is such, as renders it wholly inexpedient to introduce one there. Now, that was the extent of my objection to elective councils. But further, Sir, I would tell the Honourable Member for Liskeard, and those who think with him on this question, that, though it is between the Government, on the one side, and the people of Canada on the other, I think there may be a satisfactory settlement of this question. I shall not hold any settlement satisfactory which does not provide for the security and the interests of the great body of the British settlers and residents in Canada.

Mr. LEADER.—I do not wish to detain the House for many minutes, nor to enter at large into the general merits of the question, at this late hour of the evening. But I feel myself compelled to protest against the spirit of the address. The speech in which the address was moved contained the most unfounded charges against the Canadians and the House of Assembly; and the Bill which the Noble Lord tells us he means to bring in appears to me to be by no means the sort of Bill which present circumstances require; it contains much more of coercion than conciliation. I feel some difficulty as to the course I ought to pursue on the present occasion. If I were to oppose the address by a direct negative, it might be thought that I was giving a factious vote. The Noble Lord has signified to us no intimation of the course he intends to pursue; he has afforded no time for the consideration of a regular amendment to his address; and, in the present temper of the House, it would be almost impossible to enter into a refutation of the fallacies with which the Noble Lord's speech abounded.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!" and "Oh!"]

Sir, I would ask the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard whether that speech of the Noble Lord's, of two hours and a half, did not consist almost entirely of misrepresentations of the history and grievances of the Canadians? I state this, not on my own authority merely, but on the authority of those who are far better acquainted with the subject than myself. Unless the Noble Lord will consent to the adjournment of the debate till to-morrow, I shall consiser it to be necessary to oppose the Address by a direct negative, however factious my doing so may appear; because, if I do not, either by an amendment or a direct negative, oppose the motion, I shall be pledged to all the measures the Government may consider necessary,—measures which I fear will be not only at variance with my own sentiments, but also with the sentiments of the great majority of the people out of doors. If it be the intention of the Noble Lord to propose an amnesty, to conciliate the people of Canada, and work the redress of their grievances, then I shall have no objection to the address; but I cannot lose sight of the fact that, in his speech, the Noble Lord has arraigned the Canadian people, and told them he meant to suspend the Canadian constitution. Taking his speech in connection with the measure he has proposed; I cannot possibly vote for the address. I trust the Noble Lord will allow this debate to be adjourned till to-morrow night.

[Loud cries of "No, no!"]

If not, — if I am to be denied the opportunity of showing in what respects I consider the speech of the Noble Lord fallacious, — I must meet the address with a direct negative, and the blame will then rest on the House.

[Cries of " Go on !"]

I really think it unjust of Honourable Gentlemen not to allow the debate on so vital a question to be adjourned, in order that time might be given for a consideration of the question. I shall move that the debate be adjourned till to-morrow; and I cannot conceive what objection there can be to the adjournment I propose.

Mr. BAINES. — I second the amendment, — not with any factious motives, however, for there is no man who is less disposed to oppose the address on any such grounds than I am. I repeat, I hope it will not be supposed that I do so from any factious motive; no man in the House has shown less disposition to any factious opposition than I have; but I take this course, because I think that the present question is one of great national importance, and that we ought to address our minds to it in a manner worthy of the subject. I feel that we have been taken by surprise. No man has come down to the House on this occasion, knowing what it was he was going to discuss — knowing, beforehand, what it was he was about to vote upon: and without that information it is impossible that we can arrive at any safe result. I intreat the Noble Lord that he will afford to the House and the country a fair opportunity of discussing a matter of this vital importance. This is a question of neither more nor less than a civil war in a vast colony of Great Britain.

Mr. HUME. —The question is, whether those who have not yet had the opportunity of speaking on this debate, should have that opportunity to-morrow of doing so, and of contradicting the statements of the Noble Lord, which are full of fallacies. The Noble Lord has made many statements which I am confident cannot be sustained, and it appears as if he was afraid of allowing the lapse of the short space of twelve hours for an examination of them. He has taken the House by surprise, and he ought not to refuse us the opportunity we ask. I have no hesitation in telling the Noble Lord, that if the second part of his plan, being that for suspending the constitution of Canada, had not been proposed, I should not have made any objection to his motion; but looking at that serious question, I do think we ought not to agree to this proposition. If the Noble Lord wishes to secure an unanimous opinion on this question, he had better withdraw that part of his proposition which goes to the suspension of the Canadian constitution, and bring in a resolution stating distinctly what he recommends, with a view to the alteration of the present system, and the redress of grievances.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I hope that I shall not be considered as adopting any unreasonable course when I declare that I must oppose the adjournment. When the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Hume) talks about the House being taken by surprise, I beg to remind him that when the House last adjourned, on the last day of our meeting, last year,—I fixed this day for the disussion of the affairs of Canada; and I gave notice, at the same time, that, on the subsequent days, this subject would take precedence of other Bills. As to this particular motion, nothing could tend less to pledge the House to any specific measure than the present address. The question is simply this: whether we are, or are not, determined to maintain the allegiance of the Canadians; or whether we will at once abandon them? That is a question on which I think I may fairly ask for the decision of the House. Some Honourable Gentlemen opposite have blamed the Government for not having adopted more decided proceedings on the first moment of their receiving the first intelligence from Canada. I will not enter into that subject now, or go into any vindication of the Government, further than to say, that I think some advantage has resulted from allowing time for the arrival from Canada of more complete information, which has cleared up that which was before somewhat obscure. Time was also to be desired, in order that the papers may be considered. But when all this has been done, I think it is too much to ask for further delay. The Honourable Gentleman must be perfectly conversant with the affairs of Canada. He must recollect that when I was not able to make any speech on the subject, he himself, and his friends, availed themselves of the opportunity of a public meeting at the Crown and Anchor to express their opinion on this vital question. They stated fully their views on the subject, on authentic information which they said they had collected; and having thus gone into the matter, it is surely too much now to say that they are not able to answer the speech I have made this evening. I shall certainly consider that those who vote for the adjournment give a direct negative to the address.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Looking, Sir, to the momentous consequences of our present proceedings, I am of opinion that an opportunity for consideration ought, at all events, to be afforded to those who may not happen to have attended the meeting referred to by the Noble Lord. Considering all the consequences, as they affect the people, of the vote which may, this night, be given, I do think that to vote for the motion after a few hours' debate, without giving an opportunity to every Gentleman, who may think proper to address the House, for doing so, is rather hasty; and still more so, if we consider that this is a very important question, and that we now ask for the shortest delay possible, — for an adjournment of only a day. The Noble Lord, who thinks this matter so momentous as to require this expedition, might have called Parliament together earlier, or might have proposed a shorter adjournment; but, considering the period of adjournment, and considering the period at which the ports of Canada will be open to the passage of troops, and that a delay of a day, more or less, could in no way affect the decision of the question, — I do think that a delay of one day would be only just; and it would, also, be a great satisfaction to very many Gentlemen who are now anxious to have an opportunity of fully expressing their opinions on the subject.

Mr. D. BROWNE. — I will certainly vote for this address, if it be pressed to a division; but, at the same time, I cannot agree with the Noble Lord (Russell) in voting against the adjournment of the debate. I do not consider that it is asking too much to adjourn, for a few hours, the final decision of the House upon a question affecting so deeply the treasure and the blood of the people of this country. I must also say, that I do not think we are giving the friends of Canada a sufficient opportunity of defending the claims of the people of that country; and I regret to observe that, in my opinion, the Noble Lord is taking an unfair advantage of the support he feels that he may reckon upon in this House.

Mr. DARBY. — I must protest against being supposed, in voting for the adjournment, to vote against the address. At the same time, I am perfectly ready to vote, on principle, for the address; but I do not consider that I am acting inconsistently in voting for the adjournment.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN. — I would beg, also, to guard myself against being supposed, in voting for the adjournment, to be opposed to the address.

The question was then put, "That this debate be adjourned till to-morrow" (this day).

Ayes	28
Majority against the adjournment	160

The original question was then read, and agreed to; and the address was voted without a division.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I now rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the temporary government of Lower Canada. What I wish to do is, to bring in the Bill to-morrow (this) evening, and to have it printed, and then to fix it for a second reading on Monday. I shall likewise propose, that on days fixed for proceeding with this Bill it shall take precedence of all other business. It is also my intention, to-morrow, in case no business then stand before the House, to move that this House do adjourn till Monday.

The SPEAKER was proceeding to put the question, when

Mr. HUME said: — I protest against the Noble Lord's taking the House by surprise in this way. I supposed that the Noble Lord only intended to give notice of his Bill.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I beg to inform the Honourable Member, that it is not my intention to bring in the Bill now, but merely to obtain leave for it.

Mr. HUME. — Ay! but leave is everything.

Mr. WARBURTON. As many Gentlemen, who are not now present, might wish to speak on the motion for leave, I really think that the motion should not be made to-night.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Very well, then. If my motion for leave is to be opposed, I shall not press it now, but I give notice for to-morrow (this) evening.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE. — I beg to call the attention of the House to a subject connected with the Committee on Petitions for Private Bills. The committee, at its last sitting, adjourned to the 5th of February, not knowing that the House would meet on the 16th of January. It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to assemble the committee before the period fixed, and, even if we could do so, it might be injurious to those parties who were concerned in opposing private Bills. Under these circumstances I wish to state, that no alteration will be made respecting the period of meeting, and that the committee will meet on the 5th of February, and will sit continuously after that day.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I beg to give notice that, on Monday next, I shall move certain Resolutions with regard to obtaining more extended breviates of privates Bill, in conformity with the recommendations of the committee of last Session.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented; namely: —

Lower Canada, — By Mr. LEADER, Mr. GILLON, Mr. WAKLEY, and Mr. HALL, praying the House to refuse their concurrence and support to the war now prosecuted in Lower Canada, — from Westminster; Marylebone; St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster; Finsbury; Lambeth; chairman of a meeting at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and Whitburn.

On presenting the petition from Westminster, agreed to at a great public meeting at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Mr. LEADER said: — Sir, this petition, after stating the many grievances by which the people of Lower Canada have been driven into insurrection, expresses a hope that this House will not support the Government in coercive measures; but that they will do all in their power to restore peace by conciliation. I had the honour of attending the meeting from which this petition emanates, and I will say, that I was never present at a more intelligent, respectable, and well-conducted public meeting. The large room at the Crown and Anchor Tavern was crowded to excess, and the meeting was unanimous. I am aware that it has been stated, that very little attention ought to be paid to public meetings, and I find several of the organs of the Whig party denouncing public meetings as not expressing public opinon. There was a time is no Honourable Member present who would be disposed to dispute the immense benefits which have been derived by the people in those forms of government, in which the Executive Government has been trammelled by this responsibility. Looking at the extent of colonies which the British Crown holds in North America, as well as at the rapid increase of population, which is daily accumulating in those countries, I feel convinced that the period must and will soon arrive when their desire for separation from the mother country will become so ardent, that it will be impossible, on the pretext of preserving the independence of the Executive, to continue the connection. Under such circumstances it is clearly the business of a prudent Legislature to take time by the forelock, and lead the colonists gradually onward from a state of dependence to one of independence,—naturally brought about—in an amicable manner, instead of being effected through the agency of war and useless bloodshed,—by the very measures proposed by the parent state itself. I trust that in legislating upon this subject, the House will be influenced by these motives; and that in conceding to the colonies a new constitution, they will embrace not only the Canadas, but Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and thus establish the elements of that new confederation, producing a new balance of power, which I hope at no distant period to see established in the northern part of the continent of North America.

Mr. CAYLEY.—Notwithstanding the Honourable Member who has just sat down, at the outset of his speech, proposed to limit himself to the question immediately before the House, and to award neither praise nor blame to any of the parties concerned in Canadian transactions, I was quite sure he would deviate from the course he had laid down. In the present anxious state of the public mind,—and of the House, at this moment,—on the subject of the affairs of Canada, it is not only not surprising that we should not confine ourselves in the debate to the immediate question at issue, but it is right that we should be permitted to go into a more general line of argument, both with respect to the conduct of the colony itself, and to the policy which has been pursued by the parent country towards it. I am one of those who entertain an opinion different from that which has been expressed both by the extreme party, on this side of House, and by those who, in general, se her Majesty's Government, on the other side. Little weight can be attached to my individual opinion; but seeing the condemnation attempted to be cast upon her Majesty's Government, by some Honourable Members on this side, and the faint praise awarded to them from the other, I feel it to be my duty, as a Member totally unconnected with the Government, and as one who has gone into the subject anxiously, dispassionately, and with a determination to do justice to all parties, to offer them the humble tribute of my thanks and approbation for the course they have pursued.

Sir, the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Ward) who addressed the House last but one, seemed to think that nothing had been done for the colony of Lower Canada by the Governments of this country; that her Majesty's present Ministers had, like their predecessors, before 1828, done nothing to redress the grievances of the colony in question. Nothing can be further from the fact. Previous to 1828, in Canada as well as at home, but especially in Ireland, it is notorious that jobbing, exclusiveness, and favouritism prevailed; the discontent on account of which had gained such a head in the Canadas, as to give rise to the committee of 1828,—a committee which entered into the merits of all the alleged grievances with the greatest assiduity and fairness, and whose Report gained for the members of the committee a high tribute of commendation even from the House of Assembly in Lower Canada.

My Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department entered, last night, into a most comprehensive, just, and generous history of what had been done for this colony. My Noble Friend referred to the King's proclamation of 1763, promising the newly-acquired colony equal rights with British subjects at home; to the further privileges of the Act of Parliament of 1774; and, lastly, to the Constitution of 1791. Concessions were granted to Canada at a time when they were refused at home; when they were refused to Ireland, although her complaints were loud, and the grievances under which she laboured pressed heavily upon her. The French Canadians, by the Constitution of 1791, were left in peaceable possession of their own religion and their own ecclesiastical revenues; all the advantages of the English criminal law were bestowed upon them, while their civil laws, out of pure respect to their prejudices, remained the same. How differently was Ireland treated, which was both stronger and nearer home! In consequence of the great complaints made by the colony previous to 1828, a committee was granted, and justly granted, to inquire into these complaints of the Canadians; but what concessions, at that time, had been made at home? Had the people of this country obtained the removal of the various grievances under which they laboured? Had we, at that time, when the committee was granted, obtained either the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, Catholic Emancipation, or the Reform Bill? The Canadians, then, at least, have had equal justice, if not much more. The Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton) says, that every body agrees that the Canadians have now great grievances to complain of. No such thing. Every body knows that they had great grievances previous to 1828. What I contend for, and of which there is irrefragable evidence, is, that the committee of 1828 entered into the inquiry, and made its Report, with the full intention of doing justice to the colony, and that the various Governments of this country, since then, have endeavoured to carry into effect the recommendations of that committee. These recommendations have been carried into effect in Upper Canada; and have only failed of success in Lower Canada, because selfish popular leaders have conjured up an entirely new set of grievances, so as to obstruct the removal of the old ones. The House of Assembly in Lower Canada has itself to blame for any delay in the redress of real grievances.

The Honourable Member for Kilkenny said, last night, "Conciliate, — do not shed blood." No human being can be more averse to the shedding of blood than I am; but, on the very score of humanity, the measures now pursuing by her Majesty's Ministers must be carried out. If the colony were set free from the mother country, at this moment, in the present temper of the parties there, and with all the acerbity of feeling between the races, which has been wickedly fostered and encouraged, the inevitable consequence would be, on the showing of the parties themselves, wholesale confiscation and a war of extermination. The people in Upper Canada are altogether in favour of the continuance of British connection. The late elections incontestably prove this. It was the main question on which the elections turned. In Lower Canada, although nearly two thirds of the population is of French extraction, the shares held in canals, railroads, banks, and other public investments, are nine tenths in the hands of British settlers; whilst nineteen twentieths of the maritime commerce of the colony is also in the hands of the British. In fact, I believe there is only one instance of a commercial house being carried on by French Canadians; and even though that is nominally in the hands of French Canadians, I understand that a considerable proportion of the capital is British. Is all this property, which has been embarked on the faith and in full confidence of the protection of the British Crown, to be placed at the disposal of a party which claims a right to every thing in the colony that has been granted by the Government at home? The people of this country are too just to allow it.

And here I may be permitted to observe, how very different was the tone and temper, as well as the language employed by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, last night, from that which was used by him upon a former occasion, when he addressed the House upon this subject. The secret of this change is, I believe, to be found in the fact, that the feeling of the country has lately been unequivocally declared upon the question at issue between the Canadas and the mother country; and that feeling has been found to be directly adverse to the opinions of the Honourable Member. The recent meetings which have been called together, by persons favourable to M. Papineau's party, have been a signal failure; and the present language and tone of those of them who have seats in this House is a proof of it. It would appear that those Honourable Gentlemen had exhausted the whole vocabulary of abuse on former occasions. What was their language as well in this House, three weeks ago, as at the Crown and Anchor Tavern the other day? Certainly it was not that which was uttered last night in this House. The tone of last night appeared to be deprecatory and almost one of apology. Hitherto a species of vapouring and vaunting, and an assertion (in which "the wish, perhaps, was father to the thought") that the whole of the Canadian population would resist the mother country, characterised their speeches. Now, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has fallen back so far as to designate this outbreak as "the work of a few factious demagogues." The truth is, these Gentlemen have endeavoured to excite the people upon this subject, in which they have not merely failed, but found themselves in a miserable, insignificant, and (I use the term not offensively) a contemptible minority. A meeting held lately at Leeds gives pretty significant however, when the Whig party held very different opinions.

The SPEAKER. — Order! The Honourable Member is transgressing the rule which has been laid down; and will therefore please to bring up the petition.

LOWER CANADA.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL appeared at the bar, and having been called upon by the Speaker, said: — Her Majesty having been waited upon by certain Members of this House, who are Privy Councillors, with the Address of this Honourable House, her Majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer: —

"I thank you for the assurance that my faithful Commons will support my efforts for the suppression of revolt, and the restoration of tranquillity, in Lower Canada.

"The unfortunate events which have taken place in that province have given me deep concern, and I shall look forward with anxiety to the period when the re-establishment of order may enable me to lay the foundations of lasting peace and concord.

"The spirit which has been manifested by the loyal inhabitants of my Northern American provinces, and the exertions which they have made in support of my authority, demand my warmest acknowledgments."

DUDLEY ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Since I mentioned the subject, last evening, of the Dudley Election Petition, I have attentively looked into the Acts of Parliament, and to all the circumstances bearing on the petition; and after having most anxiously done so, in order to see whether, in a case of such extreme hardship, Parliament could not grant relief,—I have come to the conclusion that the Act is so imperative against a second enlargement of the time, that, notwithstanding the great hardship on the party, and notwithstanding that such hardship arises out of an accident over which he had no control, nevertheless there can be no remedy unless by a special Act of Parliament, a remedy which I do not wish to seek. Therefore, with the permission of the House, I will give them no further trouble on this subject, but will withdraw my notice.

Notice withdrawn.

LOWER CANADA GOVERNMENT.

The Order of the Day having been read, —

Mr. BLAIR said: — Seeing the Honourable Baronet the Under Secretary for the Colonies in his place, I wish to know whether there is any chance of relief being afforded to her Majesty's faithful subjects who are Presbyterians, in Canada, in reference to the improvement of the condition of their spiritual pastors? I put the question, now, because it appears to me that this is precisely the auspicious moment for entertaining the subject.

SIR GEORGE GREY. — There has been a very large correspondence between the Colonial Office and a committee of the Presbyterian body in Scotland on this matter; and they are assured of the desire of her Majesty's Government to do all in their power, consistently with the interests of other bodies, to give satisfaction. I beg further to say, that there will be no objection whatever to produce this correspondence, which will, I trust, convince these parties that nothing will be wanting, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to meet their views.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. LUCAS. — As the Noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland is in his place, I wish to know whether it is his intention to bring on the second reading of the Irish Poor Law Bill on the day named by him, namely, the 6th of February?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — It is my intention to move the second reading on that day.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I rise, Sir, now, to ask for leave to bring in the Bill, of which I gave notice last night, to provide for the temporary Government of Canada. As I have already explained the general purport of the Bill, and of the policy to be pursued under it, I do not think it necessary to enter at any length upon the subject at present. I will, however, shortly state the immediate objects of this Bill, and the nature of the instructions which will be given to the Governor General, who has just been appointed. The object of the Bill is to enable the Governor General and Council — that council not to be limited in number, but of which five shall be a sufficient number to constitute a quorum — on the motion of the Governor General, to pass any laws which may be considered necessary during the suspension of the present Legislature of that province. It may be necessary to pass laws and to make provisions for temporary purposes, and for the maintenance of the civil authority in that province. It may be necessary also to pass temporary measures for other purposes. It is the intention of her Majesty's Government to confide these powers, in the first instance, to Sir J. Colborne, who is at present administering the government in the lower province of Canada; and in case it should be found necessary for him to resort to any extraordinary powers of legislation, in order to re-establish the authority of the Crown in that province, the power will be given to him by this Bill to do so. But immediately after the newly appointed Governor General arrives in the province, this power will become vested in him, and he will exercise it according to the provisions of the Bill which I now propose to introduce. With respect, therefore, to the measures which are necessary in order to re-establish tranquillity, besides those powers which confer the means of immediately putting an end to the present insurrection, there will also be given a power to the Governor General, if he should think fit, to grant a general amnesty in that province. With respect to the future government of the province, it is, as I said last night, the intention of Government that the Governor General shall be invested with a power to convene a certain number of persons, (namely, three from the Legislative Councils of the Upper and the Lower province respectively, making six in all, and ten representatives from each of the provinces, making twenty representatives, to form a council,) to concert with the Governor General in making laws, and to consult with him also as to the measures which may be deemed advisable for the adjustment of those matters which have created so much of disturbance in the provinces. This is a power which may be given by the prerogative of the Crown. With respect to the persons to be named from the Legislative Council, they will be chosen by the Governor General; and with respect to the persons who are to be convened having a representative character, those persons may, of course, be chosen from the Legislative Assembly; but, as in the case of Lower Canada, it is almost impossible that the Assembly can be brought to act beneficially in the matters towards the object we have in view, it will be competent to the Governor General, both in the Upper and Lower province, to hold elections for persons, amounting to twenty in the whole, to concert with him upon the general state of affairs. Sir, as I said before, the object of this arrangement is, that in any future plan for the government of these provinces, whatever may be done may be adopted, not wholly on the authority of the Imperial Parliament, or the Government of this country, nor wholly upon the anthority of the governor of the colony, but, on the authority of the Parliament and Government of this country, with the advice and sanction of the council which it is proposed to form in the colony itself, — a body who, being well aware of the peculiar circumstances of the provinces in which they reside, may be supposed to know best what are the remedies most likely to produce that which her Majesty has declared to be the desire that she has at heart — the lasting peace and welfare of the province. I beg now to move that leave be given to bring in a Bill to make temporary provision for the Government of Lower Canada.

Upon the question being put from the chair, —

Mr. H. G. WARD said: — Sir, I am anxious to make a few observations at this early period of the debate, because, though I attended the House last night at some personal inconvenience and suffering, I failed to obtain an opportunity of expressing my sentiments, and was obliged to go away without even recording my vote on this important subject. I am the more anxious to express my sentiments now, because I was one of the minority in the various divisions that took place upon the resolutions of last Session. I opposed those resolutions partly because I considered them arbitrary and unjust in their character, but more so because I thought they could lead to no practical result. It seemed to me that they either went too far, or not far enough; that they would tend to exasperate the feelings of the Canadians, without leading to any permanent settlement of the question at issue. I think the result shows that I was not wrong in that opinion. We have irritated the Canadians; we have not done what they expected us to do, and we are just as far from a settlement as ever; whilst the province is left without any government but that of a military authority and martial law. I acknowledge, however, that this country is not alone responsible for these results. I deplore as sincerely as can any Gentleman in this House, the rash and unjustifiable appeal which has been made by the liberal party to arms. The more I sympathise with them as to their political rights, the more I deplore the fatal error which they have committed, in sacrificing, as they undoubtedly have, the powerful aid of public opinion; which in this country, most certainly, sooner or later, is sure to awake in favour of the weaker against the stronger party, whenever the former has justice on its side. All these advantages the Canadians have now sacrificed by their own reckless act; and the present question for this House to consider is, whether we are prepared to give up the possession, not only of the Lower but of the Upper province of Canada, for the secession of the latter must in my opinion inevitably follow that of the former; or whether, on the other hand, we should accede at once to all the demands of M. Papineau and his party, or sift those demands calmly and dispassionately, granting such as are just; or whether we should insist that the existing insurrection should first be put an end to, entirely, before we give any redress to grievances which are really proved to exist?

I own that if the government proposition had contemplated nothing but coercion, and a suspension of the constitution, without any remedial measures, I should have opposed it as uncompromisingly as I now strongly and earnestly advocate the prudence of adopting, in all its parts, the plan submitted by the Government to the House. I believe that plan to be founded upon just and enlarged principles, combining justice to the Canadas with a due regard to the honour and rights of the Crown. I know that objections have been taken on the ground that it imposes upon us the necessity of suspending the constitution of 1791. Why, that constitution has been de facto suspended by the Canadian people themselves. On the most attentive perusal of Lord Gosford's despatches, it appears to me, that from the moment that the Canadians determined upon an appeal to the sword, the only object they had in view in availing themselves of that constitution was to throw off the power of this country. At all their county meetings the strongest declarations have been made of the necessity for declaring perfect independence. In conjunction with these declarations, a regular military organisation has been going on through the province; drills by foreign officers sanctioned; resolutions for throwing off the jurisdiction of British authorities passed; and a new judicial system organised throughout the country in their stead;—whilst all who disapproved of these proceedings on the part of M. Papineau's party, have been obliged, by threats of violence to themselves and their property, to acquiesce in them. Under these circumstances, I think it would be preposterous to allow men, on the one hand, to plead a constitution which, on the other hand, they repudiate and reject. The only question for the House now to consider is, what measures present themselves as best calculated for the permanent settlement of these disputes; and I must say that I can think of none which, in my opinion, are better calculated for that purpose than the measures which the Noble Lord has proposed to the House, and which will place a statesman of eminent and admitted ability at the head of affairs in Canada, armed with powers sufficient for the purpose,—but with this salutary principle for his guidance; that those powers shall not be used without a previous attempt to obtain the concurrence of those to whom the intended measures are to apply. I hold that the example which England sets on the present occasion, of appointing a convention with a view to an amicable adjustment of differences between a colony and the mother country, is one of the greatest moral triumphs ever achieved. On former occasions of this kind the only argument appealed to has been that of brute force and bloodshed; there has been no attempt to understand, no attempt to arrive at a just settlement of differences. I believe that the only instance of a similar course of policy being pursued to that which the present Government have adopted, on record,—and that was not in the case of a dispute between a mother country and a colony,—was in the case of the first constitution of the United States, which was soon found to give universal dissatisfaction; upon which, instead of dividing into separate communities, the States, in 1787, formed a convention for the consideration of their differences; and I believe that experience has shown that that proceeding has been productive of the best and most satisfactory results. But, as between a colony and a mother country, I believe the present is the first instance in which this principle has been tried; and I give that credit which is their due, to her Majesty's Government, for proposing such a scheme to Parliament.

I am not going to enter into any detail of the principles upon which the future constitution of Canada should be settled, but I cannot help pointing out to the House the great variety of interests that will have to be consulted, and the very great difficulty which will have to be overcome, in combating the prejudices of the French Canadians, who evidently wish to remain an independent and isolated people, distinct from their British fellow-subjects, amongst whom they live; and in inducing them to acquiesee in any plan by which an identity of interests and a community of rights shall be secured to them in common with the British settlers. I see an Honourable Friend of mine shake his head at this; but I firmly believe that the disputes and difficulties which exist have originated in great measure in the national prejudices and jealousies of the two branches of the community. I think the best course that can be pursued, in such a state of things, is to habituate the French Canadians, as gradually as possible, to British laws and British usages. I believe, also, that, if the result of the provisions of the present Bill should lead to an union of the Upper and Lower provinces into one, it would produce the greatest benefit that could be conferred upon the colony. As to leaving the two hostile parties to settle their differences by the sword, humanity and reason alike revolt against such a notion. The bloodshed which has already taken place would be as nothing to what would occur in the course of the rash, rancorous, and uncompromising warfare which would, in that case, devastate the country, if no mediating authority were interposed between the hostile parties. As to perpetuating the French Canadian people as an isolated race, consisting, as they now do, of 500,000 souls, I believe that must be regarded as perfectly impossible; whilst, on the other hand, I consider that the best service we could render the French Canadians would be to give them a participation in British rights and institutions. The influence of party feeling is at present the bane of all classes in the Canadas; and I call upon the House to consider what would be the inevitable result of permitting the Canadians to continue this contest? If the French party were to succeed, the whole of the property of the British party would be confiscated, including that of the Land Company, which has already been declared by the French party to have been constituted by an illegal authority. On the other hand, if the English party were to triumph, results would operate against the French inhabitants at which justice and feeling would equally revolt.

Whatever our differences with the Canadian House of Assembly may be, I am satisfied that if you resolve upon calmly and dispassionately considering the circumstances under which they originated; — if you will revert to sound and good principles of colonial administration, and give up the idea of maintaining British authority by force only; — if you content yourselves with an Imperial jurisdiction — with possessing a control over the relations of the colony with foreign states, and a power of generally regulating its commerce;—and if you will confide to its inhabitants the fullest privilege of local legislation, with a proper control of the colonial revenue and expenditure,—the tranquillity as well as permanent possession of Canada to this country will be secured. This was the old English system of colonising; it was pursued with the greatest success for a century and a half towards those colonies which now form the United States; and it produced more unison, more sympathy and good feeling, between the colony and the mother county, than any other system of colonial government whatever. Almost every colony which we now possess in North America, was in the first instance conquered by the New England states, to which we gave the fullest control in the administration of their affairs. We took from them no security of fidelity other than identity of interests; and that is the only security which is necessary, and the only one which I should wish to remain. Nova Scotia was conquered by an army from Massachusetts; and I believe the other colonies were, almost without exception, made British possessions through the instrumentality of our own colonists, without any expense to the British Crown.

moval of grievances, but who have not taken a part with M. Papineau and the more ardent Reformers.

Now, there is, undoubtedly, a large and liberal party which still retain their attachment to the British Crown, and who have taken no part in this insurrection. Sir, I do say, that in whatever measures the Government may think proper to take, the honour and feelings of this portion of the inhabitants ought, above all things, to be consulted. And if there be anything in the course about to be taken, of which I am especially doubtful, it is, whether the Government ought entirely to suspend the constitution of 1791, and thus cast a slur on that party whose cordial support they have received. I doubt much whether a dignus vindice nodus has arisen sufficient to call for the application of this Deus in machinâ to cut the difficulty; and I doubt much whether the course which the Government is about to take in suspending the constitution is such as will be satisfactory to that portion of the liberal party whose feelings and whose honour ought, as I have said before, to be above all things consulted. In the year 1828 there were petitions to this House for the redress of grievances, and, until a late period, they continued attached to those individuals who now, because their former peaceful proceedings failed of success, have taken a more violent course. And if you now suspend altogether the constitution of 1791, I put it to you whether you will not, in all probability, estrange from the British Government that moderate but liberal party, of which, I believe, great numbers exist in Canada at the present moment? But, Sir, I beg to remind the House, that in determining this question, we ought not to look at Canada precisely in the light of a mere colony. We must recollect that the title which this country gained over Lower Canada was acquired by the capitulation of 1763. You then granted to the inhabitants of Lower Canada all the privileges and immunities which any individuals or corporation were at that time entitled to in the colony. I do not include among them any of the privileges and immunities granted by Acts of the Legislature at a later period. I say this because the speech of the Noble Lord (J. Russell) dwelt much on various conditions and statements with respect to the independence of Lower Canada, growing out of race and religion.

I do not intend to assert that it is the intention of Government to invade the privileges guaranteed by the capitulation of 1763, and I only refer to the event for the purpose of enforcing on the Government the necessity of keeping faith with the French Canadians, and of taking care that none of their privileges and immunities be overturned by any constitution which may be granted to them. I think that some injustice has been done to the popular party by the stress which is laid on the supposed demand of the Canadians for the perpetuation of feudal rights. Why, if I can depend on anything relating to the popular party in Canada, I feel persuaded that the French Canadians are most anxious to commute their seigneurial rights, to the full as anxious as are the British party there, provided they can do so on such terms as would be advantageous to the whole colony. I feel it, therefore, to be due to them to state, that they have been among the foremost to make such a proposition. I believe they were even prepared to introduce a Bill into the House of Assembly for the commutation of these seigneurial rights, if any encouragement had been given to such a proposal by the Legislative Council which then existed. The course which I advise my Honourable Friends to take, in consequence of the declarations of the Government in favour of an amnesty, and in order that we may observe not only calmness and moderation, but the utmost appearance of a calm and deliberate spirit in receiving the proposition of her Majesty's Government, is—not to divide against the Bill, but to allow it to be introduced and read a first time, and then, after its provisions have been considered, have it read a second time on Monday next. I have risen on the present occasion, not for the purpose of stating all my views on this subject, but to correct some misrepresentations which I think have been made with respect to the sentiments which I expressed when the first of these discussions on the affairs of Canada took place. The advice which I then gave, and which I should be now prepared to give to her Majesty's Government, on the subject of colonial affairs in North America, supposing that the revolt was so extensive as to preclude all hopes of putting it down without a disastrous and exterminating war (which I am happy to say is not the case), amounts to this, that they ought to emancipate the colony. I will not now go fully into the discussion of the reasons which induced me to give that advice, because I particularly adverted to them on the last discussion, and because I am prepared to resume them fully on Monday. But admitting, — which I am happy to think is most probably the case — that this revolt is not wide-spread, and that her Majesty's Government, with the aid of the troops and the well-disposed in the colonies, will succeed in putting an end to every vestige of this insurrection, and thus give a breathing time to consider what measures it may be most expedient to take under the circumstances,—the advice which I am still ready to give, is, to emancipate the colony. In saying this, I do not mean to justify the grounds imputed by the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth to the advocates of such an opinion. It is not because I find insurrection there, as it might break out in the Isle of Wight, or in any part of Ireland, that I am, for that reason, ready to say, "Liberate yourselves, and separate from the mother country." No; it is because I believe it to be expedient and useful both to the mother country and the colony,—not on a short-sighted money view of the question, but on the broadest, most national, and imperial consideration of it, — that I, for one, am ready to sanction the adoption of that course. One of the evils resulting from the course which has been pursued is, that such a feeling of disaffection has arisen towards the mother country as must drive the Canadians into revolt, and induce them to become a part and province of the United States; or, if they do not join the United States, such a feeling of interest will be excited in favour of the colonists, that a party in the United States will perhaps be prepared to support them in insurrection. Such a feeling of disaffection would unite the Canadians much more strongly to the United States than any course taken by the colonists of themselves could effect. Now I must say, that from the observations which have been made from both sides of the House, it seems to me to be admitted, that when a colony arrives at its strength and manhood, the inevitable consequence of our colonial system must be emancipation. The Noble Lord (Lord John Russell) seems to doubt as to whether that time has arrived in the present instance. If the Noble Lord were to look to the history of the United States — if he were to contemplate the feelings of affection which prevailed previous to the year 1763 — if he were to consider the support which the mother country obtained from that people in the war against the French Canadians, and observe how short a time elapsed between the manifestation of such good feeling and the commencement of the troubles which terminated with the war of 1774, he would be convinced how very necessary it is not to be driven to consider the emancipation of a colony when the demands are so urgent that they can be no longer resisted, but that as a wise statesman, he ought to watch the progress of the colonies towards independence, and, foreseeing that the period of emancipation cannot be far remote, take such measures as must render it likely, that when that event does occur, it will be attended with the smallest quantity of evil, and the greatest of good to the mother country. However disposed I may be to admire the form of government and the wisdom of the United States, yet I must say, that if there be anything of which every state in the world ought to be apprehensive, it is this — that a country, whether its form of government be monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy, should grow so powerful as to afford a just cause of apprehension on account of its strength and greatness to the rest of the world. I think, therefore, that what ought to constitute the consideration of every statesman is that — seeing their emancipation is as natural an event to the history of a colony, as manhood to that of an individual — the aim of our Government should be directed to making the separation in such a manner that all these colonies, comprising New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, may not fall separately into the possession of their great neighbour; but be constituted as northern and free states, to act as a counterpoise to what might be considered the tendency of the United States to become an overgrown power, were it to comprise the whole of our colonies of North America. I hope, then, that measures will be taken by the Government which will lead to a friendly and amicable separation at no very distant period, and thus unite all these colonies into an independent confederation, collected together for the purpose of balancing the enormous power of the North American states.

I would also wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, that both in Upper and in Lower Canada the colonists require that the Executive Government should be made responsible to the local House of Assembly. Now, what was the cause of disagreement in Upper Canada between Sir F. Head and the three gentlemen of the popular party, who, it was proposed, should be called into his council? They wished to be considered as responsible ministers, or else to have it understood by the Legislature that the Governor was responsible, and that they were not, for all the measures which were put in force in the colony. I have always found that the greatest security for good government exists in the responsibility of the executive to the popular portion of the Legislature; and I believe that there is no Honourable Member present who would be disposed to dispute the immense benefits which have been derived by the people in those forms of government, in which the Executive Government has been trammelled by this responsibility. Looking at the extent of colonies which the British Crown holds in North America, as well as at the rapid increase of population, which is daily accumulating in those countries, I feel convinced that the period must and will soon arrive when their desire for separation from the mother country will become so ardent, that it will be impossible, on the pretext of preserving the independence of the Executive, to continue the connection. Under such circumstances it is clearly the business of a prudent Legislature to take time by the forelock, and lead the colonists gradually onward from a state of dependence to one of independence,—naturally brought about —in an amicable manner, instead of being effected through the agency of war and useless bloodshed,—by the very measures proposed by the parent state itself. I trust that in legislating upon this subject, the House will be influenced by these motives; and that in conceding to the colonies a new constitution, they will embrace not only the Canadas, but Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and thus establish the elements of that new confederation, producing a new balance of power, which I hope at no distant period to see established in the northern part of the continent of North America.

Mr. CAYLEY.—Notwithstanding the Honourable Member who has just sat down, at the outset of his speech, proposed to limit himself to the question immediately before the House, and to award neither praise nor blame to any of the parties concerned in Canadian transactions, I was quite sure he would deviate from the course he had laid down. In the present anxious state of the public mind,—and of the House, at this moment,—on the subject of the affairs of Canada, it is not only not surprising that we should not confine ourselves in the debate to the immediate question at issue, but it is right that we should be permitted to go into a more general line of argument, both with respect to the conduct of the colony itself, and to the policy which has been pursued by the parent country towards it. I am one of those who entertain an opinion different from that which has been expressed both by the extreme party, on this side of the House, and by those who, in general, oppose her Majesty's Government, on the other side. Little weight can be attached to my individual opinion; but seeing the condemnation attempted to be cast upon her Majesty's Government, by some Honourable Members on this side, and the faint praise awarded to them from the other, I feel it to be my duty, as a Member totally unconnected with the Government, and as one who has gone into the subject anxiously, dispassionately, and with a determination to do justice to all parties, to offer them the humble tribute of my thanks and approbation for the course they have pursued.

Sir, the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Ward) who addressed the House last but one, seemed to think that nothing had been done for the colony of Lower Canada by the Governments of this country; that her Majesty's present Ministers had, like their predecessors, before 1828, done nothing to redress the grievances of the colony in question. Nothing can be further from the fact. Previous to 1828, in Canada as well as at home, but especially in Ireland, it is notorious that jobbing, exclusiveness, and favouritism prevailed; the discontent on account of which had gained such a head in the Canadas, as to give rise to the committee of 1828,—a committee which entered into the merits of all the alleged grievances with the greatest assiduity and fairness, and whose Report gained for the members of the committee a high tribute of commendation even from the House of Assembly in Lower Canada.

My Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department entered, last night, into a most comprehensive, just, and generous history of what had been done for this colony. My Noble Friend referred to the King's proclamation of 1763, promising the newly-acquired colony equal rights with British subjects at home; to the further privileges of the Act of Parliament of 1774; and, lastly, to the Constitution of 1791. Concessions were granted to Canada at a time when they were refused at home; when they were refused to Ireland, although her complaints were loud, and the grievances under which she laboured pressed heavily upon her. The French Canadians, by the Constitution of 1791, were left in peaceable possession of their own religion and their own ecclesiastical revenues; all the advantages of the English criminal law were bestowed upon them, while their civil laws, out of pure respect to their prejudices, remained the same. How differently was Ireland treated, which was both stronger and nearer home! In consequence of the great complaints made by the colony previous to 1828, a committee was granted, and justly granted, to inquire into these complaints of the Canadians; but what concessions, at that time, had been made at home? Had the people of this country obtained the removal of the various grievances under which they laboured? Had we, at that time, when the committee was granted, obtained either the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, Catholic Emancipation, or the Reform Bill? The Canadians, then, at least, have had equal justice, if not much more. The Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton) says, that every body agrees that the Canadians have now great grievances to complain of. No such thing. Every body knows that they had great grievances previous to 1828. What I contend for, and of which there is irrefragable evidence, is, that the committee of 1828 entered into the inquiry, and made its Report, with the full intention of doing justice to the colony, and that the various Governments of this country, since then, have endeavoured to carry into effect the recommendations of that committee. These recommendations have been carried into effect in Upper Canada; and have only failed of success in Lower Canada, because selfish popular leaders have conjured up an entirely new set of grievances, so as to obstruct the removal of the old ones. The House of Assembly in Lower Canada has itself to blame for any delay in the redress of real grievances.

The Honourable Member for Kilkenny said, last night, "Conciliate, — do not shed blood." No human being can be more averse to the shedding of blood than I am; but, on the very score of humanity, the measures now pursuing by her Majesty's Ministers must be carried out. If the colony were set free from the mother country, at this moment, in the present temper of the parties there, and with all the acerbity of feeling between the races, which has been wickedly fostered and encouraged, the inevitable consequence would be, on the showing of the parties themselves, wholesale confiscation and a war of extermination. The people in Upper Canada are altogether in favour of the continuance of British connection. The late elections incontestably prove this. It was the main question on which the elections turned. In Lower Canada, although nearly two thirds of the population is of French extraction, the shares held in canals, railroads, banks, and other public investments, are nine tenths in the hands of British settlers; whilst nineteen twentieths of the maritime commerce of the colony is also in the hands of the British. In fact, I believe there is only one instance of a commercial house being carried on by French Canadians; and even though that is nominally in the hands of French Canadians, I understand that a considerable proportion of the capital is British. Is all this property, which has been embarked on the faith and in full confidence of the protection of the British Crown, to be placed at the disposal of a party which claims a right to every thing in the colony that has been granted by the Government at home? The people of this country are too just to allow it.

And here I may be permitted to observe, how very different was the tone and temper, as well as the language employed by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, last night, from that which was used by him upon a former occasion, when he addressed the House upon this subject. The secret of this change is, I believe, to be found in the fact, that the feeling of the country has lately been unequivocally declared upon the question at issue between the Canadas and the mother country; and that feeling has been found to be directly adverse to the opinions of the Honourable Member. The recent meetings which have been called together, by persons favourable to M. Papineau's party, have been a signal failure; and the present language and tone of those of them who have seats in this House is a proof of it. It would appear that those Honourable Gentlemen had exhausted the whole vocabulary of abuse on former occasions. What was their language as well in this House, three weeks ago, as at the Crown and Anchor Tavern the other day? Certainly it was not that which was uttered last night in this House. The tone of last night appeared to be deprecatory and almost one of apology. Hitherto a species of vapouring and vaunting, and an assertion (in which "the wish, perhaps, was father to the thought") that the whole of the Canadian population would resist the mother country, characterised their speeches. Now, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has fallen back so far as to designate this outbreak as "the work of a few factious demagogues." The truth is, these Gentlemen have endeavoured to excite the people upon this subject, in which they have not merely failed, but found themselves in a miserable, insignificant, and (I use the term not offensively) a contemptible minority. A meeting held lately at Leeds gives pretty significant symptoms on this subject. One of the Honourable Members for Leeds (I do not mean the Honourable Member connected with the leading journal of that place, in which appeared, lately, a very able and temperate essay on Canada; from the conclusion of which, however, I totally differ), I mean the Honourable Baronet (Sir W. Molesworth),—had put forth a manifesto to his constituents, as a sort of feeler to ascertain their sentiments on the part he took at the commencement of the Session, in support of the Honourable Member for Finsbury (Mr. Wakley's) triple amendment to the address. No reply, I believe, was given to this manifesto, until, a week or two ago, a meeting was summoned at Leeds, intended, as I understand, as an answer to the manifesto, to which the Honourable Baronet was invited, as well as the Honourable Member for Westminster (Mr. Leader); both of whom had been very active in Canadian affairs. Neither of the Honourable Members, it is true, had found time to attend; but what was the response the Honourable Baronet's constituents gave to the summons? I am given to understand that not one of them attended. Does this show much sympathy, on the part of his populous constituency, in the conduct of the Honourable Baronet on questions which have lately been before Parliament, and of which that on Canada has been so conspicuous? And what was the language held in the speeches of those who addressed the meeting? One of the speakers was understood to have said, "That it was absurd, in these days, to appeal to any other mode of effecting a redress of grievances than physical force. If you cannot afford fire-arms," he continued, "carry swords, or spears, or daggers; and, if these are wanting, the torch is a ready means, when applied to the houses of your masters, to carry terror into the ranks of all who oppose you." In a civilised country (thank God!) there can be but one opinion on language like this: and this is what the Honourable Member for Kilkenny calls the people of England being with him!

And now, Sir, a few words on the conduct of her Majesty's present Government in the transactions which have lately occurred in Canada. I have read all the despatches which have lately been laid before us, with no other disposition than to find the truth, and no other wish than to be able to take my humble share in dispensing justice to all the parties engaged in these transactions; and I do not hesitate to avow my conviction that the impartial inference to be drawn from the correspondence between Lord Glenelg and Lord Gosford is, that, keeping in view his conciliatory mission, there was every inclination and determination on the part of Lord Gosford to protect life and property in Lower Canada, as well as every necessary preparation to secure that protection. The Noble Lord the Member for Cornwall (Lord Eliot) says, the Government have jeopardised the colony. And the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir R. Peel) insinuated, that there had been neglect on the part of Lord Glenelg in sending out military force to Canada. But what is the fact, as we gather from the despatches which I hold in my hand? That Lord Glenelg, in the beginning of the year, so early as March, took steps to increase the military force in Lower Canada. He writes to Sir Colin Campbell to send as many of the troops under his command to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward's Island, as Lord Gosford might require of him. Of course Lord Glenelg did not wish Lord Gosford, whose office was to pacify and conciliate, to make any conspicuous demonstration of military force. The Right Honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel), however, says, that "Lord Gosford had no objection to demonstrate." What, then, was the meaning of Lord Gosford's refusal to the application of a large body of men in Quebec to enrol themselves as a volunteer corps, and this even so late as October? The conduct of Lord Gosford, taking the whole of the proceedings of the last year into consideration, shows that his intentions were to attain his ends by moral influence rather than by any demonstration of physical force; and the whole tenour of the despatches shows that this policy in relation to Canada was also approved by Lord Glenelg, as well as Sir John Colborne, Sir Francis Head, and Sir John Harvey. What was the language held by Sir Francis Head in answer to an application from Sir J. Colborne for a supply of troops from Upper Canada, October 31.? He sends him the whole of his troops from the seat of Government, not excepting his own sentry, and his letter proceeds to say,—

> This province is, as far as my experience goes, more loyal and more tranquil than any part of England; however, this does not matter to Mr. M'Kenzie, provided he can get up a few sets of violent resolutions, which you know, very well, are easily effected.
> Now, what I desire to do is, completely to upset Mr. Papineau, so far as Upper Canada is concerned, by proving to the people in England that this province requires no troops at all, and consequently that it is perfectly tranquil.
> I consider that this evidence will be of immense importance, as it at once shows the conduct of Lower Canada to be factious; whereas, could it, under colour of a few radical meetings here, be asserted that the two provinces were on the brink of revolution, it would, as you know, be argued as an excuse for granting the demands of Mr. Papineau. I consider it of immense importance, practically, to show to the Canadas that loyalty produces tranquillity, and that disloyalty not only brings troops into the province, but also involves it in civil war.

To attain the object I have long had in view, I deemed it advisable not to retain, either for myself or for the stores, the few men we have been accustomed to require; for I felt I could not completely throw myself, as I wished to do, on the inhabitants of the province, so long as there remained troops in the garrison.

Sir John Colborne, in reply, says, "Your determination of liberating the 24th regiment will produce the best effect. Sir Colin Campbell will act on a similar principle." Sir J. Harvey writes to Lord Glenelg from New Brunswick, stating the ardent loyalty of that province, and that he could spare all the regulars and a large force of militia for the protection of Lower Canada. With the knowledge of these facts of the loyalty of the Upper and Lower provinces, and that not only the regular military could be spared from them, but also a large force of militia and volunteers, how can Lord Gosford be charged with inattention to the safety of Lower Canada, when he had been making preparations almost the whole year, in conjunction with the Commander-in-chief, Sir J. Colborne, so to distribute the forces as to enable them to act efficiently whenever the urgency of the circumstances might demand it?

Sir, the policy of her Majesty's advisers was not that of an early and gratuitous appeal to military power; it was one of a totally opposite nature, namely, to redress real grievances, and to act in good faith, in strict accordance with the Report of the Committee of 1828. To concede all the reasonable demands of the Canadians, to act in a spirit of justice and conciliation, have been the means employed to produce content. Some Honourable Gentlemen, I know, are disposed to quarrel with this persevering effort to conciliate on the part of her Majesty's Government. But, Sir, even if a conciliatory system were not sanctioned by dictates of the soundest morality and justice, in this instance, at least, according to the evidence before us, it would have been recommended by the coldest maxims of a Machiavellian policy. The enemies of the Queen's Government have put themselves in the wrong; whilst the Government, by never deviating from the path of justice and conciliation until rebellion forced them into arms, have become morally strengthened for any unfortunate contest that may ensue. And here it is that I differ both with Honourable Gentlemen opposite and with the friends of Mr. Papineau's party in this House. From all the documents on the subject, to which I have had access, it appears to my mind that Lord Gosford has exactly pursued that course, both with respect to a perseverance in conciliatory measures and an efficient redress of grievances, as well as in the distribution of the military force, which he ought to have pursued, had he foreseen from the commencement what has actually occurred.

With reference to the magistrates and the militia officers who were removed from the commission, it was impossible that Lord Gosford could act in any other way than he did — it was impossible that they could be longer permitted to remain in the Queen's service, attending and taking part, as they did, at meetings where sedition and treason were openly avowed, and disobeying, as they did, the Governor's orders to publish his proclamation. These officers subsequently attended at the meetings which followed their dismissal by the Governor, and were there re-elected by the people, in defiance of the civil authority. It was after the dismissal of these officers, and after these meetings had taken place, that the outrages occurred. Certain parties had become amenable to the law: when the Queen's authorities attempted to seize some of the leaders and instigators of certain treasonable proceedings, and had succeeded in that object, they were, on their return, met by a large armed band, by whom they were attacked, and their prisoners forcibly rescued; and it was only when the civil power was thus set at nought that the military were called out. It was said, last evening, that the Government had acted improperly, knowing the discontented state of Lower Canada, in not having there a sufficient force to suppress the insurrection on its first appearance. I, however, am not prepared to admit that the military force in Canada was insufficient. The only proof that has been offered in favour of that opinion is, that in one attempt that was made by the Queen's troops, under Colonel Gore, upon St. Denis, bad weather, wretched roads, and a circuitous route, to avoid some village in possession of the rebels, — these and other circumstances combined to render a retreat an act of expediency as well as of humanity. But is this isolated fact sufficient to prove that the forces were insufficient in Lower Canada? Was our force sufficient at first to quell the Bristol riots? In the manufacturing districts, in the neighbourhood of which I live, it is no uncommon circumstance for the military in any given locality to find itself, at first, unequal to the suppression of a popular outbreak, and after some reconnoitring, they prudently await the arrival of a reinforcement. No later than the other day, at the fire at the Royal Exchange, great danger was contemplated by the pressure of the assembled populace on the building. The guard at the Bank came to assist; it was found insufficient; a reinforcement was sent for from the Tower. This addition proved unequal to keep back the multitude; and it was only after the arrival of a second reinforcement that anything like order could be maintained. But would any one infer from thence that there were not troops sufficient in London, or in England, for the purposes of security and protection? The result of every affair in which the Queen's troops have been engaged, since the affair of St. Denis, has fully proved that sufficient troops were in the colony to meet the emergency. In none of the despatches from Lord Gosford is any complaint made of the insufficiency of the military force in those colonies; on the contrary, Sir John Colborne, at an early period, expresses the strongest confidence that with the troops then under his command, or at his disposal, he should be enabled to put down any insurrectionary movement that might occur in consequence of the violence of the popular leaders and the seditious meetings which were held. And Sir John Colborne's distribution of his troops appears to me to merit the highest commendation. Now, taking the whole circumstances of Lower Canada into the account, — considering the complicated crisis which had arrived, the impossibility of any satisfactory arrangement on rational grounds, in consequence of the impracticability of the parties, — if one may dare so to say, this outbreak might seem almost providential; because, by starting, as it were, afresh, with more practicable materials, and with late experience before the eyes of the Canadians, we may hope to establish a really satisfactory state of things on the new foundation. The utmost attempt to conciliate and to do justice had been shown, and had been repudiated by the popular leaders: not by the colonists themselves, as a body; for I look upon the late proceedings in the colony to have been the work of ambitious leaders, who at last stimulated their deluded victims to raise the standard of revolt.

Is it not true, Sir, that those men who called themselves the popular leaders in Lower Canada did not seem to know where to stop in their demands? All that they had asked and obtained, instead of satisfying them, but produced new demands, until it was obvious that the object sought to be obtained was not so much the redress of grievances as the fulfilment of their own ambitious designs, — their own personal aggrandisement, — which were connected with a separation from the mother country. Even the grievance which is now the most loudly complained of, when examined, in equity, amounts to nothing, and is one of their own making. The Crown gave up its revenues, in 1831, to the House of Assembly, on the full understanding that the latter were to grant a Civil List for the payment of the judges and the other necessary officers of Government. The moment they got the revenues they refused to pay the judges, and have refused for three or four years. It was impossible this could go on. The supplies were stopped for no grievance which could be remedied by the Constitution, but in order to effect a change in the Constitution itself. The crown revenues would have been quite sufficient for this Civil List; and therefore no money was really taken out of the pockets of the colonists for these just, and absolutely necessary, payments. We had only done justice, while the House of Assembly had virtually broken faith with the Crown. What a different case is this from that of the United Colonies, to which allusion has so frequently been made, and which called for those memorable words of Lord Chatham, — "I rejoice that America has resisted." That was for taxation levied by the mother country for its own benefit; this, a revenue appropriated by the mother country towards a just and necessary colonial payment,—a revenue which did not come out of the pockets of the people.

I repeat, Sir, since the appointment of the committee of 1828, there has been a steady disposition, on the part of every Government, to improve the condition of the people of Lower Canada; and the people of that colony expressed their approbation of, and confidence in, the labours of that committee. My Noble Friend, last night, quoted the terms in which they spoke of that committee. They described the Report as one of high liberality and profound wisdom. The House of Assembly, on two repeated occasions, — in 1828 and 1831, — in addresses to the Crown, prayed that "the Constitution, as established by law, might be transmitted, unimpaired, to posterity;" and, as I before stated, it has been the continuous effort of each successive Government, since 1828, to carry out the recommendations contained in that Report. Such having been the feeling of Canada at that time, what has taken place since then to justify the measures of the popular leaders? I cannot believe that the redress of grievances is the real object that a party has in view, when the greater the disposition to conciliate that is evinced on the part of the Government, and the more the redress of grievances is effected, the louder become the complaints of the leaders of that party. Sir, in my opinion, the real grievance of the popular agitators in Lower Canada is, a jealousy of the rapid immigration which has, of late years, taken place into the Canadas from Great Britain. By means of this great augmentation of British settlers, a speedy extinction, they think, is threatened to that selfish influence which they now exercise over the happy and thriving, though easily deluded, habitans of Lower Canada. And their own words even justify this interpretation. Not long ago, the Minerve newspaper (the leading journal of the Papineau party in Montreal, and, I believe, at one time edited by M. Viger, the agent of the House of Assembly in this country in 1833), contains the following passages:—

> It may be seen, according to this, that there exist here two parties, of opposite interests and manners,—the Canadians and the English. These first, born Frenchmen, have the habits and characters of such. They have inherited from their fathers a hatred to the English.

Again:—

> We repeat it, an immediate separation from England is the only means of preserving our nationality. Some time hence, when emigration shall have made our adversaries our equals in number, more daring and less generous, they will deprive us of our liberties. Believe me, this is the fate reserved for us, if we do not hasten to make ourselves independent.

The following extract from a speech of M. Rodier, a Member of the House of Assembly, also confirms this view:—

> If I present to you so melancholy a picture of the condition of this country, I have to encourage the hope, that we may yet preserve our nationality, and avoid those future calamities, by opposing a barrier to this torrent of immigration.

Mr. Papineau's views are made pretty evident by the following short extract from a very long address of his to the electors of West Ward of Montreal, published after his last election to the Assembly:—

> Your enemies are not numerous enough to injure you: you are sufficiently numerous to injure them. Break all connection in business and interest with those who separate their affections and interests from yours. . . . . Let those who are so presumptuous as to prefer their own opinions, learn, that, whatsoever be their titles to favours from the Administration, they have no claims to the confidence of the people.

Presumptuous enough to prefer their own thoughts! And these are republicans, too! A pretty consummation for freedom and free principles to have arrived at, when republicanism on one side of the western world proclaims there shall be a continuation of the unrighteous system of negro slavery,—in other words, no liberty of person; and, on the other side, not even liberty of thought and will! If this be the ultimatum of liberal principles, I can only say, God protect us, at home, in the full possession of that really practical liberty afforded us by our happy Constitution! These extracts show the spirit which animates these popular leaders. What is the fact, even with that which was the great and most crying evil in Canada up to 1828, namely, the almost exclusive appointment of British and placemen to the Legislative Council? Why, that (according to Lord Gosford's despatches) the Council now consists, practically, of thirteen of British, and eighteen of French extraction. But I do not believe that the people of Canada, as a body, are favourable to the views of the Papineau party, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary at a recent meeting at the Crown and Anchor Tavern. I am persuaded, that the people of Canada, taking them as a whole, so far from wishing a separation, are warmly attached to the Government of this country. The real grievance, I believe, of the leaders of the party I have described, is, the rapid increase, within the last few years, of British emigrants, and the growing strength of the British settlers. This is the true cause of complaint, I suspect, on the part of the popular leaders; and it is obvious why it should be so, for it threatens, at no distant day, a severe blow at their personal ambition. But this is a cause of complaint in which I feel confident the body of the people, even of French extraction, will not join, at the risk of losing the blessings they now enjoy. The Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds acknowledged, the other day, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, what those blessings were. He said, he admitted that the mass of the population of the French Canadians were "well fed, well clothed, well housed, and little taxed;" but, he added, the people will not be satisfied with these alone. I differ entirely with the Honourable Baronet, and tell him he will find no people on earth possessed of blessings, like these who will run the chance of losing them for any other blessings he can promise them. A high and impartial authority from the United States, and one not mixed up with political parties, Professor Silliman, one of the highest statistical and scientific authorities in the United States, thus speaks of the condition of the people in Lower Canada, after a personal examination: —

> It is questionable whether any conquered country was ever better treated by its conquerors than Canada; the people were left in complete possession of their religion, and revenues to support it — of their property, laws, customs, and manners; and even the defence of their country is without expense to them. . . . . It would seem as if the trouble and expense of government was taken off their hands, and as if they were left to enjoy their own domestic comforts without a drawback. Such is, certainly, the appearance of the population; and it is doubtful whether our own favoured communities are, politically, more happy.
> Lower Canada is a fine country, and will hereafter become populous and powerful, especially as the British and Anglo-American population shall flow in more extensively, and impart more vigour and activity to the community.

After such testimony as this, I cannot bring myself to the belief, that the Canadians are really suffering under the rule of Great Britain, or that we are guilty of the gross acts of injustice and illiberality which are laid at our door; and, in consequence, I have little confidence in the patriotism of those who, under such circumstances, would excite a happy people to acts of rebellion; exciting them, too, through their worst prejudices, and a hatred of the British race.

It has been argued that the most prudent step, on the part of the Government, would be at once to adopt measures for dissolving the connection which exists between the mother country and the colony. If the time had really arrived for effecting the separation, then I fully concur with the Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton), that the object of the Government ought to be to effect it in such a way as would secure for this country all the advantages to be derived from a friendly intercourse with the new state. But when I consider that even in Lower Canada the British settlers are at least one third of the entire population, comprising almost an entirety of the enterprise and commercial wealth of the colony; when I consider that the population of Upper Canada is almost exclusively of British origin; and when it is ascertained from statistical documents, emanating from the colony, that the population in the two Canadas are in the following proportions, —

Lower Canada.
French origin	-	390,000
British origin	-	210,000
		600,000

of which, probably, at least 350,000 are of British extraction; thus constituting a majority of 150,000 of British over French settlers, taking Canada as a whole; and when I consider that this majority of 150,000 British settlers in the two Canadas (for in reference to a separation they cannot be taken apart), in addition to a great mass of the French Canadians, are favourable to a continuance, most anxious for the continuance, of the connection with Great Britain, — I am bound to affirm that the time for separation has not yet arrived. If, in 1763, when Lower Canada first became a British colony,—its people had then said, "You have conquered us from France, but we wish not to be governed by you; we wish to be independent;" what, in strict justice and right, ought to have been the answer of Great Britain? "We do not wish to govern you against your wishes; but you occupy a position which, if seized by a force hostile to Great Britain, may afford great facilities for the annoyance of the United Colonies to the south of the St. Lawrence. If you could prove to us that you were strong enough to protect yourselves from foreign aggressors, and could really form a strong and permanent independent Government,—then, if in a body you demanded emancipation, we would grant it you." But the French Canadians never dreamt of making such an application, nor were they in a condition to have had it granted, being only 60,000 at the time of our acquiring the colony, in 1763. Since that period other elements of consideration have grown up. It is no longer a French but a British colony: British, by extent of population; British, by extent of enterprise and wealth. And to yield to a factious demand for separation, without reference to the interests of the British settlers, would be the height of baseness, injustice, and bad faith, on the part of the mother country.

Sir, I entertain a strong opinion as to the general policy to be pursued in regard to these North American colonies. A balance of power (and here I entirely also agree with the Member who last spoke) is wanted on that great continent, to the great and growing power of the United States. Here is the opportunity of forming that balance. Let the colonies be united by some sort of periodical intercourse of representatives from each, to meet at Quebec on matters of trade and commerce, or any subject of common interest to them all, under the auspices of one Governor General; then would they be trained and educated to a feeling of dependence on each other, and to the ultimate desire of confederation when the just period of separation had arrived. Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the smaller islands, and Newfoundland, would then form an important and extensive territory, with a population in energy and numbers sufficient to sustain that balance of power in the western world which is so much to be desired. And I trust that the Bill now proposed by my Noble Friend, and the mission of Lord Durham, while they secure the truest freedom and the amplest justice in all respects, and to all parties in Canada, — for in the dispensation of liberty I can draw no distinction between Canada and Britain, — will tend to foster and keep alive that ultimate view to which I have now referred.

Mr. GILLON. — I am anxious to say a few words on the subject before the House. I do not often trouble the House, nor will I detain them on this occasion, long; but, in the few remarks I have to make, I shall endeavour to follow the recommendation of the Honourable Member for Bridport,—to deliberate the matter without the slightest mixture of asperity or passion; and shall not be led, even by the injudicious observations of the Honourable Member for Yorkshire, to depart from that course. The reason that the Honourable Member has assigned why the Canadians should have remained satisfied and contented, is, in my opinion, the most extraordinary I ever heard put forward among rational beings. That Honourable Member says that the Canadians ought to rest contented under their grievances, because we have also grievances to complain of at home. This is a line of argument that I cannot admit. I do not agree that a bad government at home is any reason why injustice should be tolerated in our colonies. Neither can I join in the Honourable Member's eulogium on our colonial department. If I am not much mistaken, the system of the colonial department is one that abounds with jobbing and favouritism. The Honourable Member for Yorkshire has stated, that the Canadian grievances have all been redressed: this certainly is news to me, and I believe to most Honourable Members of this House. I am aware that their grievances were inquired into in 1828, and the result of that inquiry was a full acknowledgment of their existence; but the redress which ought to have followed has not yet been granted. The Canadians have gone on petitioning the House in the most patient manner; and if their demands have increased with the protracted denial of justice, it is only the legitimate consequence of the conduct of Government and of this House. No one can regret more than I do the unfortunate events which have now taken place. I regret as deeply the line of conduct which has been adopted by some individuals in the colony. I do not think that neglect of justice, or the oppressive acts of the colonial department and of the Parliament towards the colony, were sufficient to induce them to revolt, and to plunge their country into all the horrors of a civil war. No man can deprecate the conduct of the Canadians, in having recourse to such violent measures, more than I do. But when I hear so much about the necessity of protecting the integrity and the honour of the British Crown and of the empire, I feel bound to inquire by what means have that integrity and that honour been put in jeopardy? I say, by those fatal resolutions, which sprung from the Government, and which, most unfortunately, were passed by the late House of Commons. I contend that those resolutions were not only unnecessary, but unjust, and contrary to the constitution which had been granted to the Canadians by the British Parliament. No one doubts that the control of the revenues was guaranteed to the House of Assembly, and confirmed by the Act of 1791. Thus, in stopping the supplies, when the grievances of which they had so frequently complained still remained unredressed, they were exercising only a constitutional right, — a right which had been guaranteed to them by the Imperial Legislature. Suppose this House were to adopt the same course, and exercise its undoubted privilege of stopping supplies until certain grievances were redressed, would there be any Minister bold enough to come forward and propose to annihilate the constitution, and to shut up this House? Then, Sir, if such a course would not be taken with regard to the constitution of this country, why do you mete out a different measure of justice to your colony, unless it be for this reason,—that we are strong and powerful, and the Canadas are weak? It has been said that the Canadian House of Assembly has itself destroyed the constitution. I deny that. It was the eighth resolution, which was last year passed by this House, that abrogated the constitution of Lower Canada. Again, it has been said that the people of Canada have been misled by a few factious and ambitious demagogues. I admit that people may occasionally be misled by such individuals for a short time; but, in such a case, they will soon perceive their error, and return to the paths of duty and allegiance. When, however, I see the great majority of a people complain, for a long series of years, of grievances unredressed, I, for one, cannot attribute the occurrences that have taken place entirely to the influence of factious demagogues. Look at the result of the elections of members of the House of Assembly. Has not each succeeding election produced an increased majority in favour of the popular party, and against the policy of this country? And though you may destroy the House of Assembly, and disperse the advocates of the people, still other men will rise up with equal ability and zeal, and the voice of the people will be heard. The same might be said of Ireland; and yet, if the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin were to close his days to-morrow, could it be supposed that the power which he has used with such beneficial results would die with him? No; fresh O'Connells would arise; and, until the grievances of the country were redressed, would exercise a similar power.

It has been said by many Honourable Members, that the great majority of the people of Canada have taken no share in the revolt, but that they are still loyal, and favourable to British connection, and British rule; and I, myself, believe, that there is a very large portion of the respectable inhabitants of the colony who, though they complain of the grievances which the bad government of this country has inflicted upon them, deeply regret the course which has been pursued by the more violent party. If this be the fact, and if the revolt be confined to a few persons, where is the necessity for taking away the constitution, even for a time? Can there be a greater act of injustice to those parties who have been true to their allegiance? With what hope or confidence can the Canadian people receive any new constitution, when we so flagrantly violate the one already secured to them? Can they expect more than that they will be permitted to enjoy the benefits of any constitution only so long as it may suit your own purposes to adhere to its provisions? I have always entertained a great respect for the Noble Lord who is about to go out to administer the affairs of Canada. That Noble Lord's name has always been quoted as that of a steady advocate of the rights of the people, and as a rallying point for the friends of reform. But, trammelled as the Noble Lord will be by the circumstance of carrying with him a Bill for the suspension of the Canadian constitution, I am most apprehensive that the Noble Lord will not find it a very easy task to carry into effect the objects of his mission. Instead of being treated with the respect and esteem which are due to him, there is great reason to fear that the Noble Lord will be regarded with feelings of suspicion and jealousy. I was happy to hear the Noble Lord on the Treasury bench speak, as he last night did, of the wisdom of abstaining from severity, and of taking the road of clemency and conciliation. Among the religious portions of the community in this country there exists a deep feeling to the same effect. It was my intention, on coming down to the House, to oppose any proposition for suspending the constitution of Canada; but, from the power of amnesty which is proposed to be given, and the conciliatory tone of the Noble Lord's address, I feel inclined to follow the advice of the Honourable Member for Bridport, and will not press my opposition to a division,—reserving to myself, however, a power of resisting the Bill in any of its details.

Mr. BORTHWICK. — In voting with her Majesty's Ministers on this occasion, I wish not to be understood as sanctioning, much less praising, their colonial policy as respects Canada. On the contrary, I protest against that policy. I will not say that the Government have conducted the affairs of Canada in such a way as to sanction rebellion; but I do, at the same time, insist that they did not take the necessary means to prevent it. I hold that their conduct is inexcusable in not having a sufficient military force in the colony to put down the insurrection at its first outbreak; and they are the more inexcusable on this point, inasmuch as they were forewarned by an Honourable Gentleman, not now in the House, that no sooner would the eighth resolution be promulgated in Canada than a rebellion would instantly break out. This statement was made distinctly, unequivocally, and in a manner which could not be mistaken. Her Majesty's Ministers heard it stated in this House, — and stated in a manner likely to render the prophecy fulfilled, — that an insurrection would take place as soon as the winter froze up the mouths of the St. Lawrence, so as to prevent the landing of the troops. This question cannot be viewed as an isolated case. In my opinion it is intimately connected with other matters much nearer home, which the House would do well to take into its consideration. The Honourable Member for Bridport recommends conciliation and charity towards Canada. But is this a time for conciliation — is this a time for the interposition of charity between the Crown and the subjects, when the subjects are arrayed in open rebellion? It has been denied by some Honourable Gentlemen that there is any sympathy with the Canadian rebels in this country. Did the proceedings at the late meeting at the Crown and Anchor warrant this assumption? What was the language held there — what were the appeals there made to the sympathies of the British public? I hold in my hand part of the report of those proceedings, over which a Member of this House, a subject of this empire, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, presided. What was the language used at that meeting? One speaker concluded with a motto, which he said he would have inscribed on every Canadian banner, —

In freedom let Canadians live,
And brave the death which tyrants give.

Was this conciliation? Was there no sympathy in this? Another Honourable and Gallant Gentleman, not now a Member of this House, declared himself rejoiced to hear that there was a disastrous civil war raging in Canada. Why, in that very speech the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman was himself guilty of treason. The Honourable and Gallant Gentleman went still further. "He would refer them," he said, "to the history of this country. Did they ask what page in that history? They would hear of it somewhere about Whitehall. There was a glorious scene of substantial justice once enacted in that neighbourhood, which had been said to occasion a crick in the neck of every Monarch, at least once a year." Was this no appeal to the passions? Was this no treason? If it do not bear such a construction, what will the law officers of the Crown say to the sentence which followed? "That was the precedent to which he would refer them. Was it policy, or was it wisdom, to force them again to appeal to it?" Is it possible that a precedent for taking away the life of her Majesty could be thus freely spoken of in the heart of the metropolis by a citizen of London, and yet that the person who uttered it should still remain uncalled to an account by the law officers of the Crown? Do we live in so insecure a state of society? Is the seat of empire held by so slight a tenure that treason so palpable some dared to utter in the presence of a British assembly, over which the Honourable Member for Kilkenny presided? Can any one say, after this, that the rebellion in Canada is unconnected with the state of things in this country? Was there nothing significant in the manner of the Honourable Member for Bridport, who, in the same style and tone in which he would speak on the subject of weights and measures, spoke of the rebel Canadians as ardent Reformers? Is the ardour for reform which thus evinces itself in Canada of a nature similar to that which exists here? Was there nothing significant in what fell from the Honourable Member who last addressed the House, and who, it must be admitted, spoke in a tone of more moderation than some others who side with him upon this question — was there nothing significant in his saying, that if the Honourable Member for Dublin were dead, a hundred O'Connells would start up to fill his place? Wherefore is it that Ireland is thus linked with Canada? Is O'Connell to be considered another Papineau? If not—if he who is so closely connected with those who hold high places in Downing-street is not to be considered in this light — why mix up the state of Ireland with that of Canada, and thus insinuate the reference to Papineau and his rebel associates? The charge which I make against the Members of her Majesty's Government is, that they have not acted with firmness in maintaining the integrity of the empire against the worse than Bœotianly-stupid philosophy of modern days.

The Honourable Member for Bridport has argued that a colony must in time separate from the mother country, as a man must die; and — mark the philosophical ergo — when they take up arms the mother country must accede to their demands. Then, forsooth, the mother country, which has given the colony birth, and afforded her unexpensive and untaxed protection, must lose all hold! It has been argued, that Canada endures practical grievances, which press heavily upon the colony. From the first time I entered into this House until the present moment, I have heard much declamation on this point; but I never heard the assertion substantiated in any one instance. What are the grievances now complained of in unison with the rebellion of Canada? Do they affect the safety of person or property? Are the changes looked for such as are likely to promote any practical good? No, it is a mere abstract and speculative matter. The Canadians say, "We do not like the fashion of your constitution, so we will have a constitution of our own." The question is not a practical one — it is a mere abstraction, which the Canadian rebels feel themselves warranted in supporting by an appeal to arms. Her Majesty's Ministers, however, have to thank themselves for this state of things; — not because of the resolutions which were passed last year — not because of any firmness which the Government have exhibited on the occasion — but because of the encouragement which in this country they have afforded to those whose intentions were treasonable.

It has been asked whether Canada is worth the cost which she occasions, and why we do not separate in a cordial manner? There are two reasons to the contrary. First, this is not the time for separation, nor can any demands be granted until those who make them petition in the attitude of subjects. Next, the question is not now one of advantage — it is not whether the benefits to be derived from the navigation of the St. Lawrence will repay the expense — but whether Great Britain is or is not to be bearded with impunity by its own colony, or whether any section of her subjects, whether in the colonies or at home, shall present their petitions at the cannon's mouth. If the question is one of national policy, let the doctrine of separation be mooted at the proper time. For my own part, I am one of those old-fashioned politicians who think "Ships, Colonies, and Commerce" is the true motto of English policy; and I would much rather add to instead of diminishing our colonies, if it were in my power. This, however, is not the question, but, whether any citizens can make their demands at the cannon's mouth. I will vote with the Noble Lord, in the hope that the measure which he will introduce to-night may have the effect of reducing the rebels to subjection: but I shall feel it my duty to accompany that vote with a distinct opinion that it is not so much to the energy of factious demagogues, or to the spirit of discontent in Canada, that the present state of things is to be attributed, as to the utter imbecility and the vacillating weakness with which the reins of our colonial policy have been held for the last four years. If the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth had been in power, and if Lord Amherst had been sent out to Canada, there is not a man in the House who will have the hardihood to say that the present crisis would have arisen. The Government ought to bring to trial and to punishment those who have fomented this rebellion. I will not go into the merits of the measure about to be submitted to the House, as more ample opportunity will be afforded for that hereafter. I would, however, warn the Ministry — I would warn the House — I would warn the country — that the rebellion is not confined to Canada. It has developed itself also in London, though not with the same helmet-head as it exhibits in the colony. Either the life of the Queen was threatened at the late meeting at the Crown and Anchor, or there are infamous misrepresentations of what actually occurred there in the newspapers. If the Gallant Gentleman uttered what is reported of him, and the law officers do not take the matter up, I say they are aiding and abetting high treason. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I care not for the consequences of my assertion. In the presence of God — in the presence of this House — such is my conscientious conviction; and if the Gallant Gentleman did not use the words imputed to him, then I contend that the proprietors of the newspapers ought to be brought to trial for high treason.

Mr. DILLON BROWNE. — I will not follow the histrionic speech of the Honourable Member for Evesham, nor will I attempt to argue the judiciousness of sending either the Honourable Member for Kilkenny or Colonel Thompson to the Tower; neither do I intend to institute a comparison between the Honourable Member for Dublin and M. Papineau — I think, indeed, that there is an essential difference between them, one advocating a physical and the other a moral agitation. I will, however, try to adhere to the subject matter of debate. It is with reluctance that I rise to address the House on this occasion, and I do so only because Irish Members, having hitherto taken but little part in the debates regarding Canada, I am apprehensive that it might be supposed they are apathetic respecting the interests of that colony, and do not sympathise in the sufferings of its people. Every Irishman must look with interest upon the fortunes of Canada, as, on account of a sad association in misfortune, that colony and Ireland have been placed in a companionship. Similar, if not identical, grievances have harassed and humbled them together. They knelt together before the same bar of British justice; they have been dismissed together with contumely and insult; and now, when they appear again to seek their just rights, though not in the same companionship of humility, though not in the same attitude of prayer — Ireland in that of supplication, Canada in arms — it must be excusable in even the humblest representative of the Irish people to express his sentiments in a debate which so deeply involves the fortunes of those who are fellow-sufferers with his own countrymen, and to take an interest in the struggle, in which their rulers may be taught a lesson which wisdom, learned from experience, may induce them to apply to his country. I hope the Honourable Member for Dublin will denounce the resolutions which the Noble Lord passed through Parliament last year, as contrary to the great principle of civil and religious liberty which he has ever advocated, and as productive of all the evils which have since taken place; and I hope, also, that the Honourable Member for Tipperary will prove upon this occasion that his estimate of justice is not measured by local prejudices and party antipathies, and that he does not wish it should be limited to the boundaries of Ireland alone.

The case of the two countries is nearly identical; in both there is a "monopolising, miserable minority;" and in both a powerful party in this House ready to pander to their wishes. Canada is in the worse position of the two; for while Ireland has only to contend with Honourable Gentlemen opposite, Canada has opposed to it the powerful force produced by the unnatural alliance of those Tories who are the avowed enemies, and those Whigs who are the avowed champions, of reform. I always regard an union between Whigs and Tories with much distrust, for then I apprehend some powerful resistance to the wishes of the people, if not some violent encroachment on public liberty. The Whigs are willing to allow the people to remain as they are, but it is always provided that it does not prejudice the aristocracy. They will even permit them to advance a little, provided always they give the aristocracy an opportunity to overtake them. But the moment the people endeavour to maintain a position from which they could not be dislodged, — the moment they wish to raise between themselves and the aristocracy a barrier which the latter could not overleap, — that moment the Whigs become Tories, and the people are the common enemy. I consider the conduct of her Majesty's Government with respect to Canada is unwise, unconstitutional, and timid withal. It is unwise, because contrary to the opinions of all great statesmen — it endeavours to govern a colony on the principle of coercion. It is obviously unconstitutional, because the resolutions of the Noble Lord invade the constitution of 1791; and it is timid, because, while it has popularity for its aim and oppression for its end, it has not the firmness of purpose to pursue the one or enforce the other. What the people of England must consider in this war, — for war it will be, if the sense of wrong continues, however the present efforts may be crushed, — is this: first, if it is a just war; next, it being just, if it is likely to be attended with success; and, lastly, if successful, is it likely to confer on England a benefit commensurate with the blood and treasure it will cost? To ascertain if it be a just war we must define what principles should direct the mother country in her guardianship of the colonies; for this is the proper term to express the relationship between them. For my part, I think we ought to extend to the colony that liberal policy which may enable it as soon as possible to maintain its independence, and we should govern it with that grace which would induce it, when free, to seek a friendly intercourse with the parent state. When they do separate — for separate they must in the course of time, to repeat the opinion of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire — let it not be by a sudden convulsion, dangerous and degrading to either the one or the other, but let it be by mutual arrangement, which will promote the interest and honour of both. From that principle we have obviously deviated; but lest the opinion that we should nurse a colony merely for independence should be too extreme, let us take the opinions of eminent statesmen, and reflect how they would have acted towards Canada.

Sir James Mackintosh stated, "That a colony should have permission to conduct the whole of its internal affairs, compelling them to pay all the reasonable expenses of their government, and giving them at the same time a perfect control over the expenditure of the money;" and he further said, that "in the government of the colonies nothing is lost in yielding to the wishes of the people when expressed by their representatives." Mr. Fox said, "With regard to foreign colonies, he was of opinion, that the power of the Crown ought to be kept low; it was impossible to foresee what would be the state of a distant colony at a distant time. But in giving them a constitution it was our duty, as well as our interest, to give them as much liberty as we could, — to render them happy, flourishing, and as little dependent as possible; indeed, he thought the more despotic the constitution we gave a colony, the more we made it the interest of that colony to get rid of our constitution: and it was evident the American states had revolted because they did not consider themselves sufficiently free." And in another place he said, applying himself immediately to Canada, that "he conceived the only means of retaining a distant colony with advantage was to enable it to govern itself." Now, I would ask, did not the resolutions of the Noble Lord invade those principles of colonial legislation? Far from extending to Canada a more liberal policy than was extended to the British people, did not her Majesty's Government, in thrusting their hands into the public chest, do what they dared not do in England? Bring the matter home; suppose the Executive could last year have paid itself, what would have been the consequence? We should have had a Tory Administration; the King was avowedly a Tory, and he would have called the Tories to his councils: but they were not sufficiently disinterested to obey the call, as they feared the people would not pay them.

Have the present Government, in refusing to grant to the people an elective Legislative Council, acted in accordance with the opinions of Sir J. Mackintosh, and those other statesmen who told them to receive their principles of government from the recommendation of the people? No; they have deviated from those opinions, and the result has been an increase of ills. Their only argument is an obstinate adhesion to the constitution, not because it is a good, but because it is the old, constitution. The Noble Lord opposite has said, "How ill the Legislative Council has discharged their office, they (the House of Commons) might judge from the papers before them: the members of the council, on every occasion, had enrolled themselves on the side of Government against the wishes of the people, — they stood as an impotent screen between the Government and the people,— they neither repelled the people on the one hand, nor the Government on the other. But while they enabled the one to keep up a war against the other, they were the means of a continued system of jarring and contention. This council was the worst of all the evils which had taken place in the administration here for the last fifteen years." That was the opinion of the Noble Lord who now so warmly advocates the continuance of that council, and the usurpations of the Executive. The only benefit it can be derived from oppression, is the moral instruction which it brings to posterity; for, as success must eventually attend the right, such acts of oppression, as procuring the ultimate triumph of liberty, while they hold out a bright example to the people, teach, at the same time, a striking lesson to improvident monarchs and a reckless aristocracy; and when we view them through the vista of the past, and with the eye of memory, they stand as islands rising above the proper level of justice, on which history has erected beacon lights to guide the giddy vessel of the State. I do not wish defeat to attend the arms of my Sovereign; but I wish victory to crown them whenever they are directed against the natural enemies of the state, and the sovereignty of England.

Mr. BROTHERTON.—Sir, it was not my intention to take any part in this debate, and I shall not trespass long on the indulgence of the House; but I feel it my duty to protest against such language as that which has been used by the Honourable Member for Evesham. By such speeches as that of the Honourable Member, nations become involved in the calamities of a war, and the House knows too well that it is easier to get into a war than out of it. On principle, I am altogether opposed to war. Public opinion, and moral power, are stronger than armies. The use of physical force, in the redress of grievances, produces ten times greater evils than those it removes. I cannot, therefore, justify the Canadians in the means they have adopted. Honourable Gentleman talk loudly of putting down rebellion by physical force; but I would remind them that it is very easy to talk about putting it down, but it may not be quite so easy to accomplish it. It has been admitted, on all sides, that the Canadians have complained of great grievances. Let justice be done, and there will be less difficulty in putting down rebellion. I never can believe that a whole nation will commit suicide. If the insurrection in Lower Canada be limited and partial, it will very soon be put down; if it be general, there must be a cause, and it will be a fearful responsibility to engage in a war against a whole nation. Indeed, if the revolt be so limited as has been represented, no doubt it has been put down already, and, of course, there need not be a suspension of the constitution.

I feel considerable embarrassment and difficulty in this question. I cannot but remember what were my feelings when the Irish Coercion Bill was passed. I thought then that conciliation was preferable to coercion, and we have seen the effects of both.

Having been brought up and accustomed to entertain a reverence for the laws and constitution of the country, I cannot bring my mind to consent to the suspension of a constitution which was granted for the benefit of a whole people, and not of a party. I think it would, in the present instance, be more advisable for Government to pursue a conciliatory course. I highly approve of the appointment of the Earl of Durham; that nobleman is one, in whose judgment and discretion great confidence may be placed; and he might be invested with extensive powers. But I think his lordship will go out under great disadvantages if he carry with him a Coercion Bill; because the people will naturally say, whatever constitution may be proposed by us, if it do not meet the views of a particular party, it will not be established; and if it do not answer the expectations of that party, when established, it will be suspended or altered. The people, therefore, cannot consider themselves as free agents, or feel confidence in the promises of Government. Public opinion, I believe, will be found more efficacious than force; and measures of conciliation and forbearance will tend more to tranquillise the people of Canada — will take greater hold of their gratitude and affection, than the having recourse to violent and harsh proceedings.

Mr. LUCAS. — I should not have obtruded myself upon the attention of the House, if it had not been for the direct appeal that has been made to the Irish Members by the Honourable Member for Mayo. Knowing that most of the Gentlemen from Ireland, on both sides of the House, are absent in attendance upon duties which they consider of greater moment, and such as will more fitly occupy their attention at this time, I was most unwilling to put myself forward; but as I happen to be present, I will answer the appeal of the Honourable Member for Mayo, on the only point which can be justly brought into consideration at the present moment, as indicating a community of interest or feeling between the people of Ireland and the people of Canada. For a long period — a period of nearly 50 years — a considerablee migration has been going on from Ireland to Canada, fostered and encouraged by the loyal and well-meaning residents in the latter country; sanctioned also and protected by the Legislature. Continuing for 50 years, and each year progressively increasing, that process of emigration has had the effect of locating in Canada a large amount both of the population and capital of Ireland. Those who are disposed to emigrate must necessarily have some capital; and all the Irish settlers in Canada, when they quit their native country, either on account of political disasters or pecuniary deficiencies, still carry with them their capital, some more and some less. That capital is embarked in successful mercantile or agricultural speculations, and rests for its protection entirely on the faith of the British Government. The people who have so emigrated are peaceable, industrious, and loyal, attached to the British Government, and inclined to support it if the Government will support them. For the sake, then, of my countrymen in Canada, I must raise my voice against any proposal for the relinquishment of those colonies; or of withholding from those persons who have been induced to embark their capital in Canada, that protection which the Government of their own country has guaranteed to extend to them. I feel it also my duty to protest against the attempts made on the part of the French population to encroach upon the rights of those well-disposed and industrious settlers.

MAJOR MACNAMARA. — I rise only for the purpose of expressing my entire concurrence in all that has fallen from the Honourable Member for Monaghan.

Mr. CLAY. — I cannot bring myself to give a silent vote upon this occasion I cannot forbear from expressing the very great pleasure which I felt at hearing the calm, temperate, and rational speech of my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport, recommending the proper course of policy to be pursued by this country towards Canada. At the same time, I could not help observing, that although my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport, did not attempt to defend the conduct and measures of the insurgents in Lower Canada, still there did appear to be, on his part, a disposition to palliate the insurrection. The same tendency was also manifest in the speech of the Honourable Member for Falkirk. Now, as one whose whole public course has been one of attachment to popular principles, I must say that, in my opinion, the present insurrection in Canada is wholly without justification, without palliation, and without excuse. All their grievances were likely to be redressed — all were in a fair, reasonable, and probable course of adjustment, and it could not be said that they ever wanted for the services of able and earnest advocates in this House. I think there can be but little doubt that by a proper use of the privileges conferred upon them by their constitution, by a legitimate exercise of the power which a representative constitution has placed in their hands, by constitutional means, they might and would have succeeded in obtaining a redress of all the real grievances of which they complain.

I cannot conceive that they had any right to stop the supplies, and thus, throw the whole machinery of government into disorder. They had no right to avail themselves of that power for the purpose of enforcing organic changes in the contitution of 1791. We should look at the nature of the compact between the colonies and the parent state. And upon this point I would observe, that there is no analogy whatever between the claim set up by the House of Assembly of Lower Canada to stop the supplies for the purpose of obtaining an organic change in their constitution, and the legitimate and wise powers in this respect wielded by the Imperial Parliament. There is no second party to the compact in this country. There is no intermediate point of resort. But there is a second party to the compact between the colonies and the parent state. I hold that the former have no right to avail themselves of that control over the revenues, and power of allocation, placed in their hands by the constitution for the purpose of endeavouring to force on an organic change. I am bound to say, that in the case of Lower Canada, that power appears to me to have been wholly and grossly abused by the attempt to wrest from the governor and authorities of Canada demands and concessions which it was not in their power, even if they had been so inclined, to grant. I must also say, that, in the outbreak and whole conduct of this insurrection, I can find neither wisdom of counsel nor boldness of selection: the leaders do not appear to me to exhibit any of those qualifications which would induce one to suppose that they were the leaders of the majority of the people, or that they would make safe and prudent governors of a great and independent nation. In reference to Lord Gosford, I would observe, that though that Noble Lord may have committed an error in his administration of the affairs of the colony, yet it should be remembered it was a mistake on the right side. He may have been slow in his deliberations; but if he did err, it was a noble error, and one which, in my opinion, is likely to find pardon and palliation from the representatives of the people. Of the taking possession of the funds raised by the taxation of the people I certainly cannot approve; although, perhaps, the refusal to grant supplies was some justification for the adoption of that course. But I cannot allow that taking possession of the funds, in accordance with the resolutions, affords any palliation for rebellion. With regard to the plan now proposed, I have great pleasure in stating that it meets with my entire and perfect concurrence. Indeed, it appears to be the only one which could be taken with any prospect of success. In this country, at a distance, and with but a necessarily imperfect knowledge of the circumstances, it would be impossible to legislate with a prospect of a final and satisfactory adjustment of existing differences. Besides, the feeling among the Canadians would not be in favour of any plan originating directly in this country. The plan as proposed by the Government for redressing the grievances of the Canadian population appears to be a wise, generous, and well-considered plan; and I have no doubt that under the auspices of Lord Durham it will be attended with most successful results.

MR. JAMES.—I rise merely to express the great satisfaction I feel at the appointment of the Earl of Durham to the important mission on which he is about to proceed. If any man can settle satisfactorily the unfortunate differences which have arisen between the colony and the mother country, it is that nobleman, from his sound judgment and great talent. I fully concur in the Ministerial plan. I admit that the question would assume a totally different aspect if all the colonies in North America had, like Lower Canada, exhibited a willingness to terminate their connection with and dependence upon this country; but when Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Upper Canada are desirous that that connection should continue and be maintained, I, for one, cannot consent to emancipate Lower Canada from her allegiance to England. If it were otherwise, if all the colonies wished to become independent, I should be quite willing to free this country from the vast expense of her colonial administrations, and allow them to manage for themselves.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN.—I assure the House that in the few observations I feel called upon to make on this occasion, I will not intrude upon their indulgence at any length; but, Sir, I should be ashamed of myself if I could sit still in the House and hear the conduct of the British soldier impugned without cause or reason,—as it has been in the course of this debate,—without rising in my place and offering a few words in his defence. I, Sir, will look back at the various wars in which this country has been engaged, and I will venture to say, that in no case can it be shown that the British soldier was devoid of humanity. It has been said, this evening, that the British troops employed in putting down the insurrection in Lower Canada, burnt down the houses of the inhabitants after the heat of battle had ceased; and I am aware, also, that this has been charged against Colonel Wetherell, the officer in command, — that he not only sanctioned these proceedings, but that persons were in the houses at the time they were set fire to, and, being prevented from escaping, were thus deliberately massacred. Now, there is no mention of any such circumstance having taken place throughout the whole of the papers which have been laid before Parliament? It is true that a fortified house or barn was destroyed by Colonel Wetherell in his advance; and we know that in all wars it is usual to destroy fortifications or buildings from which the opposing troops have received annoyance, and which are capable of affording means of defence to the enemy; but we have no evidence to induce us to the belief that the building in question had within it a single occupant at the time it was fired by the troops.

When this question was discussed on a former occasion, I was sorry to hear it held forth as an argument for giving up the Canadian colonies, that, by possibility, the British soldiers might be induced, by improper motives, to quit their colours, and that they would look to the spoliation of the British settlers in Canada as an advantage that would compensate them for deserting their country. Now, I should like to know when the time was that British soldiers were ever influenced by such base motives? It is perfectly well known that in the army in Canada great desertion takes place. The habits and facilities afforded by the proximity of the United States and the advantages which are held out to the troops lead to that desertion. I know that during the time I was in Ireland, the depôts there had to send out twice the number of troops every year to the Canadas that they had to any other part of the British dominions. But what is the fact now? Why, that of late the troops have not deserted; and I will venture to say that whenever British soldiers may be called upon to do their duty to their country, so far from deserting, every man will be found to stand firm and hold fast by those colours to which he is pledged equally by his honour and his oath. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has said that no preparations were made by the colonial government to anticipate and prevent the revolt, and that the people were driven to insurrection.

Now, I will not trouble the House by going through the various despatches that have been already laid on the Table, but, without quoting the passages, I must contend that they most satisfactorily prove, that every preparation was made that the circumstances of the colony required; while it is well ascertained that the revolt on the part of the Canadians has been most premeditated and determined, and not suddenly excited by any act on the part of the Government. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has constantly stated in this House that he had, on various occasions, foretold the revolt that has since taken place in the Canadian provinces; and, certainly, I know of no individual who had a greater right to foretel it than that Honourable Gentleman himself. I recollect the letters of the Honourable Member — I recollect also the speeches of the Honourable Member. Why, Sir, we all know perfectly well a story, not altogether inapplicable to this case, in which a person named Martin foretold that York cathedral would be burnt, and who then went and set it on fire: and I really cannot help thinking that the Honourable Member has himself greatly contributed, in this way, to fulfil his own prophecy.

With respect to the government of Lord Gosford, I conceive that that Noble Lord carried conciliation as far as was possible. I know he was always most anxious to conciliate the people of Canada; and, indeed, if I have any fault to find with Lord Gosford, it is that he did not feel himself authorised to adopt coercive measures on the first outbreak of the insurrection. Looking from the beginning to the end of these despatches, it will be seen that Lord Gosford's instructions were to do everything that he possibly could to render justice to the Canadians, and to conciliate the feelings of the people of that country. I believe that the present disturbed state of those provinces is entirely owing to the melancholy existence of a strong party in that country inimical to the connection with England; but I hope and trust that the feelings of the people generally are in favour of the continuance of that connection. I will not now discuss the question of the emancipation of the colonies. The day may probably come, when emancipation will be necessary: but I should be sorry to see a great nation like this give up its colonies, because a party in those colonies chooses to arm itself in rebellion against the authority of the mother country. But it is said that this is a question of justice towards the colonists. I admit that it is so; and I would ask the Honourable Member for Kilkenny whether he thinks that Lower Canada is now in a fit state to be emancipated? Whether, in justice to the British settlers there, and those who inhabit Upper Canada, it would be possible to grant emancipation without incurring evils and bloodshed to a much greater extent than can result from the present rebellion? I most sincerely believe that, unless this country asserts its power, and maintains its dominion over Canada, the result will be destructive, not only to the Canadians themselves, but of every British subject who, under the protection of this country, has settled there. It is because I wish to prevent such consequences, that I sincerely hope every means for effecting an amicable settlement of the existing differences will be taken; that the Noble Earl who is about to proceed thither will have full power to conciliate; and that, through his exertions, the Canadians may long continue to live happily under the parental sway of this great nation.

Mr. HUME.—I was extremely happy to hear from the Honourable and Gallant Officer who has just sat down a repetition of what the Right Honourable Baronet opposite last night stepped out of his way to notice, inasmuch as it affords me an opportunity of replying to the observations so irrelevantly introduced by the Right Honourable Baronet, which I feared I should not have obtained, and of which I will at once proceed to avail myself. The Honourable and Gallant Gentleman has, as well as others, lent himself to state that which I will characterise only as a most garbled and incorrect representation. The Honourable and Gallant Gentleman has said, that I might well know that the revolt would take place, because I had foretold it four years ago. Why, Sir, ten years ago I foretold it. When sitting on the opposite side of the House, I recommended that the colonies of Upper and Lower Canada should be separated, amicably, from this country. On that occasion, I stated that if the policy which had been hitherto followed in Canada were continued, it must ultimately lead to resistance and separation. I foretold that, as soon as I beheld the blind and narrow policy which this country was adopting towards those colonies. Ever since my attention has been directed towards the state of our colonies in North America, there has existed nothing but misrule on the part of this country. A limited number of official persons, not having any interest in, nor being connected by property or birth with the colonies, have been uniformly maintained by the British Government in all the official situations in those provinces. The same spirit of religious persecution was pursued, the same disdain shown towards the Roman Catholics in Canada, as had been for so many centuries exhibited towards the Catholics in Ireland.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

What? Why every document proves it. Let those gentlemen who say "No," look to facts. In every respect, except the Government provision for the Catholic clergy, the Catholics of Canada are treated as the Catholics of Ireland were. The cry of "No, no!" therefore, can only have proceeded from those gentlemen who have adopted the one-sided tale which they have heard in this House. It is impossible for any gentleman who has read the Report of the Committee of Inquiry of 1828, to rise from its perusal with any other opinion than that a system of misrule has driven the people of Canada, most reluctantly, to the opinion that it ought to be met with resistance. There is a period when resistance becomes a virtue: and as I have frequently before stated, the parties interested must be the best judges when the time for resistance has arrived.

[Loud cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Such is the fact; and is there anything uncommon in this doctrine? I may be erroneous in my opinions; but I never have flinched, and never shall flinch, from an open and candid avowal of them. My opinions, with respect to the Canadian question, have been before the public for many years; and what I expressed in that letter, which has been garbled by Sir Francis Head, is the opinion I still entertain. I say garbled, because it has suited the purpose of Sir F. Head to send home one part of the letter without sending home the whole. He contented himself with sending home a portion of one letter instead of a dozen letters, which he might have had if he chose.

I am now prepared to repeat all that I stated in that letter. You are now seeing the consequences that have arisen entirely from that system of injustice which has hitherto been acted upon towards the Canadians. I will now read the letter from which the objectionable words have been extracted. It is addressed to Mr. Mackenzie. Gentlemen have spoken of a correspondence between me and Mr. Papineau. I am not aware that I ever had the honour of a letter from that gentleman, or that he ever received one from me, or that anything ever passed between us, except a communication from him of a vote of thanks which the House of Assembly passed for the little services which I had been able to render Canada in this House. But let the documents be produced; let the letters come forward. I do think that that which I foretold has come to pass, in the natural course of events, and that those Gentlemen who had the power to prevent it, have been the real cause of this unfortunate revolt. But I will not interrupt myself again. I must, however, before I begin, say, that the manner in which the Right Honourable Baronet, last night, alluded to Mr. Mackenzie, did show a worse and more vindictive spirit than I expected from him towards any individual, and particularly an individual in the situation in which Mr. Mackenzie is placed.

Now, Sir, who is Mr. Mackenzie? Mr. Mackenzie was once a member of the House of Assembly in Upper Canada. He had been the printer, editor, and proprietor of an opposition paper called The Advocate. A party organisation destroyed his property, pulled down his house, and endangered his life. He prosecuted the parties, and obtained damages for the injury he had sustained. But his enemies were not satisfied. The House of Assembly expelled him for a speech delivered by him on the hustings. The county of York re-elected him. He was expelled again; and re-elected again. Four successive times was he re-elected, in spite of all they could do. His last rejection was only effected by a majority of one; and then, by means of bribery. I, on that occasion, applied to the Colonial Office, and asked whether it was fit that such a course should be pursued? The Colonial Office told me, they did not countenance any such thing, and sent out orders that, as far as Government could influence the House of Assembly, Mr. Mackenzie should not be again expelled. He happened to be in England the last time of his expulsion; and what brought him here? He was deputed by the House of Assembly to support the claims of the colony. It was here, in London, that I became acquainted with him. He stated his case before Lord Goderich, who took immediate measures for remedying the grievances complained of; and I had the pleasure of presenting to that Noble Lord the thanks of twenty-five counties and towns in Canada for the reforms he introduced. Mr. Mackenzie returned to Upper Canada. Immediately after, what was the sense of the people of Toronto towards him? They, at the first meeting of the corporation, established the year before by Act of Parliament, elected him mayor of that city, which office he filled in such a manner as to gain the respect and esteem of a great majority of the people. And this is the gentleman of whom the Right Honourable Baronet spoke as "a Mr. Mackenzie." True; he is a Mr. Mackenzie: but there is also a Sir Robert Peel. But that is not the way to speak of any individual. What further did this lead to? Was he again expelled from the House of Assembly? No: he continued an active member of it for two years. He was chairman of the different committees, and prepared the reports of the grievances of Upper Canada. Was it to be supposed that such a man would be allowed by his opponents to remain quiet? No; they did every thing in their power to injure him; but nothing could be done to prejudice him in the minds of his constituents, until Sir Francis Head, at the last election, succeeded in getting him rejected. After this, the House of Assembly, by a majority of thirty-five to five, met, and tore from the Journals of the House the record of the whole of the proceedings by which he had been expelled, in like manner as was done by this House in the case of Mr. Wilks; and treated him, as will be seen by their speeches and resolutions, with the greatest respect. Such being the character of Mr. Mackenzie, I did feel, when that gentleman left England, that I was justified in doing all I could to see that the reforms, which had been promised by the Colonial Office, should be carried into effect. When I have read my letter, I will read another, and I will venture to say that Mr. Mackenzie, who, though he has become a rebel,——

Why, if he had been successful, he would have been called a patriot. Yes, speeches have been made in this House, by Gentlemen, as if no such thing as revolutions had ever taken place. By what power, I should like to know, does the house of Hanover hold their present seat on the British throne? Was not the first British sovereign of that House placed in that situation by a successful revolution? Let the grounds of the revolution of 1688 be inquired into; I wish the Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets, who has stated that there is no palliation or excuse for the present revolt in Canada, would examine into the grounds of that revolution, and he would find that there was no greater justification for the revolution of 1688, than can be urged on behalf of the Canadian people now.

But by what right does the King of the French hold his throne? Is it by any other than a successful revolution? Yet has not this country even formed an alliance with a sovereign who sits on a rebel throne? Again, by what right is it that the King of Belgium holds his throne? Were Honourable Members on this side of the House slow to recognise him as a lawful sovereign? They seem, indeed, to act upon the doctrine that the people in all countries who make a popular movement, are rebels till they are successful, but patriots when they triumph. Honourable Members on the other side of the House, I am aware, asserted of the Belgians, as of the Canadians now, that they had no grounds for their revolution. I will not stop to inquire which side was right, or which was wrong, in the opinion they formed; but I do say, that the case of the Canadians and the Belgians ought to stand together. The Belgians were successful, and they were proclaimed patriots all, and have been recognised as such; the Canadians seem to be unsuccessful, and they are all denounced as rebels: we give title and honour to the one party, and the gibbet and execution to the other. Honourable Gentlemen seem most mealy-mouthed now, and to be afraid of the mere mention of the term resistance; but do they recollect a statement which was made to the House in 1766, by a Mr. Pitt, when the Government of that day brought in a Bill, not, perhaps, entirely similar to the present Bill, but partaking of much of its spirit, called the Stamp Act? What would that Honourable Gentleman have thought of the rhodomontade which has been uttered by the mealy-mouthed orators of the present day against any man who should dare to think of resistance? Let Honourable Members mark well what he — "a Mr. Pitt" — said upon that occasion: — "We are told that America is obstinate — that America is almost in open rebellion. Sir, I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty, as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of all the rest." For the 3,000,000 let the House read 1,000,000, or even 500,000, and would not the same argument apply in all its details to the present case? Mr. Pitt went on to say, "The Americans have been wronged: they have been driven to madness by injustice. Will you punish them for the madness you have occasioned? No; let this country be the first to resume its prudence and temper." This was the language then held by the Whigs, and the success of the Americans was rewarded and applauded, and the men who had taken part in the rebellion were eulogised as men who had risked their lives for the benefit of the country. And why is the same indulgence denied to the resistance of the Canadians? I think that the Government is acting a most ungenerous part, and I will subsequently state my reason for this opinion more in detail; but, first, I will apply myself to get rid of the personal attack which has been made upon me. The letter which has been complained of was dated the 29th of May, 1834, and was directed to Mr. Mackenzie on the accession of Mr. Stanley to the Colonial Office, and which, with the permission of the House, I will now read: —

> MY DEAR SIR, — I lately received files of the Vindicator and Reformer journals, and am pleased to observe that the electors of the county of York continue firm and consistent in their support to you, and that you manifest the same determined spirit of opposition to abuse and misrule. The Government, and the majority of the Assembly, appear to have lost the little portion of common sense and the prudence which society in general now possess, and they sacrifice the greatest of public principles in gratifying a paltry and mean revenge against you. Your triumphant election on the 16th, and ejection from the Assembly on the 17th, must hasten that crisis which is fast approaching in the affairs of the Canadas, and which will terminate in independence, and freedom from the baneful domination of the mother country, and the tyrannical Acts of a small and despicable faction in the colony.

Well, this was quite true; such must be the result of such a proceeding. The letter proceeds: —

> I regret to think that the proceedings of Mr. Stanley, which manifest as little knowledge of mankind as they prove his ignorance of the spirit and liberal feelings of the present generation, encourage your enemies to persevere in the course they have taken. But I confidently trust that the high-minded people of Canada will not, in these days, be overawed or cheated of their rights and liberties by such men. Your cause is their cause; your defeat would be their subjugation. Go on, therefore, I beseech you; and success,—glorious success,—must inevitably crown your joint efforts.

Was there anything wrong there?

Mr. Stanley must be taught that the follies and wickedness of Mr. Pitt's government, in the commencement of the French revolution, cannot be repeated now, either at home or abroad, without results very different from that which then took place. The proceedings between 1772 and 1782, in America, ought not to be forgotten; and, to the honour of the Americans, and for the interest of the civilised world, let their conduct and the result be ever in view.

To W. L. MACKENZIE, Esq., M. P.
York, Upper Canada.

This is all of importance which this letter, that seems so much to delight Honourable Gentlemen opposite, contains. It shows, only, that I was then, as I have all along been, anxious that the grievances of the Canadians should be remedied; and it should also be remembered, that the letter was written at a most important period, when I was likely to feel most strongly upon the subject. Lord Ripon had removed Mr. Bolton, the Attorney General, and Mr. Haggerman, the Solicitor General, because the one had moved in the Council, and the other in the House of Assembly, that the despatch of his Majesty's Ministers should be laid under the table or be sent back to them. This despatch contained several alterations proposed by Lord Goderich, to meet the wishes of the majority of the people, and these officers had taken the lead in opposing the reforms which the colonial government had wished to take place. Lord Goderich, in consequence of these proceedings, had sent out orders that these gentlemen should either resign or be dismissed. They came home. Now, I will challenge the Noble Lord to produce any insult half so violent as these officers perpetrated against Lord Ripon; but it seems to be the maxim, that the worse persons in the colonies behave, the better they will be treated; for no sooner had Mr. Stanley come into office, than Haggerman the Solicitor General, was sent back to the colony, promoted to the rank of Attorney General, whilst Bolton, the Attorney General, was made a judge, and was sent to Newfoundland; and I think I shall be able to show that most of the stoppage of business complained of in that island is mainly owing to this appointment. It was at the time that these gentlemen were sent back, that I wrote the letter which has been alluded to, and which I have just read. I might, perhaps, have expressed myself in more temperate language, but feeling strongly upon the subject, I expressed myself so as to be understood.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" and, laughter.]

I never mince matters; I call things by their proper names: and seeing what had taken place in 1774, in the United States, I wished to avoid a repetition. Another letter which I sent out to the colony, but which has not been sent back to this country, was to congratulate the colony on the removal of Mr. Stanley, and the appointment of Mr. Rice, and I said that I had known Mr. Rice for many years, and that from what I knew of him, I anticipated a new order of things; and I recommended that the wants of the colony should be embodied in a petition which I hoped would meet with immediate attention; but, at the same time, that they should not give up their exertions till they had obtained good government, which was equally important to England as to the colonies. This was one of two or three letters to the same effect, in all of which my sole object was to prevent the scenes which have since taken place. If the Right Hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth had known all this, I think he never would have made the observations which he, last evening, stepped out of his way to do. I never intended my letters for publication, — they were mere private communications; but the publication only shows how dangerous it is to write privately to a printer. At the same time, I would tell Honourable Members that I never write anything on private or public affairs which I care about being printed.

But to show the House why the importance of my first letter was so magnified, I will call the attention of the House to what took place during the late elections. We all know the endeavours made on either side to make out a strong case in favour of the particular colours under which each was to fight. We (the Reformers) had for our standing dish the affairs of Canada, and the misconduct of the Duke of Cumberland, and, I must confess, that I am always most willing to apply myself to the latter point in the best way I can. The other Honourable Gentlemen had for their great stalking-horse the fear of Mr. O'Connell; and I will venture to assert, that there was not a Tory hustings throughout the country, which did not resound with cries on one of two questions — either respecting the Poor Law, or Mr. O'Connell and the Church. Now Honourable Members opposite might be honest with respect to O'Connell and the Church, but they were most dishonest with regard to the Poor Law Bill. But, at the time of the publication of this letter, an election was about to take place in Canada; and to make a good use of the letter, the common council of Toronto were called together to pass a resolution declaring that it tended to a separation between the colony and the mother country. This proposal was met by the following resolution: —

> That forced and unfair constructions have been attempted to be put upon the letter of Joseph Hume, Esquire, dated, Bryanston Square, March 29. 1834, by those who are hostile to the correction of the abuses in the administration of our provincial affairs; that the electors of the county of York fully deserve the commendation bestowed upon them by the great Reformer, for their continued, firm, and consistent support of their representative, upon his repeated unlawful expulsions from the Commons' House of Assembly, whose rash and unconstitutional conduct betrays a want of common sense and prudence, being a sacrifice of the greatest of public principles, and an invasion of the rights of the whole body of electors in the county; that Mr. Hume justly regards such conduct on the part of the Legislature, — countenanced, as it was, by the Crown Officers and other executive functionaries in the Assembly, and unredressed by the exercise of the royal prerogative, as evidence of baneful and tyrannical domination, in which conduct it is both painful and injurious to find the provincial officials systematically upheld by the Minister at home against the people; that Joseph Hume, Esquire, in desiring their independence and freedom from all such misrule, has nowhere expressed a desire to withhold from the people of this province that protection from the mother country which he has for years generously laboured to secure for them, upon the principle of good government and enlightened policy; and that he has evidenced the sincerity of his intentions by frequently repeated appeals to the Colonial Ministry and British House of Commons, for the redress of existing grievances; that Mr. Hume's opinion of the provincial Executive is justified by the solemn declaration of the people of this province, through their representatives in a late Parliament, when they unanimously addressed the present lieutenant governor in the following language; viz.: — "We feel unabated solicitude about the administration of public justice, and entertain a settled conviction that the continuance about your Excellency of those advisers who, from the unhappy feeling they pursued, have long deservedly lost the confidence of the country, is highly inexpedient, and calculated seriously to weaken the expectations of the people from the impartial and disinterested justice of his Majesty's Government."

This amendment was carried by a majority of 13 to 7, in spite of the influence of the Government; and it thus appears that my letter was made a mere stalking-horse to get the council to affirm by a vote what it never thought or believed.

I fearlessly challenge the production of any other document in proof of that assertion; and I say, if they who have made this charge knew of any such document to substantiate it, let them produce it, or hold their tongues for ever. Now to the question before the House; but first, who, let me ask, has obliged me to digress into this subject? Why the Right Honourable Baronet opposite. Upper Canada had never been mentioned in the debate, — had not found any place in the speech of the Noble Lord, — had not once been alluded to; yet the Right Honourable Baronet must needs drag Upper Canada into the discussion, for the purpose of showing that my letter may have had some influence on the proceedings which subsequently took place in Lower Canada. Yesterday, when the subject of Canada was before the House, on the question of the address, I, and those who act with me, pressed her Majesty's Government to allow a delay of twenty-four hours, to afford time for consideration of the question; and I must say, I think that the Government have behaved very ill in this matter; I think that the Noble Lord, as leader in this House, has by no means acted with the same respect to the Commons of England as the head of her Majesty's Government recently manifested to the Lords, when they wanted to have time given them; for they assented to the proposition. And are we, then, the Members of this House, to be trampled upon and treated thus; and is no time allowed us to consider this subject? If this is to be so, I shall only say, that the course which the Noble Lord has pursued is perfectly right; but if these propositions are to be discussed, the Noble Lord's conduct appears to me singular and unaccountable. I must, again, ask, — is it gravely proposed that every measure, of whatever character it may be, is to be passed as soon as brought in by her Majesty's Government? However, as the opportunity of the Address is gone by, it is my intention to move an amendment to the motion of the Noble Lord, and to take the sense of the House on the question. This, observe, is my own motion merely, and I ask no Gentleman to support me in it. I shall do so, with the leave of the House, because I was not able, last night, to express my opinions on the whole question; and because, in consultation with other Gentlemen, I find that to them, also, it will be a satisfaction if I be allowed to place my opinions on the Journals of this House. As to the opinions of the Honourable Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, I have already alluded to one or two of them, and I was sorry to find my Honourable Friend (Mr. Clay) expressing so cordial a concurrence in the general principles of this measure. But there is one point with respect to which my Honourable Friend, I must say, has read the papers on the table of the House to very little purpose, when he says that the House of Assembly had no right to stop the supplies, and, therefore, did wrong in adopting that course. Has my Honourable Friend read the despatch of Lord Glenelg to Lord Gosford, dated June 17. 1836, where it is said, in reference to this case, "His Majesty does not deny that this is a power which the law has intrusted to the representatives of the people?" I do venture to hope that my Honourable Friend does not mean to deny what his late Majesty thus asserted. My Honourable Friend was plainly wrong in stating they had not this power: the only matter of question is, whether it has been exercised with due discretion or not. For my part I clearly think that the House of Assembly were in the right on this point. However, it is to be observed that they did not stop the supplies altogether, but only as to a part; they voted them accompanied with certain conditions in the nature of restrictions.

Another remark of my Honourable Friend has much surprised me. My Honourable Friend has said, that the management of the Canadian leaders of this revolt has not been such as would go to show that they possess judgment sufficient to make good governors. But the people of Canada will have judged of that, and I cannot see why that opinion came to be stated by my Honourable Friend, except it was on the ground that success makes patriots, — defeat, traitors. But does the degree of their talent constitute that of their treason? Then, again, when my Honourable Friend reads once more the Address of the House of Assembly to Lord Gosford, dated the 6th of November, 1835, I think he will find his error with respect to the appropriation of monies without consent of the Assembly. He has contended that the Canadians had no pretext for the course which they have pursued. Why, I will show him that even Lord Gosford deprecated the taking of the Canadian money without the consent of the Assembly. That House said this: "We ought, however to express to your Excellency our conviction that the application of any sums of money subject to the control of this House, without the consent of the representatives of the people, would tend to create an obstacle to the arrangements contemplated by his Majesty's Government, which we most sincerely desire to see completed." This may be regarded as the last warning voice raised by the Assembly, to dissuade the British Government from interfering with the monies under their control. Did this have any effect upon our Government? Not the least in the world. The Noble Lord's resolutions passed, and the effect of them has been to increase the irritation and excitement which previously prevailed in the Canadas. Having grievances to be redressed, and complaining as they did of rights withheld, I cannot think that the Assembly were wrong in making a conditional stoppage of the supplies.

[Loud cries of "Question, question!"]

Sir, I am sorry to detain the House, but it is requisite for me to show (and I trust Gentlemen will bear with me whilst I do so) that the Government is taking a course which is not necessary. We have been told that the Government is disposed to act in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people in that country. I only wish that it would do so; and I am now going to show the error into which the Noble Lord fell last night when he stated his belief that the conduct of the liberal party was not viewed with approbation by so many of the Canadians as was supposed. Have they not opposed the resolutions agreed to in the fourteenth Parliament of Canada, not hastily, but after due deliberation, passed by a majority of sixty Members, representing an aggregate of 372,000 persons, and opposed only by twenty-eight Members, representing but 138,000, — the number of Liberal Members who voted having thus a constituency double those of the Opposition? That Parliament was dissolved, and the result was, that the minority of twenty-eight was reduced to eleven, showing that the people were determined to support their representatives; and in the next Parliament the number of Members supporting the resolutions was increased to seventy-seven, representing a population of 477,000, whilst the eleven dissentients only represented 34,000, — thus proving that the assertion of grievances was not merely the effect of excitement, got up by one, two, or three men of talent, with the talented M. Papineau—— at their head; but that it was the settled opinion of the country, on which the decision of the local Parliament might be considered as the embodied verdict.

[A laugh, and cries of "Oh, oh!"]

[Renewed cries of "Oh, oh!"]

It may be very unpleasant to Honourable Gentlemen, who have listened with so much satisfaction to a statement which pleased themselves, to hear anything militating against their preconceived notions; but I must proceed. If any proof stronger than the renewed vote were required to show the opinion of the country, there is still another. Why did not Lord Gosford dissolve the Assembly? The constitutional argument is, that if the vote of the House was thought factious, or as misrepresenting the people, a dissolution should take place; but the reason why the appeal to the people was not made was given in Lord Gosford's reply, — "I cannot dissolve the Assembly, because the same men would be sent back." I can well recollect that when the House of Commons was divided in the proportion of 300 to 302 on the Reform Bill, William the Fourth came down to the House, and dissolved the Parliament: he saw a difference of opinion, on that occasion, so slight as to make him doubt which side really represented the people, and to them he appealed for a decision. The result was as unequivocal as it is notorious, — the Members on the benches opposite were reduced from 300 to 156. I think, therefore, that we ought to be satisfied with using constitutional means to effect a reconciliation with Canada; and I would say, "Do not suspend the constitution; do not send out Lord Durham with a Bill of pains and penalties;" for such is not the way to make peace — such is not the method to appease the irritation which, unfortunately, exists in those countries. If peace be the object of Ministers, they are, in my opinion, taking measures more likely to mar than to effect it. Let them learn from experience. Let them send out Lord Durham, if they please, with paramount power; let him exercise to the full every prerogative of the Crown; but let him not go armed with a Bill of oppression. By the course we are now pursuing we are acting most unjustly, in taking away the democratic power from the hands of the people; and we are but doing over again what was done by the British Parliament in 1774. I say, we are doing precisely what was proposed at that period by Lord North, who, in the House of Commons, in the debate on the government of Massachusetts Bay, on the 28th of March, 1774, said, "I propose in this Bill to take the executive power from the hands of the democratic part of the Government. I would propose that the governor should act as a justice of peace, and that he should have the power to appoint the officers throughout the whole civil authority, such as the sheriffs, provost, marshal, &c. I therefore move you, Sir, that leave be given to bring in a Bill for the better regulating the government of the province of Massachusetts Bay." And let the House look back and see what has been the effect of the course which was then pursued. The moderately liberal party in America, who were most anxious to preserve the connection with England, on the mere arrival of Lord North's proposal for a Bill, became as much opposed to this country as they had previously been to a separation; in short, precisely the same effect was produced as was lately experienced on the reception in Canada of the resolutions of this House of November last. And it is natural that the same causes should produce the same results. Lord North's Bill produced nothing but dissension and discontent; and are the Canadians a different class of men from those in the United States? True, it has been said that the Canadians are cowards, and will not fight; but precisely the same thing was said of the Americans. Well do I recollect Colonel Tarleton's boast, that with a single sergeant's company of dragoons he would march through the whole of North America. I can only apply to this Bill the language of Lord Camden, used in the debate of the 15th of March, 1775, on the Bill for restraining the trade and commerce of the New England colonies: — "We are told by some that this is a Bill of firmness and rigour to fill up the measure of justice and to inflict condign punishment on the obstinate and rebellious colonists; but by others, that it is a Bill of mercy, kind and indulgent to the Americans. But, my Lords, the true character of the Bill is violent and hostile. My Lords, it is a Bill of war; it draws the sword, and in its necessary consequences plunges the empire into civil and unnatural war." This is precisely the kind of war which must have been meant to be referred to by the Honourable and Gallant Officer who has just sat down, and it is just that sort of war which I most deprecate. Every step which we are taking is leading us deeper and deeper into the mire, and the measures which are now being adopted will, in my opinion, produce the most mischievous effect. Sir, I had hoped that such a course would have been pursued as would have justified me in using the words of Lord Chatham, who, having been tired out with the long and weary speeches which he had heard—— when he, on the 1st of February, 1775, submitted his Bill for settling the troubles of America, after stating that the colonies were entitled to all their rights, added, —"So shall true reconcilement avert impending calamities; and this most solemn national accord between Great Britain and her colonies, stand an everlasting monument of clemency and magnanimity in the benignant father of his people; of wisdom and moderation in this great nation, famed for humanity as for valour; and of fidelity and grateful affection from brave and loyal colonies to their parent kingdom, which will for ever protect and cherish them." And so, Sir, say I. I hold with Lord Chatham. There is another instance on record, which is the case that was quoted by the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), in which measures of conciliation to Ireland were strongly advocated. Mr. Fox, in his speech on the state of Ireland, in March, 1797, said:—"I would, therefore, concede; and if I found I had not conceded enough, I would concede more. I know of no way of governing mankind but by conciliating them; and, according to the forcible way which the Irish have of expressing their meaning, 'I know of no mode of governing the people but by letting them have their own way.' And what shall we lose by it? If Ireland is governed by conceding to all her ways and wishes, will she be less useful to Great Britain? What is she now?" Now, Mr. Fox is justly held to be high authority, and the Noble Lord eulogised this reasoning on a former occasion. Well, what is Canada now? Or would she be less useful if her just demands were conceded to her? The case was made out for Ireland; and let me only, in stating it to the House, exchange the name of Ireland for that of Canada, and I will say, let the Canadians govern themselves, by allowing them to have their own way; let the people of Canada be benefited by the application of the same principles with the people of Ireland, and let them have the option of adopting their own system of government. I have done my duty, in explaining to the House the grounds on which I oppose the Bill; and I repeat, that I am of opinion that it is advisable, by peace and attempts at reconcilement, to endeavour to maintain a colony in connection with the mother country as long as possible; but so soon as the affection between the two countries is found to have ceased to exist, the sooner the system of separation is adopted the better it will be for the welfare of both. It is on this ground, therefore, that I put in my protest against the proceedings which it is proposed to adopt. I have prepared a resolution, on which I had intended to take the sense of the House, as it embodies my reasons for refusing leave to the Noble Lord to bring in the Bill; but it appears that, in the opinion of many Honourable Members who are sitting near me, it is considered better that I should postpone its proposition until the second reading of the Bill, in the event of such Bill being brought in. I must acknowledge, that I am still most unwilling to come to this conclusion; but the ground suggested to me by the Honourable Gentlemen in question is,—that such a resolution should not be put until the House has had an opportunity of seeing the object of the Bill. For my part, I declare that I can see no reason for any part of a measure being seen, the whole of which is bad. I shall, however, for the present, satisfy myself with taking the sense of the House against the introduction of the Bill; but, on its being brought forward for a second reading, I will take care that it be further considered.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — I rise to offer two words in explanation. The Honourable Member who has just sat down, appears to have misunderstood one part of the observations I addressed to this House. I beg to assure him, that I am one of the last men in the world to calumniate any one. I do not believe that the Honourable Member wishes to create a revolt in Canada; but when the Honourable Member asks, "what other letters he has written, which have been alluded to," I tell him that I do not know: but this I know, that no man had a better claim to foretel the breaking out of a revolt in Canada than the man who wrote that letter to Mr. Mackenzie.

Mr. CLAY. — My Honourable Friend (Mr. Hume) is wrong in supposing that I ever denied the right of the House of Assembly to refuse to grant the supplies. I never said so. On the contrary, I clearly stated that they had the right; but I denied the analogy which he attempted to establish, between the present case and that of our rupture with the provinces of North America in 1774.

SIR GEORGE GREY.—It is not my intention to occupy the attention of the House for a very long time; nor should I, perhaps, have been tempted to speak on this occasion at all, but for the observations which have fallen from the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny. Had it been my fortune, however, to rise before that Honourable Member, it would have been my duty not only to express the very high gratification which I have derived from this debate, and to congratulate the House on the degree of unanimity which has prevailed this evening on the subject of the motion of the Noble Lord (John Russell), but also to remark, with peculiar pleasure, on the tone and temper of the debate of this evening, as compared with those of the last night before the recess. Perhaps, the debate which occurred prior to our adjournment at the close of last year was thus differently characterised, owing to the want of adequate information which we were then labouring under. The question, no doubt, is one which requires the most grave and deliberate consideration; and I rejoice that the House now sees the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, alone, on that side of the question which he supports. Does he, or does he not, stand there as the advocate of rebellion? Why, Sir, he has not called upon this House to suspend its judgment or opinion as to the conduct of Mackenzie. The Honourable Member has admitted facts with regard to Mr. Mackenzie, to the extent at which they had been already stated in the public prints; and then he has declared that the Right Honourable Baronet opposite had been guilty of great want of courtesy in respect to that individual, in calling him "a" Mr. Mackenzie. The Honourable Member, however, perhaps would not have objected to the plain term of "traitor" being applied to him: and, after the speech of the Honourable Member, it may reasonably be supposed—nay, I am bound in charity to suppose,—that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny considers the crime of rebellion as nothing;—that he does not consider any disgrace to be conveyed by the application of that term to any one. The Honourable Member has given a history of the transanctions in which Mr. Mackenzie has been an actor. But who is this Mr. Mackenzie? and what is the result of that history? The result of the whole statement is, that, without the shadow of any adequate, any absolute grievance, this man has plunged Canada in revolt and bloodshed; that he has brought, without any pretence, or an excuse for his conduct, his country, hitherto enjoying peace, to a state of warfare and misery,—for no good object, and on no reasonable allegation of wrongs,—but merely to gratify some vindictive political feeling which he, in common with others of his party, entertain. I am glad to find, however, that Sir Francis Head had formed a much more just estimate of the feelings of the people of Upper Canada towards England than Mr. Mackenzie, or any of his partisans; and the opinion which Sir Francis formed has been fully borne out by the result. He authorised Sir John Colborne to withdraw every soldier from the colony of Upper Canada, because he knew that he could depend upon the loyalty of the inhabitants of that province to defend and support the authority of the Crown, and, in the event of any insurrection, to put it down.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has complained of the case of Upper Canada having been at all introduced into this debate, though it had nothing to do with the question before us. On the last occasion, however, on which he addressed the House before the adjournment, he told us that the state of the Upper province had every thing to do with this question; that the then existing insurrection did not only affect Lower Canada, but would spread itself into the Upper province; and that the opinions of Mr. Mackenzie were put forth there, and with some success; that the people were dissatisfied, and that the contest for independence would soon extend itself to that portion of the colony. In short, he spoke almost with a prescience of Mackenzie's actual movements as they afterwards came to our knowledge. A few days only after these assertions were made, which I met with a broad and general denial, relying on the previous information I had on the subject,—that specific information was received,—which has now been laid before the House, but on which the Honourable Member has said nothing to-night, of the facts which had been predicted. It was said, too, the House will remember, that Nova Scotia was in a state of revolt. I particularly replied to that statement, that the spirit which unhappily prevailed in Lower Canada at least did not flourish in our other North American colonies,—that such was not the case in Nova Scotia;—and was I not right? Why, from that colony an address to the Crown has since been received, couched in as loyal terms as ever proceeded from the inhabitants of any country, testifying their abhorrence at the measures taken by the insurgents, and declaring their determination to adhere to their allegiance to the British Crown, and expressing their sense of the value of the British protection. What was the feeling of the inhabitants of New Brunswick? The same as that which existed in Nova Scotia, of which the then governor had said, that if circumstances should render it necessary for maintaining the British ascendancy (but I rejoice to say such a case has not happened so far as the information received at present will allow me to judge), he could put himself at the head of from 1000 to 5000 volunteers, and march into Lower Canada in aid of the Queen's troops and of the British Government. But no such necessity existed, and need not henceforward be feared, owing to the loyalty that still animates the people of Lower Canada, in which opinion I am borne out by the papers now lying on the table of the House. Here, then, both in Nova Scotia and Upper Canada, a determination was expressed to spare the soldier, and relieve his fatigues.

For the reasons I have stated, although a spirit of insurrection has been infused into the latter province by a few individuals, working on the excitable minds of a portion of the people, I feel confident that their success can be but partial and limited, from the existence of that healthy feeling which I have spoken of, as well as from the forces and the aid thus afforded by the loyalty of the great bulk of the community, to the object of crushing this revolt in its first manifestations. Allusion was made, in the course of last night's debate, to the want of troops in Lower Canada at the time of the breaking out of these insurrectionary movements; and we heard much complaint of the want of foresight said to have been manifested by the Government and its functionaries in providing for such an emergency. It has been shown that this charge is entirely groundless, for during last year the force has been greater than in any preceding one. One regiment that was to have left its station for Canada has not done so; and although Sir Colin Campbell has received instructions to send what forces he can thither, if it be considered necessary, yet, no such necessity having arisen, those instructions had not been acted on at that time. Since then, however, it has been deemed expedient that troops should be sent, and I have no doubt they have already arrived there, though only to find that their services will not be required. Deeply deploring, as I do, the spirit which has induced some men of influence in Upper Canada to act as they have done, in the mode in which they have exercised that influence, it is a gratifying circumstance to note the general feeling which has been excited among the British Canadians, in all the British American colonies, which is against those individuals and their views, and which has elicited a deep-rooted attachment to British Government and British connection. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has compared the present case with that of the American war, consequent upon the separation of our North American colonies; but I need hardly allude to it, for it is only a superficial and very limited notion of English history that can suggest such a comparison. The revolt, in the present case, I consider as very limited, from the genuine British feeling which pervades the colony, and which has been fostered and promoted by British rule. I think there is no more ground for comparison or parallel between the two cases than between the able and eloquent speech of Lord Chatham and the speech we have heard to-night from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. The Honourable Gentleman may think that this is matter of opinion, and I only state my own impression.

The Honourable Member has also alluded to certain existing grievances in Lower Canada, in terms of virulent condemnation. I shall not more specifically allude to these at present, because in justice to Lord Gosford, I must say, that it is necessary in the first place, and right and proper, that we should specifically know what these grievances are. Instead of this, the Honourable Gentleman has contented himself with certain general averments as to particular individuals, having been unfairly or oppressively excluded from office, and of Roman Catholics having been harshly treated by the Canadian Government. It is but just that I should remind the House that the instructions addressed to Lord Gosford last year, and which will be found among the papers now before it, but to which the Honourable Member has found it convenient to omit all reference in his speech, contained explicit declarations to Lord Gosford that he should, in all matters in which he might be called upon to interpose, act in a spirit becoming a British Governor dealing with British Colonists; in such a way, in short, as he would feel calculated to prove agreeable to this House and to her Majesty's Government. With reference to that Nobleman, himself, I do think that, considering the trying circumstances under which his Lordship has been called on to act, he has not been fairly dealt with in this debate. In the event of any specific complaint being brought forward of a substantive grievance which has not yet been remedied, I pledge myself to the assertion that no such allegations can rest on any good foundation. In the mean time, I must say tnat I think many ungenerous and unjust allusions have been made to Lord Gosford, by the Noble Member for Cornwall, for example, and also by other Honourable Gentlemen at that side of the House. The charges against the Noble Lord are vague in place of being specific, or I would meet them severally. I would fearlessly appeal to his conduct as governor. On the part of the Government at home, no dissatisfaction has been expressed at that conduct. On the contrary, every thing has tended to show that his Lordship acted as long as he could, on those measures of conciliation which he was sent out to Canada to forward and carry into effect, and which it was the most anxious desire of this Government to see him supported in, and which formed moreover the course at once most congenial to the feelings of the members of that Government, and most consonant to the principles of the British Constitution. It was only when these measures and efforts of conciliation failed, that Lord Gosford was driven to the necessity of directing certain acts, in consequence of which he has been stigmatised as a tyrant by the Member for Kilkenny, and designated as weak and imbecile by Honourable Members, who sit on the opposite benches.

But I do think that the conduct of the Noble Lord, on being looked at in all its bearings, is the best proof of its having been characterised by liberality and justice. Lord Gosford has been thus attacked because he has not thrown himself into the arms of one of the two parties in the colony. I admit that he has failed; but in thus exciting the anger of both parties in adopting the course which he has taken, he must be considered more unfortunate than guilty. He has concealed nothing from the government, and he has best supported the Queen's authority, by dismissing from office those magistrates and officers of the militia on whose co-operation, in the event of any insurrection or revolt, he knew he could not safely rely. He has acted with prudence and with temper in the discharge of his arduous functions. The proclamations which he has issued have been condemned; but could any better course have been adopted than that which was taken in them, which has had the effect of opening the eyes of those deluded persons who had joined the leaders of the revolutionary faction, which warned them against placing too much confidence in those leaders, which condemned the influence which they had gained, and beyond all this, warned the people from attending popular meetings, and from identifying themselves with those who had already broken out into rebellion against the legal authority representing the British Crown? And when the standard of revolution has been already unfurled, will the House condemn the governor for issuing a proclamation calling upon the people to return to their allegiance and duty, and to the protection of Government, and which besides offered them an amnesty, provided they would at once abandon those bodies by which they were being led to misery and destruction? If any specific charge be brought forward, I shall be prepared at once to meet it, and am ready to say that it has met that attention from the Government which it demanded. Lord Gosford does not retire from the Government under circumstances which will reflect anything in the shape of discredit upon him; but on the contrary, he retires, his conduct being fully approved of by his Sovereign, as well as by the Government under which he has acted.

There has been one point referred to by the Honourable Member for Bridport, which he says in some degree implicates the Government in the mode of carrying on the war, but which does not in any way justify the observations which have been made regarding the British troops and their conduct. Looking at the despatches which have reached the Government, and the accounts which we receive of the demeanour of the troops, I do not see how the Government can abstain from stating the entire satisfaction with which they view their steadiness, and the praiseworthy manner in which they have acted. But to show that the contest will not be carried on after resistance has ceased, I will appeal to the steps that have been taken. As for the destruction of the fortified houses, I will ask the Honourable Gentleman whether that was not the best course that could be taken for the sake of the peasantry themselves, who had been led into these acts of insurrection, and were thus prevented from again involving themselves in the same risk and danger in which they had so recently engaged? What was the language of the Government itself in the instructions that had been sent out to the governor of the province of Lower Canada? "Her Majesty cannot contemplate the bloodshed and misery in which a portion of her subjects have involved themselves without the deepest feeling of regret for the necessity which has occasioned the active services of her troops in one of the provinces of the British empire. The Queen, however, entertaining the fullest confidence that, as far as depends on yourself,"—and it should be recollected that at this time Sir John Colborne had been appointed civil and military governor of the province,—"these evils will be restricted within the narrowest possible limits, and that on the part of her loyal and faithful subjects in the province, no vindictive feeling will mingle itself with their zealous and strenuous endeavours, under your guidance, to put down insurrection and revolt, and to vindicate the authority of the law; but that their conduct will be equally marked with moderation as with firmness."

Such was the spirit in which all the despatches to the governor of the province were drawn; and he was strongly urged to take any measure to prevent the sufferings of the people of the districts unhappily engaged in the revolt, from extending beyond what was required by the exigencies of the case. I will not trouble the House further; but I felt called upon to make the few observations which I have addressed to it, in consequence of what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny; and I regret that the Honourable Gentleman has not at once proposed the resolution to which he has alluded. I certainly entertained the sincere hope and expectation that the Bill, the provisions of which have been explained by my Noble Friend, and which is now to be laid on the table, will furnish the means of putting an end to those evils, and removing those difficulties which have retarded the welfare of the province of Lower Canada, and will ultimately lead to the adoption of measures that will develope the resources of both provinces, bound together as they are by common ties and common interests. I trust that the proceedings which will grow out of the measures before the House, will prove beneficial to both the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and that the inhabitants of these countries will find that the British Government is supported by the British Parliament in carrying out measures tending to the permanent interest and welfare of those colonies; that they will not sanction any measure that tends to hasten the separation of the colonies from the mother country, nor endeavour to retard that separation by measures of harshness and severity; but I sincerely trust that the course about to be pursued will be such that the connection may prove beneficial both to the mother country and the colony, and that, by the promotion of the common interest of both, the union will be rendered permanent.

Mr. BAINES.—I rise, not to prolong the debate, but to intreat my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny not, under the circumstances of the case, to call for a division, upon an amendment which impeaches the merits of a Bill not yet before us. Of these merits it is impossible for us to judge, for we have not yet even seen the Bill, and therefore can know nothing either of its recommendations or its defects. I have also risen, Sir, for the purpose of asking the Noble Lord (J. Russell), when this Bill will be printed and in the hands of Honourable Members; for, unless copies can be distributed without delay, it will hardly be fair to call upon Gentlemen to discuss a Bill which is to come before them at so early a day as Monday next.

Mr. HUME.—I would just state that, as I am going to divide the House on the question of the principle only, I cannot see the necessity, as the Honourable Member for Leeds puts it, of this House having the details before it, prior to deciding on that principle.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—As the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has now explained his intention of dividing the House on the principle of the Bill, it is necessary for other Honourable Gentlemen to state, what it is that they intend to do on this occasion. I therefore will state, at once, that I shall vote for leave to bring in the Bill; but in doing so, I do not by any means intend to express unqualified approbation of the course which has been pursued by her Majesty's Ministers. Considering that the constitution of Lower Canada is, at present, practically suspended, I do believe it may be well and necessary to pass a Bill in its provisions similar to some portions of the Bill which is now proposed to us. And, so far as this Bill goes, to give a legal or authoritative sanction to the suspension of the constitution of Lower Canada, and to make provision for the temporary administration of the government of that province, I shall not object to it. But, Sir, I do not quite understand the other provisions of this Bill, as they have been explained by the Noble Lord; and I do hope that Members on all sides of this House, whatever may be their conflicting opinions upon the merits of this Canadian question, will seriously consider the grave importance and possible consequences of those provisions under which the Noble Lord proposes to call a convention of the states of Upper and Lower Canada, for the purpose of considering what, at some future time, shall be the principles of their constitution, and the form of their government. I greatly doubt the soundness of the policy proposed to be pursued, in the course which this proceeding must involve; especially, and above all, as regards the Lower province, where men's minds are still inflamed with all which has so recently been passing around them, and where they are likely to be still further excited by your thus agitating the question of a new constitution. If your object be to bring about an amicable union between the people of the two provinces, I greatly doubt the policy of forcing on, at the present time, the discussion of any such measure. I greatly doubt whether both the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada are not now in that state of political excitement which would make it either inexpedient or impracticable to frame such a measure for such a purpose at this moment. I greatly doubt whether the feelings of the different parties in each province are not still in a state of exasperation, which would make it not prudent,—I might almost say practicable, at the present time, to bring about any such result.

The Noble Lord, as a part of his plan for effecting the object of this convention, appears to intend that this convention of estates having legislative authority, and the members of which are to be elected in a certain manner, as I understand the Noble Lord to say that they will be, — shall be composed of three members of the Legislative Council of Upper Canada, and of three members of the Legislative Council of Lower Canada; these are to meet together, and to be aided in their consultations by a certain number of other persons, also having a representative character. And, since there is already a representative assembly in the Upper province, it may not be difficult to get proper persons duly authorised to assist on the behalf of that Assembly. I do not say whether or not this part of the plan may be wise, although it may be legal. But now, when you are about to suspend the constitution of Lower Canada, — how are you to get representatives, or any other persons, to whom you can communicate a legal or authorised character to act on behalf of this great member of the estates, namely, Lower Canada? In what way is the Assembly of that province to attend at this convention? Do you mean to say that you will give to the governor of the colony for the time being, the power to nominate persons to attend in this capacity? If that be the Noble Lord's intention ——

[Cries of "No, no!" from the Ministerial benches.]

Well, then, I do not understand the Noble Lord. How can parties from Lower Canada assume to be representatives, when, by your own Act, the constitution is suspended? Representation will thus have been put an end to. How, then, are your deputies to be convened? It is certain that I do not quite understand the expression of the Noble Lord; but I must say, that many parts of a measure like this, giving a form of representation to a people while their constitution is actually suspended, and the whole country under martial law, — a measure, therefore, of a most anomalous and dangerous character, — will require, and I hope will find, from all Members of this House, the most jealous vigilance, and the most scrutinising attention. We should remember, all parties among us, that we are bound by every consideration to devote the utmost care and caution to the investigation of a measure like this, which we should recollect, by suspending the constitutional functions of the House of Assembly in Lower Canada, is an act of neither more nor less than absolute despotism—justifiable despotism, perhaps, under the circumstances, but still despotism; and it is far better that the Act, for the sake of precedent, should appear in its proper colours, than that it should pretend to give a constitution to Canada which cannot practically exist. It is useless and unwise to conceal the real character of such a measure. What I object to is, that we pretend, at the present moment, to conciliate, by saying that a certain form of representation shall exist, for the purpose of forming a body to frame the future constitution. If local inquiries are indispensable to be made, let them be instituted by a commission, appointed in recognised form, under the Crown, without suspending the constitution of the colony. I think, indeed, it would have been much better to confine ourselves to the necessity of the case, and suspend the constitution for a time, than for the present to take any steps towards framing a new constitution. The proper course would have been, for the representatives of England to declare, that they would make every inquiry, or direct inquiry to be made, so as to obtain adequate information to guide their future legislation on the subject. But this is not what the Noble Lord says, and I do trust that Honourable Gentlemen will not be led to mistake the nature of this measure.

The Noble Lord, on introducing the Bill says, that there should be an assembly chosen, of a nature which some people would call a convention of estates, and that this should be composed of persons representing both provinces; that they shall be a body speaking the sentiments, and giving expression to the feelings, of the people of both colonies, and that they shall assemble to draw up certain measures for the future government of those countries. But, then, my answer is again — the question, — "in what way will you provide that these representatives of the Assembly of the Lower province shall be chosen and appear, when you yourselves are in the very act of suspending the constitution of that province?" Does the Noble Lord mean that the governor of the province should name the districts, and the class of persons who are to choose these representatives? Does the Noble Lord mean to name the persons who shall be qualified to be chosen as representatives, or whom he will accept as such should they be elected? Or, does the Noble Lord mean that the governor of the province shall at once name those who are to represent that province?

All these things must be defined. I say, it is infinitely better to set out this, your measure, in its true light, — what it is you intend, by "a representation;" — for anything like that which you now suggest, in the way of a "representation," would be a mere mockery in Lower Canada, where you effectually extinguish the principle, — and thus to guard against a dangerous precedent, than to attempt to clothe it with a character or aspect of liberality, which, in reality, it does not possess. And therefore, if this Bill should contain provisions of this nature, — on the double ground that I object to our being called on for a premature consideration of and assent to the provisions of so extreme and so important a measure, and that I am, at the same time, most anxious that the foundation should now be laid for a just, liberal, and constitutional government in the Canadas, — and believing, as I do, that by now forcing, as it were, the judgments of men, whose feelings have been heated, and whose passions have been excited, by recent events connected with the history of this colony, or compelling that premature consideration of the question, which I have already stated my unwillingness to contribute to; — we should rather be obstructing than advancing that common and beneficent object which all of us have in view: — and finally, on the ground of the mockery of the pretence of giving a convention to Canada, of a representative character, whilst the constitution is suspended, and the representative bodies in the colony are no longer in existence; on all these grounds, I give fair notice, that my distinct impression is, that I shall feel it to be my duty to object to that part of the Bill.

If the Noble Lord, as I understand, intends to move the adjournment of the House, at its rising to-night, till Monday next, I will avail myself of the present opportunity of putting a single question to another Noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I wish to ask that Noble Lord (Palmerston) whether or not he has any communication to make to Parliament, as to the state of the negotiations, which have long been pending, on the subject of the boundary line, between the province of Maine, in the United States, and the British province of New Brunswick? Very full communications on the subject have been made, by the Government of the United States, to the American Congress; and I do think, considering the importance of the question, and the magnitude of the British interests involved in the settlement of this line, the British Parliament have a right to expect some official information with regard to the correspondence which has been had on this question, so that it may see what the real state of this matter is, and what are the steps which it may be proper to take in it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL — I feel it necessary to address the House, after what has fallen from the Right Honourable Baronet. I am quite sure that the Right Honourable Gentleman has, though unintentionally, misstated the intentions of the Government on this question, and has imputed to them a course of proceeding which they have no intention of following. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, in the first place, that when insurrection rages in certain parts of the province, and when men's minds are greatly excited by what has taken place in Canada, it will be inexpedient and unwise to call together what the Right Honourable Baronet calls a Convention of Estates, and which he designates as a mockery of representation, in Lower Canada. I will state again what are the intentions of Government with respect to this question; and I think that then we shall be relieved from both the charges that have been brought against us. In the first place, then, what the Bill proposes to do is, to set aside and suspend for a time, the present constitution of Lower Canada, and to place the authority — despotic authority, if the Right Honourable Baronet will have it so — in the hands of the Governor in Council. But I also say, at the same time, that we are determined to enforce the authority of the law. We do not design or intend to establish anything like a despotic government in the country; but we will take such steps that, at the earliest possible time we can, we will return to the constitutional government of Canada. For this purpose, I stated that it would be advantageous that the Governor to be sent out to Canada should have large powers entrusted to him; and that the future measures to be framed should not only be the result of the experience of the Governor, but that they should also have the additional recommendation which would result from their being framed in conformity with the suggestions of persons in the Assembly, which I have described, and by which arrangement, those measures would have greater weight both in this country and in North America. In considering the provisions of this Bill, it appears to be both wise and expedient that we should not interfere with the prerogative of the Crown; and whatever, therefore, is proposed to be done with respect to the Constitution of the Assembly I have alluded to, will be contained in the instructions of Her Majesty's Secretary of the Colonies to the Governor appointed, and not embraced in the Bill.

The Right Honourable Gentlemen asks, whether the Governor is to nominate the body which he calls the Convention of Estates? I will reply, by no means; but the Governor will take steps to call together that body, which I should call the Committee of Advice, on this subject. If the Governor shall find, which I do not believe will be the case, that great excite-still continues in the province, and that the calling together of the body I have alluded to is calculated, instead of promoting peace, to aggravate the feelings of dissatisfaction, then it will be the duty of the Governor to withhold his sanction from its assembling; but much on this point must be left to the discretionary power of the Governor. I do not, therefore, think that the plan is liable to the charge that has been brought against it, — that in the midst of civil war and excitement, we propose to call together this body merely for the purpose of giving a liberal aspect to the measure; which measure it is said must be a mere mockery of representation. But if the Governor shall think fit to call together such a body, it is impossible to allow the House of Assembly of Lower Canada to depute members to such a body; but still, I think that adequate provision should be made and devised for choosing this body; and that elections may be had, at which persons can be chosen to represent Lower Canada. Undoubtedly, however, this process ought not to be adopted until tranquillity is restored. But when the existing tumults and disturbances are put an end to, supposing that such a body is called together, containing persons representing the interests and wishes of the inhabitants of Upper Canada, and the interests and wishes of the inhabitants of Lower Canada — such body, called together by the Governor, and having had the whole subject laid before them by him, will be able amply to consider, and deliberate on, the matters submitted to their consideration, and the result of their deliberations will naturally have great weight, both with Parliament and the country.

I agree, to a considerable extent, with an opinion expressed by the committee of 1828, who reported to the House, after great deliberation, and having with great patience investigated the subject, to this effect: — that the British Parliament should not be called upon to interfere in the affairs of Canada unless in time of great need, and where its authority was necessary; but that in general the constitutional assemblies of the provinces should be left to the management of their own internal affairs. If the Government of the country are not prepared to propose a plan at once, they at least recommend a course which they have good reason to believe will meet with the approbation of a large portion of the inhabitants of the provinces, and will lay the foundation for future concord in Canada. As the Right Honourable Gentleman says that he shall oppose this part of the Bill, I will at once state, that in framing it my Learned Friend the Attorney General has been consulted, and he has given it as his opinion that it is unnecessary to frame enactments for empowering the Crown to do that which it is at present competent to the Crown to do. It has, therefore, merely been mentioned in the preamble of the Bill that such instructions have been furnished to the Governor. It is, consequently, already within the power of the Governor about to be sent out to Canada to summon this committee of advice. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that he shall put it to the House whether such authority should be granted to this body. It is certainly competent for the Right Honourable Baronet to do so; and when he brings the matter forward, I shall be prepared to meet him. I felt bound to state to Parliament so much respecting this body, as an explanation of a part of the plan of the general policy the Government mean to pursue with regard to Canada. It rests upon their responsibility. I felt bound to explain that it was a part of the instructions given to the Earl of Durham to summon such a council or committee of advice; and this was done without any such wish for a show of liberality, as has been stated by the Right Honourable Gentleman, but from a belief and conviction that by it means might be devised for the foundation of future good government in these provinces. The responsibility for giving such advice rests with the Government, —and we are fully prepared to bear it—for having given such advice to the Crown. It is, however, for the Right Honourable Gentleman, if he thinks fit, to show that the royal authority has not been wisely or properly exercised in this matter.

I will only further state, that with respect to the conduct of Lord Gosford in Canada, I do not feel called upon to make any observations, after what has fallen from my Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies, in his very able speech on this subject. I quite concur with my Honourable Friend in holding that Lord Gosford has acted entirely in accordance with the instructions he had received and the character which he had to maintain; and that no man has ever manifested a greater desire to conciliate, and, at the same time, greater firmness, in not yielding in matters on which he believed that the honour or interests of this country were involved and endangered. In answer to my Honourable Friend the Member for Leeds, I would say, that it is undoubtedly my wish to bring in this Bill to-night; but I will observe that, as the Bill is of some length, I do not think that it is possible that it can be printed and in the hands of Members before Friday morning. And I do trust that I shall be able, as I am most anxious to do, to proceed, on Monday next, with the second reading of the Bill, which, I do not mean to deny, involves a grave and important question. This is a matter of the gravest importance; it is one on which I have no wish to avoid discussion. I am sure that it will be felt, on both sides of the House, that too much care cannot be bestowed on a measure so deeply affecting the future interests of the provinces, and the character of this country in North America, which, while it suspends the constitution, may lay a ground on which future dissensions may be avoided, and the means whereby peace and harmony may be established in those colonies. I will not say anything upon the boundary question, as the Right Honourable Baronet has directed his inquiry to my Noble Friend near me (Lord Palmerston), who will answer it.

SIR R. PEEL. — I, too, have one word to offer in explanation of my former observations. When the Noble Lord says I have misunderstood or misrepresented what he said, I cannot imagine that there is one man in this House, who did not infer, from the first speech of the Noble Lord, that the proposed Bill contained provisions authorising and empowering the Governor to call together a committee from both Canadas, such committee having a representative character. This, undoubtedly, must have been the construction put on that speech, by others besides myself; for the Honourable Member for St. Alban's in particular declared that he had become reconciled to the Bill precisely on account of the general advance it made in legislation, by enabling the Governor to call together a Canadian convention; and this compliment of the Honourable Member to the liberality of the Government, no member of the Government has to-night once attempted to repudiate. But the Noble Lord now says, that all which is intended is, to give instructions to the Governor, by the exercise of the royal prerogative of the Crown, — as prerogative it no doubt is, — to call a certain number of gentlemen together to advise with him. If this be all that is intended, no impediment shall be offered to it by me. But what I object to is, the giving the sanction of Parliament to any measure clothing with a formal representative character such committee. The Noble Lord says, that the prerogative of the Crown might be extended to sending for these Gentlemen as representatives of the districts of Lower Canada. I doubt whether there is such a power; but, at all events, it is contemplated to give the Governor the power, in the present state of Lower Canada, to name the districts which shall return certain gentlemen to such a committee as representatives of the feelings and opinions of the various classes of Lower Canada. I shall object to such a proposition.

Mr. HUME.—Whenever the opportunity offers, I shall support, by my vote, that objection.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I stated, just now, though the statement has not been noticed by the Right Honourable Baronet, that it will be inserted in the preamble that such and such instructions had been given to the Governor. I do not think it necessary that there should be any clause in the Bill empowering the Governor to call a committee of advice together, (such a proceeding being perfectly within the prerogative of the Crown,) or to give power to the Governor to make a new division of districts. This latter power it is quite unnecessary to introduce into the Bill. I may not have made myself quite intelligible to the Right Honourable Gentleman; but this I can say, that, two hours before, I did see a draught of the Bill, in which it was proposed that, in the preamble, this power should be recited.

Mr. ELLIS (Newry).—I much rejoice that the observations of the Right Honourable Baronet have elicited an explanation from the Noble Lord, whose statement just now seemed to me quite different from that which he gave us in a former part of the evening. I thank the Right Honourable Baronet for his speech. I cannot but think that a selection of districts by the Governor, as proposed, would be productive of great dissatisfaction in the colonies, and prove a very pernicious measure.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—In answer to the question which has been put to me by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, on the subject of the boundary question between the State of Maine and the province of New Brunswick, I have to state that it is my intention to produce and lay before the House the papers and documents containing the correspondence which has taken place between the two governments on this subject, up to the present time, from the period when the last communication was made to Parliament.

The Gallery was then cleared for a division; and the question was put as follows:—"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada."

The House divided;—

Bill ordered to be brought in by LORD JOHN RUSSELL, LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK, and SIR GEORGE GREY.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

On the motion of Lord JOHN RUSSELL, it was ordered that the House, at rising, do adjourn to Monday next.

Agreed to.

CANADA.

Mr. HUME.—I find, Sir, in looking over the documents which have been laid on the table, with reference to the Canadas, that a great number of those which I required are still wanting. I will not detain the House, by more than a brief recapitulation of the motives which induce me to call for these. I want particularly those despatches or communications, addressed by Lord Glenelg to the Earl of Gosford, which comprise the instructions that were to direct the latter as to the mode in which he should conduct himself. The third paper I require on this account. I am informed, that those documents which it was expected would be laid on the table, and which were said to contain treasonable correspondence, have not yet been forthcoming; I wish to know whether any such documents have reached this country? The object of the next papers I call for, is to do away with the erroneous impression, that the House of Assembly have refused the supplies. This has been asserted by the Noble Lord (J. Russell) himself. It is true, that they annexed certain conditions, and I want to know what those conditions were. Let us see whether they were such as a governor, who was disposed to respect the constitution of Canada, was justified in declining to comply with.

The Honourable Gentlemen then moved for the following papers:—

Copy of the despatches from Sir F. B. Head to Lord Glenelg, dated 21st April, 1836, and 16th July, 1836.

Copies or abstracts of the bills of supply passed by the House of Assembly of Lower Canada in each year since 1832; and copies of any despatches relating to such bills of supply, or to the refusal of the Legislative Council to pass any of such bills; specifying the year in which the House of Assembly altogether neglected to pass a bill of supply.

Copies of any resolutions, received by the Colonial Office, passed at meetings held in Upper Canada, since March 1837, relative to the grievances and complaints of the people of that province, and of Lower Canada; and, Copies of any despatches from Sir F. B. Head relative to such resolutions, and of the measures adopted by him respecting them.

Copies of any despatches received from Lower Canada, explaining the conduct and proceedings of the Speaker of the House of Assembly of that province, and of the twenty-seven other persons named in the report of the Attorney and Solicitor General, dated 18th November, 1837, upon account of which the said persons were directed to be arrested, and the date of the proceedings upon account of which their arrest was ordered, and the date when ordered to be arrested.

The names of the magistrates dismissed by Lord Gosford, upon the representation of the Attorney General that certain proceedings which he contemplated to take would be hazarded if the said magistrates continued in the commission of the peace, and the nature of the charges made against each of the said magistrates, as stated in Earl Gosford's despatch of 22nd November, 1837.

A copy of the report of the Executive Council, and of the Attorney General, respecting certain individuals in the magistracy, referred to in Earl Gosford's letter of the 22nd November to Lord Glenelg, as the reason of removing them from the magistracy: — Also, a copy of the Earl of Gosford's letter of the 4th November to the Attorney General, referred to in the Attorney General's letter of the 18th November, 1837.

A list of the names and occupations of the objectionable justices removed from the commission of the peace in Montreal; and also, the names and designations of the persons added to the commission of the peace at the same time, as stated in Earl Gosford's letter of the 22nd November to Lord Glenelg.

Copies of any letters received from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland, relative to the constitution of the Legislative and Executive Councils of the Governments of those colonies, or to their being made elective, or to any change that has been required by any branch of the legislature of those colonies to be made to the said councils, within the last eight years; also, to any change that has been made, or directed to be made, in them, or in any mode of electing new members of the said councils.

MR. HUME.—Having moved for these papers, I am aware that I may be thought unreasonable in asking for so large a mass of documents; but I am certain the House will see the great importance that we should agree, however we may differ in the conclusions which we draw from them, on the main facts of the case. Now, there is the letter of Lord Gosford, which he wrote to the Attorney General, but which letter does not appear. Sir, the Attorney General is said to have arrested upwards of 200 persons in Canada. Surely we ought to have a complete statement before us of the grounds on which such proceedings as these can have taken place. Well, Sir, then there came the dismissal of all the liberal advocates of the law courts in one day. Is it not indispensable that we should know something more about that? I will not read the paper which I hold in my hand, but I may state that it is a copy of the resolutions which were lately agreed to in Prince Edward's Island, in favour of a Legislative Council. They are signed by, among others, thirty-six of the clergy. Here is also the opinion of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia.

SIR GEORGE GREY.—I can have no objection to the first of these papers, the despatches from Sir F. Head in April and July, 1836. As for the second, I must put it to the Honourable Gentleman, that the expense of printing such a mass of matter would be quite indefensible, seeing that all the information which it calls for, or at least that part which comprises the Bills of Supply, is contained in the appendix to the parliamentary papers of 1833, and in the colonial papers of 1834. I presume the Honourable Gentleman will withdraw that part of his motion. To the third Return,—copies of any resolutions received by the Colonial Office, passed at meetings held in Upper Canada since March, 1837,—I have no objection. With regard to the fourth, I shall certainly refuse it.

The first and third Returns were then ordered; the motion for the second being withdrawn.

Mr. HUME. — I shall certainly feel it my duty to move for one of these papers, which the Under Secretary for the Colonies appears so determined to refuse. I shall also move afterwards for the accounts relative to the dismissals of magistrates, which appear to have been referred to in a letter dated the 22d of November, addressed by Lord Gosford to Lord Glenelg.

SIR GEORGE GREY. — Does the Honourable Gentleman mean to withdraw the next on his paper?

Mr. HUME. — No, it is very important.

SIR R. PEEL. — Perhaps it is the one marked in the paper "No. 32." That may be important for us to have. I hope there will be no objection, hereafter, to grant it.

SIR GEORGE GREY. — That is not the same which the Honourable Member for Kilkenny refers to.

Mr. HUME. — I now move "That a humble address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House copies of any despatches received from Lower Canada, explaining the conduct and proceedings of the Speaker of the House of Assembly of that province; and of the twenty-seven other persons named in the Report of the Attorney and Solicitor General, dated 18th November, 1837, upon account of which the said persons were directed to be arrested, and the date of the proceedings upon account of which their arrest was ordered, and the date when ordered to be arrested."

SIR GEORGE GREY. — I must divide the House.

A division then took place: —

Motion for papers negatived.

SIR GEORGE GREY. — I have no objection to give a list of all the magistrates who have been dismissed in Canada since the 1st September, 1837. I think it as well to tell the Honourable Gentleman, that if he wants to get, by indirect means, at a confidential despatch from the Earl of Gosford himself to this Government, he will not succeed in his object. I am not prepared to say that all of them were dismissed on the representation of the Attorney General for Canada; but I will now move an address for "List of all magistrates dismissed from the commission of the peace in Lower Canada since the 1st of December, 1837, with the date of their respective dismissals."

"List of all magistrates in the commission of the peace for the district of Montreal, on the 1st of December, with the date of their respective appointments."

Ordered.

Mr. HUME. — I shall next move for the printing and production of the third Report of the Executive Council and Attorney General to the British Government.

SIR G. GREY. — I must certainly object to the production of such documents. We have not got this Report yet in our possession; but if we had, it would clearly be one of a confidential nature, and such as I could not consent to produce.

Mr. HUME. — What I want chiefly to know is, whether there will be any objection to give the dates at which these despatches were received? I think it of great consequence that we should see, whether or not, there has been any improper delay in their production.

SIR GEO. GREY. — I do not know that the dates are in existence. I believe it is not usual to preserve them.

LORD STANLEY. — I beg to state to the Honourable Gentleman, that when I was at the Colonial Office, it was the custom carefully to record the dates of the receipt of despatches.

SIR GEO. GREY. — The Noble Lord, I know, is quite correct in the statement which he makes. I can only say, that it is not the usual practice of the office. I have no objection to produce these dates, except one which I feel, myself, as to the inexpediency of the precedent. But on the part of the Government I apprehend that there can be no objection.

LORD STANLEY. — I did not mean, by the observation I ventured to interpose, to intimate that there was on the part of Government any desire to withhold these dates; my object was rather to show, that in his own office, the Honourable Secretary will find a means of referring, at pleasure, to the dates of despatches received in a very long course of years. I framed a minute in the year 1834, under the arrangements established in virtue of which, on one occasion, when I called for them for some purposes of reference, despatches of the years 1778, 1779, 1780, and 1781, were immediately furnished to me. This minute has since been printed, and in that print the Honourable Gentleman may find a list of the dates, upon which they were respectively ordered to be printed.

SIR GEO. GREY. — I beg to apologise for having overlooked that fact, and feel obliged to the Noble Lord for communicating it.

SIR ROB. PEEL. — I believe there will be no objection to printing a despatch, which I am very desirous to see, referred to on the 6th of October, 1837. It is alluded to in paper "No. 32.," in which Lord Glenelg acknowledges the receipt of a despatch which had been addressed to him by the Earl of Gosford conveying to him the address which had been agreed to by the House of Assembly, on the receipt of the intelligence of the resolutions of the House of Commons as communicated to Lord Gosford through the Colonial Office. Lord Glenelg says, in his despatch of the 6th of October, "I will take an early opportunity of addressing you more at length on the affairs of the province, when I have to communicate on some other subject."

SIR GEORGE GREY. — I am bound to admit, to the Right Honourable Gentleman, that in this case, no difficulty in the nature of the communication being private and confidential existed, to prevent the despatch in question from appearing among these papers. Subsequently, however, to the time, at which this despatch was forwarded by Lord Glenelg to Lord Gosford, the Right Honourable Baronet will perceive that communications reached England, materially altering the views which the Government here may be supposed to have entertained on Lord Gosford's previous representations as to the state of the province; and therefore Lord Glenelg did not write again on the subjects upon which he had fully intended to address Lord Gosford.

SIR ROB. PEEL. — In that case, there is of course no further difficulty on my mind, as to what I supposed to be a missing despatch.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to move, Sir, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be pleased to give directions, that there be laid before this House a copy of the Report of the Executive Council, and of the Attorney General, respecting certain individuals in the magistracy, referred to in Earl Gosford's letter of the 22d of November to Lord Glenelg, as the reason of removing them from the magistracy: also, a copy of the Earl of Gosford's letter of the 4th of November to the Attorney General, referred to in the Attorney General's letter of the 18th of November, 1837."

This motion was put, and negatived.

Mr. GROTE. — I hold in my hand a petition very intimately connected with a Bill which the Noble Lord has obtained leave to bring in to-night. Will the Noble Lord object, after the other business of the evening has been disposed of, that I should present it?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have no objection.

Mr. HAWES. — There is one question which I am very desirous to put; and, with the permission of the House, I will take this opportunity of asking it. Having supported the address to the Crown, from a sincere desire to support the Government, and strengthen its hands, in putting down revolt in Canada; and being also prepared, though not without regret, to give my support to the introduction of the Bill for suspending the constitution of the colony, I wish to know whether the Noble Lord has adopted any measures to prevent sanguinary punishments from being inflicted upon delinquents who may have been tried and found guilty, on charges connected with the revolt, before the arrival, in these provinces, of Lord Durham, who may be disposed to be a little arbitrary. I think it is highly proper, that where the melancholy necessity of the case is supposed to have rendered the investiture of excessive and enormous powers indispensable, steps should be taken to prevent the extremes of legal punishment from visiting the commission of political offences, under circumstances of very extraordinary excitement.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I think it may be gathered from the question of the Honourable Member for Lambeth — though I do not suppose that he meant to imply so much — that there existed some expectation, on the part either of this House, or of the Government, that sanguinary executions would be likely to take place under the orders of Sir John Colborne. I must say, that I have no expectation that Sir John Colborne would order any sanguinary executions, or countenance any punishments beyond what he might think that the claims of his painful duty imperatively called upon him to inflict, under the circumstances in which he is called upon to discharge that duty. I should not have thought it necessary to desire Sir John Colborne to refrain from any course which I considered it to be unlikely that that distinguished officer would pursue—namely, a course marked by a character of vindictiveness or sanguinary severity. At the same time, I should state, that the Government did think it advisable and right not to withhold from Sir John Colborne their general opinions as to the inexpediency of capital punishments in the present emergency. In a despatch (which it would not be prudent or regular to produce at this moment), her Majesty's Ministers have advised him of the nature of their own general impression (in which they concur, and in which almost every body in this country, will, on reflection, concur), that on an occasion of this unfortunate nature, capital executions, where not immediately required by absolute and overruling necessity, would tend both to prolong the contest, and would leave afterwards, on the minds of the people, feelings of exacerbation, not easily extinguished. In stating this opinion to Sir J. Colborne, I must fairly add, that we did not in the least doubt that gallant officer's disposition; and I must also say, that we did not lay upon him any positive instructions which might fetter him in the execution of his duty: but we merely stated to him what was the general opinion of the Government on this subject,—an opinion in which I have not the least doubt but that Sir John Colborne will, himself, fully concur.

Mr. HAWES. — The Noble Lord is quite right in the construction which he has put upon the object of my question. I did not mean to imply that any unnecessary cruelty would be exercised by Sir J. Colborne; I merely inquired as to the conduct of Government, and not as to the conduct of the Gallant Officer. I beg to add, that I am perfectly satisfied with the answer of the Noble Lord.

Mr. WARBURTON. — According to the humane practice of this country, state prisoners are always treated and attended to very carefully. It will, however, be seen, from papers that have been laid on the Table of the House, that, owing to the neglected state of the prisons of Montreal, a prisoner had lately perished. I do hope that the same indulgence and attention will be shown to the prisoners in Montreal, as are ordinarily exercised towards prisoners in this country.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — I know no question upon which the minds of men generally, though not my own, are more divided than this, — whether capital punishments ought or ought not to be inflicted? — Whether they ought or ought not to be altogether abolished? But, with respect to the person whose name many Members actually cheered last night when coupled with the appellation of "traitor," — if such a person, after a fair trial, should be convicted, and execution should not follow upon that conviction, I do think the Government would display what I should consider a very false and spurious humanity, — if, under these circumstances, they should interpose to prevent execution.

Mr. C. BULLER.— I am sorry to hear such an observation from the Honourable Baronet. Sufficient angry feeling, I should have thought, had been excited, when the name of Mackenzie was mentioned; and it did appear to me, I own, that on this occasion the fierce passions of men required no additional excitement. I should think that the mercy of the British Government might be properly extended towards any individual, under circumstances of strong palliation at least, who had been mixed up in this struggle; and I believe that in such a course the feelings of the people would go with them. I think that, in the present instance, Government might set a memorable and useful example, by not shedding one drop of human blood!

Mr. BORTHWICK.— There can be, I apprehend, no doubt that the brightest ornament which decorates a crown is mercy. But when it is invoked in a case like this, we must take care, in the first place, to see whether or not it can be fairly exercised. The parties to whom this discussion alludes are not "state prisoners," as the Honourable Member for Bridport would put the case to the House. It is to be remembered that they have been the guilty cause of a needless outpouring of human blood — they are prisoners of war. It is one of the afflicting indications of these maudlin times, of false philosophy and pseudo humanity, that, to accomplish the ends of both, some men are too prone to assume a mask of considerate liberality.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—From the observations which have been made by the Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Inglis), I am induced again to rise, that I may submit this single remark. We have no wish to claim credit for the Government for carrying clemency to the extent to which some Honourable Members seem to suppose that our humanity should go. I do not mean to say that Government have interposed, or will interpose, with respect to any individual case, in which judgment will have been pronounced in the colony. I have merely stated, that we have given a general opinion with regard to executions in those cases; but as to any cases that may occur, the influence of that opinion must depend, first, upon the facts connected with such individual case, and, next, upon the state of the province at the time.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—But I must say, that, if anything more than another could tend to diminish the value of the prerogative, and the exercise of mercy, it is for the House of Commons to be thus discussing to what extent it ought to be carried, upon the finding of sentences against those whose crimes we do not yet know, and of whose guilt we are as yet without any proofs upon which we can exercise any certain judgment. I suppose that Honourable Members will not go so far as to move that the murderers of that gentleman who, having been captured, was shot to death in cold blood, by a party of the insurgent volunteers, in an early period of these transactions,—should not, in their turn, be subjected to the penalty of their crime. An Honourable and Learned Gentleman, who spoke after the Member for Lambeth (out of whose question to the Noble Lord this discussion has originated), made no exceptions. He expressed his hope that "no blood would be shed in consequence of what has occurred in Canada." I think the Honourable Gentleman must acknowledge that it has been demonstrated to him to what absurd lengths that principle must carry him. I can only say, that I agree with others who have spoken on this subject, as to the necessity of our avoiding, as a general principle, all excessive and over-strained penalties or punishments. But I am not the less certain that violent and aggressive crimes you must violently and strenuously restrain. But I think we shall greatly injure the character and influence of this principle, by prolonging a discussion of this sort; upon the course which ought to be taken in respect of judgments that may be pronounced upon delinquents, of whose crimes we are, as yet, entirely ignorant.

Mr. CHARLES BULLER.—Perhaps it is scarcely necessary to say,—but after what the Right Honourable Baronet has stated, I am really unwilling to be misunderstood,—that my observations applied to political offences only.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER.—I wish to ask whether or not any communication has been received from the Earl of Gosford, intimating that that Noble Lord has resigned his functions as Governor General of Lower Canada? I cannot find in these papers any official despatch from him subsequent to that in which her Majesty's Government intimate to Lord Gosford her Majesty's acceptance of his resignation of his appointment.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Despatches have been received from Lord Gosford since the commencement of the insurrection. The proper instructions have been issued by my Noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Department (Lord Glenelg) to relieve the Earl of Gosford from the functions of Governor General; and I should suppose that after receiving them, he would immediately leave the colony. But no intelligence of his departure has yet reached us.

NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. HUME.—I have been desirous of putting on record some motions for papers which, however, have been refused to me. I will now move for others, to which I believe there is no objection. I move, then, for an address for copies or extracts of any correspondence received from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland, relative to the constitution of the Legislative and Executive Councils, or to their being made elective, or to any change that has been required by any branch of the legislature of those colonies, to be made to the said councils, within the last eight years; also to any change that has been made made, or directed to be made, in them, or in any mode of appointing new members of the said councils.

Ordered accordingly.

LOWER CANADA GOVERNMENT BILL,

"To make temporary provision for the Government of Lower Canada."

This Bill was brought up and presented by Lord John Russell; read a first time; ordered to be read a second time on Monday next, and to be printed.

J. A. ROEBUCK.

Mr. GROTE.—I believe, Sir, I am now in order in claiming the attention of the House to this petition, which is the petition of John Arthur Roebuck, Esq., who was appointed in the month of February, 1835, agent to the House of Assembly of Lower Canada. This petitioner states that he has heard that a Bill is now before your Honourable House having for its object to suspend the functions of the said House of Assembly; and he prays that in conformity with the usages of your Honourable House, he may be allowed to appear at your bar, to show reasons why the said Bill, which he characterises as a measure of impolicy and injustice, should not pass into a law. Now, Sir, I find upon the Journals of this House an entry, in the year 1791, the matter of which bears so strong an analogy to that of the present application, that I am tempted to believe the House will immediately perceive the reasonableness and justice of granting the prayer of this petition. I find, by this entry, that in the year 1791, when the Act was passed, establishing the constitution of Canada, a Mr. Adam Limburner (a gentleman who seems, by a singular coincidence, to have been "agent for Quebec," and for various other parties), connected with Lower Canada, applied for leave to be heard at the bar against the then pending Bill. It appears that the petition from Mr. Limburner was read. His application was acceded to. On the 21st of March of the same year, other two petitions, the one from a Mr. James Finn, the other from a Mr. Alexander Ellis, merchants trading to Quebec, were read, and the prayers of these were to the same effect as that of the petition of Limburner; and it was accordingly ordered "that said petitioners be allowed to be heard at the bar by counsel, or by themselves if they shall so think fit." On the 23d of the same month, it is stated, when the report was made, "That after the said counsel had been heard at the bar, then the said Limburner was heard," &c.

Honourable Gentlemen will bear in mind, that the Bill against which these parties were thus permitted to be heard, was that very measure by which the now existing constitution of Canada was established, though not precisely in a similar stage to that which has been yet attained by the Bill the Noble Lord has this evening introduced to us. I do trust, therefore, that the House will see that this precedent is strictly in point, both as relates to the character or capacity of the present petitioner, and to the interests to which his petition relates,—the interests of that identical province, the constitution of which is so seriously endangered by the Bill of the Noble Secretary of State for the Home Department. I will also entreat the House to remember that, in the speech delivered last night by that Noble Lord on this subject, the main stress of his argument was laid upon the point which he assumed,—that the House of Assembly of Lower Canada was deficient in those qualities, or properties, which were essential to a due performance of its duties towards that colony itself, and towards the mother country.

This was one of the two main points which the Noble Lord undertook in that speech to establish. In my very short reply to his very long speech, I contended that the House of Assembly, placed as it had been in circumstances of very peculiar difficulty, was here most harshly dealt with, in regard to its defence, because there were no Gentlemen present on these benches, who either understood all the essential details of the conduct of that assembly, or were capable of meeting, without previous notice, any specific charges which might be brought against them. The general importance of the affairs of the colony, in a matter bearing so hardly and so closely upon a large body of persons in either province, will, I trust, make the House sensible that there exists the strongest possible necessity for hearing the case of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, as fully and fairly stated on the one side as it has been ably and amply discussed on the other. Now I do think, that when a gentleman comes so armed with authority from the House of Assembly to act as its agent, as the petitioner is,—so fully competent and prepared, in all respects, to state the case of that body, from his previous knowledge of all the details and circumstances connected with it,—and so able, from his previous treatment of this subject, to answer the charges which have been brought against those whom he asks leave to represent at that bar, — I do think, I say, that this House will not be doing fair and equal justice if it shall now refuse to hear him, as prayed, and thus to give him the opportunity of vindicating those interests which have been confided to his charge and advocacy.

I submit, moreover, that this course of proceeding will be as much in consonance, as I have shown, with precedents that have occurred in the known practice of this House upon the hearing of petitions, as it will be consistent with the claims of strict justice and equity. In conclusion, I would observe, that if this House should decline, under the circumstances I have brought before it, to hear this accredited agent of the House of Assembly, I fear that its refusal would carry with it an appearance of rigour and harshness, if not of injustice, towards the Colonial Legislature, which I do not believe it to be the wish of any Gentleman, on either side, to assume. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will now propose to bring up this petition; and if the House should be pleased to comply with its prayer, I will then move that a day be named on which the petititioner shall be heard at the bar.

Mr. WAKLEY. — As I cannot anticipate, after the precedent which has been cited to us by my Honourable Friend the Member for London, the slightest objection on the part of this House to our hearing at the bar a gentleman so eminently qualified to do justice to the important prayer of this important petition as the late Honourable and Learned Member for Bath, who is the petitioner in this case, — I think we ought, now, at once, to decide when Mr. Roebuck should be heard. The question we have now to determine is, as to the day on which this hearing shall be given him? Sir, I think that it should certainly be a day anterior to the second reading of this Bill. Seeing that the principle of a Bill is held to be affirmed by its passing through a second reading, I am of opinion that it would be a positive injustice to postpone this hearing until the petitioner will incur the risk of being, in fact, concluded by the second reading of a Bill, the very principle of which is that which he desires to show cause against. I would recommend that the agent of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada be called in and heard at the bar, in support of his petition, on Monday next.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I beg to remind the House, that in the precedent which my Honourable Friend the Member for London has quoted, the complaint of the petitioners was against certain clauses of the Bill, which they desired to be heard against; and that determined, apparently, the stage at which they were to be heard. The counsel therefore might, without unfairness, be heard — as it was intended that they should be heard — on the bringing up of the Report. But here, I apprehend, the case is different. The principle of the Bill will be decided upon by the second reading; and therefore the opposition to be offered by the parties concerned, through their agent, being clearly to the principle, the proper course, (and it is a course conformable, as we have heard, with precedents,) will be to let the petitioner be heard at the bar before the second reading.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It appears to me, without desiring to be understood as giving any decided opinion on such a question as that involved in the prayer of this petition, that it ought to be printed, so that we may take it into consideration on a future day. This petition has been presented by my Honourable Friend the Member for London, at a very late hour, although, I have no doubt, that was matter of necessity upon my Honourable Friend, who, I think, could find no opportunity for its presentation at an earlier hour of the evening. I consider, however, that the House ought to take time to look into the precedents bearing on this application. It ought also to consider, in the first place, whether this petitioner ought to be heard at the bar; and, in the second, if heard, — in what capacity or character? — whether as agent for the Canadas, duly authorised, or not?

Mr. GROTE. — He has been regularly appointed agent for the House of Assembly of Lower Canada.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I do not mean to go into that question, now; nor will I give an opinion on the point it raises. But I will just observe, that there were instructions, indeed, sent out to Canada by the Secretary of State in this country, for the introduction of a Bill, in virtue of which the House of Assembly, with the consent and concurrence of the Legislative Council, and of the governor, were to appoint an agent to represent them in England. But I believe that no such Bill was ever passed. If the House should be of opinion that Mr. Roebuck should be heard against the Bill, at the bar, I, of course, can have no objection, — even before the second reading, I have none. But I am disposed to think that the House should have time, in a case of this sort, to look into the precedents, and to ascertain in what character the petitioner really comes before it?

Mr. GROTE.—I am in no condition to ask for an immediate discussion on a question of which no notice has been given. All that I am anxious for, in this case, is, that Mr. Roebuck should have the opportunity afforded to him of being heard before the second reading of the Bill. In that case, I care not when I give my notice, —whether now or on Monday.

Mr. WARBURTON.—As to the question of the character in which Mr. Roebuck would appear at the bar, I apprehend that this gentleman has already, by the highest authority you have to represent you in Canada, namely, by the Governor, Lord Gosford, been recognised in public Acts, as the agent for Canada. But he is also the paid agent, we know, of the House of Assembly, for whom he appears.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I have already said that I have no sort of objection, on my own part, to hear Mr. Roebuck before the second reading. But I should rather say, that it would be according to usage to hear on the second reading.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—I think that the question of the capacity or character in which Mr. Roebuck shall be considered to appear, is matter of very subordinate importance, compared with the question whether we should hear this gentleman on behalf of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada? My own opinion is, that, considering the very extraordinary nature of the whole of our proceedings on this great question — that we are about to suspend the constitution of a great colony, — we ought not, under the circumstances, to debar this gentleman from appearing, as prayed. The extreme proceeding which we are about to adopt, much as I deplore it, is, I think, justified by the stern necessity of the case: but for that reason, I think, too, we should afford the petitioner the opportunity of distinctly stating the grounds on which he would desire us not to pass this measure. As to the question of the capacity he appears in, that is one which may be easily settled. I am sure, at the same time, that we ought to proceed with as much deliberation in the matter as, with reference to the time within which the Government are anxious to carry their Bill through Parliament — may be practicable, after the party shall have stated his case.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I hope my Honourable Friend the Member for London will give his notice for the earliest day, so that no unnecessary delay, by reason of this application of Mr. Roebuck, may be interposed to the passage of the Bill through Parliament.

Mr. GROTE. — Certainly. I will give notice for Monday next. (Notice given accordingly, for Monday, 22d January instant, to move — "That John Arthur Roebuck, Esquire, agent of the House of Assembly in Lower Canada, be heard at the bar of the House against the Bill for making temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada, pursuant to the prayer of his petition.")

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITY BILL.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I beg to move the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Duchess of Kent's Annuity Bill. I hope, whatever opposition may be offered to this measure, that it will not be made this evening, — with the understanding that, on going into committee on the Bill, the discussion, if any, shall take place.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I, for one, do not object to that course.

The Bill was then read a second time.

CANADA.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — It was with a great deal of surprise that I saw by the printed minutes of proceedings that the House had adjourned to this evening, as, on Tuesday, I certainly understood that the Noble Baron opposite (Lord Glenelg) would lay those papers for which I have asked, on the Table of the House yesterday night. That would have been the better course, because the production of papers at the very moment we are about to enter on the subject of them can hardly be of any advantage.

LORD GLENELG. — I promised that the address and other papers should be printed for the information of your Lordships, and I believe that they have been printed and distributed at the doors of the House this afternoon. I recollect that the Noble Baron inquired whether a statement could be given of the dates at which the despatches already laid before the House were received, and that the Noble Baron said it was usual to print the dates on which papers are received. But, on making inquiry, I have found that such is not the usual practice. Nevertheless, I have ordered the dates to be printed.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I wish to ask the Noble Baron, whether there is any document to show that he has performed the promise made to Lord Gosford in the despatch dated the 20th of November, 1836, to explain the course which the Government intend to pursue in reference to Lower Canada? Is there any despatch between that date and the 11th of March, 1837?

LORD GLENELG. — The papers presented in 1836 were presented with a view to the Session of 1837. Since the despatch referred to by the Noble Baron, two others have certainly been received; but they are of a private and confidential nature, and I do not think that they can be laid before the House.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I will not press further for the despatch or despatches in question. I think, however, that although it might have been inconvenient to produce those despatches before the insurrection, such an excuse can hardly be urged, now.

On the Order of the Day for an address to her Majesty, relative to the affairs of Canada, being read, —

LORD GLENELG said: — In rising, according to the notice which I have given, to move that an humble address be presented to her Majesty in relation to the affairs of Canada, I feel myself called on, in the first place, to state that the address is of a general character, expressing the regret of this House at the state of affairs in Canada, and pledging the House to support such measures as the Government shall think fit to adopt in order to maintain the integrity of the empire; and I flatter myself that it will find a ready acceptance with your Lordships. I shall now take the liberty of reading the terms of the address.

"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, to thank her Majesty for her gracious communication of papers relating to the affairs of Canada; to assure her Majesty that the anxious consideration of this House shall be given to the preparation of such measures as the present exigency may require; to express to her Majesty our deep concern that a disaffected party in Canada should have had recourse to open violence and rebellion, with a view to throw off their allegiance to the Crown; to declare to her Majesty our satisfaction that these designs have been opposed no less by her Majesty's loyal subjects in North America than by her Majesty's forces; and to assure her Majesty, that while this House is ever ready to afford redress to real grievances, we are fully determined to support the efforts of her Majesty for the suppression of revolt and the restoration of tranquillity."

My Lords, in submitting this address to your Lordships, I trust that you will permit me to make a few observations upon the subject to which it relates. I think that, with respect to that address, your Lordships will regard the subject as one of considerable and deep importance, and one that is very interesting in relation to, and as affecting, the interests and prosperity of the empire. I deem it right, my Lords, on the part of the Government, to request your patient indulgence while I offer to you those observations which I shall feel it to be my duty to make; because I do not think it possible to present to your Lordships a just view of the measure which we propose, or of the policy which the Government has acted upon, without trespassing, for some time, upon your Lordships, — I hope not a long time,— certainly not a longer time than the importance of the subject demands. In trespassing upon your time, it is not necessary for me to recal your attention to the entire history of the disputes in Canada — at least, it is not necessary for me to recal that attention to the earlier stage of these disputes. But it is necessary, to place our policy in its proper light, to request your Lordships to recur to that period of them, coinciding with the time at which the present Government came into the administration of affairs. When this Government came into office, the most difficult question presented to their attention was, the question relating to Canada. Her difficulties were not the consequence of accidental or temporary circumstances. No; but the causes of these difficulties were deep-rooted. They were interwoven with the framework of society there,—they could be traced to the nature of the government, and to the nature and situation of the British North American colonies in general. That great portion of territory, added to our dominions by the peace of 1761, and divided into two provinces, Upper and Lower Canada, presented, at that time, an aspect of exceeding difficulty and of very great anxiety. With respect to the province of Upper Canada, it was found to be well populated, powerful, and rapidly advancing in prosperity; but throughout that province, a great degree of discontent and animosity prevailed with reference to the province of Lower Canada, and more particularly, with regard to the situation in which the Upper Canadians found their commercial interests to be placed. Their province — I might almost say their nation — has the disadvantage of being surrounded, on all sides, by other nations, and can have no intercourse with the ocean except through the United States, or by the river St. Lawrence; so that all the interests of the commerce of Upper Canada were under the control either of a foreign legislature, or of a legislature, not foreign, indeed, but considerably distinct from the people of Upper Canada in habits, in manners, and in its views of political principles. The province of Lower Canada was, therefore, looked upon and regarded with jealousy by Upper Canada on this account; and the pressure, in this respect, was so felt, that various plans were devised to meet the difficulty and to escape from it. It is only necessary for me to say, that one of the plans suggested was to effect a negotiation with the United States, in order to obtain a communication with the sea; and that another plan was to annex Montreal to Upper Canada, and thereby give it that participation in the navigation of the river St. Lawrence which her commercial interests demanded. At the same period, in Upper Canada, considerable internal anxiety prevailed. The House of Assembly in that province was then about entering into a race of rivalry with the House of Assembly in Lower Canada in some of the great topics which agitated the latter assembly.

But there were causes of still deeper anxiety in existence, with regard to Lower Canada, than attached to the other; and the principal of all those causes, and which, if not the origin of the disturbances, at least gave them great force and energy, that principal cause was the division of the two races forming the population of that province,—a division which neither circumstances nor time had subdued or mellowed, but which had matured that animosity, and had embittered and made it more decisive and more marked by various events in their political institutions. In that colony it was not the wealth but the numbers alone of the constituency which had the power of determining in what mode the elective franchise was to be exercised in the colony. The consequence of this was the remarkable result that a numerical majority of 400,000 principal electors returned the far greater majority of the members of the House of Assembly; and thus one of those races of people predominated in the assembly, while the other race was almost entirely, and in practice completely, excluded from it. Now, those individuals who were thus returned to the House of Assembly by a numerical majority, and who controlled the assembly, were of that class or race who were still attached to the obsolete notions of former times,—such as prevailed when that colony was under the dominion of France—they were of that class who were unfriendly to commercial enterprise, and not very friendly to the pursuits which characterise the English race. The leaders of the House of Assembly so chosen, commanding the majority of it, and with very little responsibility to their constituents, who, though an amiable and a virtuous people, were ignorant, and but little fitted to appreciate the excellence of the constitution bestowed upon them, and therefore were ready to be deluded and led away by ambitious and designing men—these leaders of the Assembly, being attached to these obsolete prejudices, had the advantage of fighting with the weapons of a popular institution; and thus it happened that the parties who were against improvement had the support of a popular institution, and that those who were favourable to actual improvement, who had wealth and activity, but not numerical strength on their side, were compelled to resort to what might be termed the aristocratic party in the constitution. Thus it was that the two parties were using weapons but ill adapted to their respective views and feelings. Hence it was that, on the one hand, by the supporters of what might be said to be the oligarchy and hostile to improvement, the rights and privileges of free institutions were pushed to the extreme; and, on the other hand, the privileges used, not to promote, but to retard improvement, were pushed to the extreme by the parties most friendly to improvement. This state of things is a most extraordinary circumstance in the history of the Canadian people. These distinctions were much aggravated by the difference between the two races in manners, in religion, in language, and in general views of political principles; and notwithstanding the advantages which were thus given to the one race,—those of popular institutions,—the aspiring activity and energy of the other race sought means to gain an ascendancy over those advantages. The English portion of the population had obtained possession of all the foreign commerce; they were in possession, also, of some of the larger portions of the property of the country, upon which the habitans lived; and thus the illusion of a great Canadian republic with which the leaders had flattered themselves was every day fading from their view: but such being the contest between the two races,—such being their hopes and fears,—it could not fail to produce considerable animosity; and preparations were made on both sides to assert, by every effort and by every constitutional means in their power, that ascendancy which the one race desired to maintain, and which the other wished to acquire. The constitution which had been given to them in 1791 (at least, in the earlier years of the history of that constitution) might be said not to have been administered with advantage to the Canadian people. The Executive Government took part with one race, the English race, instead of being, as it ought to have been, the umpire and the mediator between both. All the honours and emoluments flowed in that channel, and were bestowed upon the English; and thus the friends of popular institutions became severed from the honours and rewards which the Executive Government had the power to bestow.

The House of Assembly, at that time, not being able to appreciate the value of the gift it had obtained, in the constitution conferred upon the colony,—the Executive Government usurped, practically, the functions of that Assembly. The money of the State was in the hands of the Crown, or rather of the Executive Government; and hence it followed that abuses crept in, and to such an extent, that many of the English race united their interests with those of the French, in order to obtain redress. The French, in connection with many of the English Canadians, had now the advantage of urging their claims upon the ground of real existing abuses. Of these, redress was afforded in 1828, when the subject was first brought before Parliament by Mr. Huskisson. The recommendations of the committee of that year were carried into effect by my Noble Friend opposite, so far as the influence and power of the Crown could do so; and the result was, that the sensible portion of the French part of the population quitted the ranks of the agitators, and supported the Government; and also that the English, who had supported the French, likewise gave their support to the Government. But this was found not to be the mode to satisfy the leaders of the discontented party. They felt that the concession of reforms was hostile to their purposes; they believed that reform, and the redress of grievances, had not been obtained from the Crown and the Imperial Parliament from a sense of justice—(as, really, they were)—but from fear and timidity, and they hoped to obtain the ascendancy they desired, by preferring fresh grievances, when real ones, and the pretences for them, had been swept away; and thus the only reward my Noble Friend received for his assiduous exertions, was the applause with which the agitators were received by the House of Assembly, and the determined resistance of that House to the efforts my Noble Friend had made to bring about the change. At last, having advanced other grievances, the House of Assembly openly avowed that it took its stand upon demands which, in truth, involved the surrender of the sovereignty of the colony to the French party: they demanded that the Executive Council should be elective; that the control of the revenues of the Crown, and of the Executive Government, should be made dependent upon the House of Assembly, and that the officers of the Government should be responsible to that Assembly. These were the demands openly urged by the House of Assembly, and to those demands, of course, the English party were opposed, because they saw in the success of those demands, the proscription of their own race. Such was the condition of the minds of men in Lower Canada, at the time when the present Government entered upon the consideration of these circumstances; and at the same period in the adjoining provinces there was room for considerable anxiety. To Upper Canada I allude:—there, and in Nova Scotia, and in New Brunswick, there was some degree of agitation; at any rate the agitators of Lower Canada took the liberty of claiming—thought they were entitled to claim, and they did claim for themselves—a fellow-feeling towards them on the part of those provinces. Most falsely and most unjustly, as I believe, did they make that claim; still they did make it, and that circumstance proved that some degree of agitation existed in those lower provinces, well calculated to excite the attention of the Government.

These were the difficulties in which the present Government were placed, when they were first called upon to examine this subject; and the question arose, how—or what was the best course by which—those difficulties were to be met? I know it is said that the course was very simple,—that we ought to have taken either one line or the other; and that, as the Government took neither, the consequence is, that we are involved in our present difficulties. Now, it is very easy, after a result has been ascertained, to be prophetic of an issue, and to name the line of conduct which ought to have been pursued. But what were the two lines of which the Government are now told that we ought to have made a choice? One line was to support the pretensions of the French party,—that was, in a word, to accede to the proposition to which I have already adverted; and the result of following that line was very clear and simple (putting aside for the present the question of the surrender of the British sovereignty)—namely, that it would have worked great injustice to the British people then resident in Lower Canada. Would the adoption of that line have been justice to them? Justice is the principle upon which the Government have felt themselves bound to act, and if they had once acceded to the demands of the French, the result would have been extremely injurious to the British race, who formed part of that population. Would that course have been sanctioned in this country, by the Parliament or the nation? Would it have been supported or approved by the colonists in other provinces of North America? and, above all, would that line of conduct have been tolerated by those so deeply involved in its consequences? I will venture to assert, that the result would have been to involve the Government in the calamities to which they have now been brought, and that, too, under more unfavourable circumstances than those in which they are at present placed. That course of conduct, if it had been adopted, would have called upon the Government to support the French party against the subjects of this country in Lower Canada. But there was another line which certainly the Government might have pursued — that of taking part with the English party. The Government might have removed the House of Assembly, as proposed by the English party, and might have framed a new form of representation, which still would have given the ascendancy to them. That course, however, could not have been sanctioned by any views of justice; it would have brought about the same difficulties as now exist, — with the difference, that it would have involved this country with the whole French population, and we should have had to contend against the feelings of justice in the minds of our fellow-colonists in North America, and of the world in general.

The only course, therefore, which I conceive the Government could possibly pursue was, the course of justice and moderation, — not to act as the partisan of either, but as the mediator between both parties; that was, to take a line of justice, of conciliation, and of moderation — a line, it is true, that is always open to severe censure on the part of those holding extreme opinions on both sides; but, after all, it is the only true course, and the only one that is likely to lead to ultimate success. That line, I venture to say, is that which the Government adopted; and its results were, the redress of admitted grievances, and the investigation of alleged abuses. It was on this principle the Government proceeded, and, I believe, this was also the principle followed by preceding Administrations; for I do not seek to take credit to the present Government as being the first to adopt that principle. In short, it was the only true course left them to pursue. In accordance, then, with that policy, Lord Gosford was appointed to carry into effect the intentions of the Government in the actual redress of admitted abuses that might be ascertained, and, further, to inquire into grievances alleged to exist. The endeavours of Lord Gosford in this respect were met by the House of Assembly in that province by conduct which I will not characterise: it is enough to observe, that it was not calculated to maintain that spirit of friendship, conciliation, and moderation between the contending parties, which it was the object of the Government to promote, and of Lord Gosford to extend. The truth is, that the leaders of the French Assembly, whom Lord Gosford was called upon to address, were not disposed to acquiesce in any propositions short of those to which I have alluded, as involving the surrender of the British sovereignty in the colony; and, after repeated efforts, and repeated failures of those efforts, the case was referred to the Imperial Parliament, and last Session Parliament pronounced its decision. But even after that decision was pronounced, it was resolved to give the House of Assembly an opportunity to retrace its steps, and there were some moderate persons anxious to adjust the differences. Other counsels were allowed to prevail, the attempt failed, and the Assembly separated in August last, taking its position upon those definitive demands to which I have already adverted.

Such was the state of things, and such were the results of the efforts which had been made. At this moment I need not assert, because it is sufficiently notorious from the papers before the House, that in one part of the province there is absolute resistance to the arms of the Sovereign. There are circumstances favourable to us at this time, which at other periods did not exist. I say this, notwithstanding the calamity which has occurred in Lower Canada. Deeply as I lament those results, still I am bound to observe, that there are matters which, within the last two or three years, have occurred in the neighbouring provinces of no small moment. The result of Lord Gosford's mission has been at least productive of one effect upon the feelings of a great portion of the French population of Lower Canada. A few years ago, many individuals who are now scattered through various parts of the province, or resident in Quebec, were allied to the interests of the leaders on the other side; but they, having now observed the course of the Government, and having seen the intention of the Government to deal fairly with the province, have quitted the ranks of the agitators, and are at present supporting the Government. The consequence is, that the feelings which once spread over a large extent of the provinces are now confined to the city of Montreal; and that in Quebec tranquillity and contentment prevail. With respect to the other provinces, I beg to observe, that a different spirit from that of Lower Canada animates them also, and I need only refer to the statements from Upper Canada to prove that the people are loyal and attached to the parent country. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the same feeling animates the whole of the population, for the governors of those provinces concur in stating, that it is impossible to exceed the enthusiasm with which the people are ready to give their support to the connection with Great Britain, and to the rights of the Sovereign in that country. Now these circumstances are of no small moment when England is in a state of such difficulty and embarrassment in respect to Lower Canada. With respect to the insurrection—the revolt which has broken out in Lower Canada,—I know it has been said that the Government have shown a want of precaution in not looking forward to that event. It has been said, that a greater supply of forces ought to have, last summer, been furnished, as it might naturally have been expected that some commotion would take place when the resolutions of last Session were known in the colony. With regard to the want of precaution in that respect, I have to state, in allusion to the question asked by the Noble Baron opposite (Lord Ellenborough), in reference to a despatch in answer to the letter of November, 1836, although one of them is confidential, and I am not at liberty to produce it, still I am allowed to state, that I fulfilled the promise given in the previous despatch, and I expressly referred to the possibility, I will not say probability, that the arrival of the resolutions of last Session might tend to some local excitement and commotion; and in that despatch I pressed upon the governor to communicate with Sir John Colborne to make preparations in case such a thing should happen, not, however, feeling any serious alarm, or that the disturbances would be more than local.

LORD BROUGHAM.—What is the date of that?

LORD GLENELG.—February, 1837. That letter referred to a letter from Lord Gosford, transmitting an account of the meeting of the House of Assembly, and its address on its separation. After that fact, it became necessary that I should consult my colleagues, in order to consider what measures the Government ought to take in respect of the whole Canada question. No time was lost in maturing those measures, and in communicating them to Lord Gosford. But the charge of the insufficiency of the force in Lower Canada proceeds on the assumption of its having proved inadequate. Now I beg to deny that this fact is at all established. There is, certainly, no proof of it, and as far as accounts have reached us, it appears that the forces in Lower Canada were adequate, in a great degree, to suppress the insurrection that had taken place. However I may be inclined to defer to opinions of persons of weight and authority, I must still claim for the Government the benefit of the actual state of things in Lower Canada. But, independently of that circumstance, it may be observed, that it appears in the papers now lying on the table, that in March last the Government here announced to Lord Gosford their intention of sending out two regiments more; but, shortly afterwards, it was also announced to him, that the intention had been relinquished, from such a step having been thought unnecessary. The same despatch, however, distinctly expressed an authority for Lord Gosford to apply to the Governor of Nova Scotia for any force he might require; and a letter was, at the same time, addressed to the Governor of Nova Scotia, desiring him to comply with any such requisition on the part of Lord Gosford. The question was this: whether, instead of sending forces direct to Canada, they should be drawn from the adjacent provinces, knowing that it was easier by this means to supply Canada with sufficient force? But I again deny the fact of the inadequacy of the forces, and I am confirmed in this view by the authorities in Lower Canada. I do not wish to throw off from myself my responsibility, but, at the same time, I do not conceive it to be any inculpation of those authorities, that they might have had additional force; but not thinking it necessary, they did not avail themselves of the power. At the period of March, there was an express delegation of authority to Lord Gosford; but he, after a communication with Sir John Colborne,—a military man of proper capacity to judge,—did not think it necessary to exercise it. Three months afterwards, however, he did so, to the extent of ordering one regiment from Nova Scotia, more not being thought requisite. Late in November, he requested a larger force, and, no doubt, in doing this, he was actuated only by a sense of its necessity. I think Lord

Gosford did not act in a culpable manner by thus delaying the calling for fresh troops, but on a sound judgment of their not being wanted. But, believing this, I must add, that, distressing as the late events in Canada have been, it is some consolation to think that the result, in one respect, has been satisfactory; I mean in showing how completely we might rely on the affection and the support of the British colonists. I think nothing would have been more blameable than to have despatched an overwhelming military force with those resolutions which were passed during the last Session. Had that been done, it would have told the world that we thought those resolutions would excite jealousy among the colonists, and we could not, therefore, venture to communicate them without accompanying them with an overwhelming military force. It would have placed us in a false position (to use a vulgarism) in the eyes of the world, and tended to persuade them that our colonial government was unstable, and rested only on military power. This notion might have been at last dissolved, and it appears that, at this moment, whatever may be the discontent of the colonists, the great security of the British colonial empire rests on the allegiance and fidelity of our fellow countrymen in our colonial possessions.

I cannot pass from this part of the subject without expressing my utmost satisfaction at the manner in which Lord Gosford and Sir J. Colborne have conducted themselves throughout the painful circumstances in which they have been placed. Lord Gosford has been exposed to many censures; but he has been placed in a difficult and critical position, and has conducted himself throughout with judgment, calmness, and conciliation. He may have incurred the censure of both parties from his disposition to adopt moderate measures, but his conduct will find justification, and wherever it was necessary he has shown firmness and a determination to support the dignity of the British empire. Of Sir J. Colborne it is superfluous to speak — his character as a military man is too fully established to require any eulogy from me.

Such, then, being the state of affairs in Canada, and the district of Montreal being, as appears by the latest accounts, in a state of insurrection, it becomes your Lordships to consider what measures it is best to pursue. As to the immediate suppression of the revolt, I hope there are means in the power of the local Government (and the latest accounts seem to justify me in this) to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. But the question arises, what course is to be pursued for the general government of the colony and to secure its future prosperity? At present the actual Government may be said to be in abeyance, and for some years the Legislative Council has been superseded by the conduct of the House of Assembly. It would be idle to think of suppressing the existing Assembly, and of forming a new one; but at the same time it is impossible to leave the country without a Government, and there must be some legislative authority. Provision must therefore be made adequate to the exigency of the crisis. It is, consequently, proposed to do by law what has practically been done by the Assembly itself, and to suspend — for a given period of time — so much of the Constitutional Act of 1791 as relates to the function and constitution of the legislative authority. It is proposed to place the legislative authority in a governor and council for three years, and during that period to direct that the laws passed by that authority shall not be of a permanent character, but of a temporary nature, like the authority itself. It is to be provided, that it shall be competent for her Majesty, at any time prior to the expiration of that period, to restore the original constitution. Such is the temporary constitution which it has been thought expedient to substitute for that which has been practically suspended. This is undoubtedly a severe and arbitrary measure, but it is one that is requisite under the existing circumstances. But it is not enough to provide merely a temporary constitution, without looking forward to the period when tranquillity may be restored. It is right to contemplate the period when the functions of the original constitution may be reassumed. Let it not be imagined that it is inconsistent with this measure to look forward to such a period, so that whilst we are necessarily secure, we may hold in contemplation the intention of returning to a better legislative system.

The question then is, what steps are necessary to be taken to restore tranquillity in Lower Canada, and for the settlement of those questions which have been agitated both in the Upper and Lower province? Upper Canada must of course be taken into the consideration, since the interests of the provinces are so interwoven. The questions which connect them are of such moment and urgency as to require the strictest attention on the part of Government; for instance,— the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, so important for the commerce of Upper Canada,—their railroads, steam communications, and other subjects common to the two provinces. At the same time, it is essential that the disputes in Lower Canada should be adjusted; and to attain this end various plans have been devised. Amongst others, it has been proposed that the province should be dismembered —that the city and district of Montreal should be annexed to Upper Canada, the necessity of which annexation is much felt there. But this is a project which cannot be entertained, and I do not know that it would tend to reconcile both parties, but only effect a transfer of the feud from Lower to Upper Canada. Another plan, which has been much insisted on, and is a favourite project with some parties in Lower Canada, is a legislative union between the two provinces; but to this plan there are strong objections; for example, the great extent of the country, the different habits of the inhabitants, the inconvenience of the representatives from a distance meeting all together at any one place, and other formidable objections; and, to close all, its not being likely that the Upper province would consent to this connection. A better prospect might be obtained by a federal union: this would have a very considerable effect in adjusting the disputes between the provinces. It would give the Upper province a just influence over those great questions to which I have alluded, and would, I should think, satisfy the inhabitants of that territory. It would, at the same time, by bringing together the natives of the two provinces to discuss measures of mutual interest, induce them to give their attention to subjects of greater importance; it would enlarge and liberalise their views, and raise them above those narrow and local questions which have hitherto divided them. But in this, also, I am not aware that the Upper province acquiesces; and it is, therefore, my Lords, proposed that something analogous should be attempted by the Governor who is selected by her Majesty for the government of Lower Canada. It is proposed that the Governor shall be authorised to invite from the two provinces persons who may be justly supposed to represent the feelings and wishes of the people, and should consult them as to the measures it may be advisable to adopt for the adjustment of Upper and Lower Canada, and to form an arrangement for the common interest of both. If it be asked what advantages are to be gained from this proposal, I shall answer, that in some respects I have touched on them in adverting to a federal union; and, though in a far greater degree, something similar may, I think, be effected. At all events, the Governor may be able to ascertain what opinion the two provinces entertain with respect to the constitution originally given to them, and with respect to those amendments — some amendments being admitted on all hands to be requisite — which it is desirable to effect. It is at the same time probable that he will be able to submit to Parliament measures relating to the adjustment of the existing differences.

The EARL of RIPON. — When is that expected?

LORD GLENELG. — Of course it will be for the Governor to choose the time. The proposal is, that he invite both Legislatures to nominate a certain number of persons.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — Supposing the House of Assembly to be suspended, how can that be, then?

LORD GLENELG. — The Legislature of Lower Canada being suspended, it is proposed to endeavour to obtain some persons who will fitly represent the opinions of Lower Canada. The mode suggested is, that the Governor call on the electors of Lower Canada to elect proper persons. There are now five districts in Lower Canada, from which we propose to have these representatives chosen under the present franchise.

LORD BROUGHAM. — By the whole of the present electors?

LORD GLENELG. — By the whole of the present electors. At the same time, a power is to be given to the Governor to determine the best time at which to call for an assembly of the electors. Such, my Lords, are the outlines of the measure which the Government proposes to carry into effect. This latter part, as I have stated, will of course not form an enactment in the Bill; but it is considered to be an essential part of the plan. Having stated, generally, the manner in which the Government are prepared to meet the present emergency, I shall now merely refer to the motion I intend to propose to your Lordships; and I do not think it necesssary to enlarge on that subject, for I cannot but persuade myself that your Lordships will at once accede to it. I now therefore move, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, to thank her Majesty for her gracious communication of papers relating to the affairs of Canada: to assure her Majesty that the anxious consideration of the House shall be given to the preparation of such measures as the present exigency may require: to express to her Majesty our deep concern that a disaffected party in Canada should have had recourse to open violence and rebellion, with a view to throw off their allegiance to the Crown: to declare to her Majesty our satisfaction that these designs have been no less opposed by her Majesty's loyal subjects in North America, than by her Majesty's forces; and to assure her Majesty that, while this House is ever ready to afford redress to real grievances, we are fully determined to support the efforts of her Majesty for the suppression of revolt and the restoration of tranquillity."

The Address having been put from the woolsack, —

LORD BROUGHAM said: — My Lords, the part which I had the honour to bear last summer in this House, when the Commons sent up those ill-fated resolutions to which I trace the whole of the present disasters, impels me to present myself thus early, and to obtrude upon your Lordships my sentiments regarding the important question before you. And, my Lords, I wish that, in following my Noble Friend over the ground which he has just trodden, I could confine myself to the space he has travelled over without trespassing upon other more delicate parts of it. But it never seems to have struck him that, when a Minister of the Crown comes to Parliament with a proposition, not merely such as the Address contains, but such as we are warned is to follow swiftly upon the Address, — a demand of extraordinary aid for the Executive Government, — measures of a high prerogative and unconstitutional kind, — it never has struck him that the Minister who resorts to Parliament for the help of its extreme powers, in applying remedies of the last description, has something more to do than merely to ask for those remedies and show their necessity, — that he has to explain whence the necessity arises; to defend the conduct which has led to this crisis in our affairs; to repel from himself and the Ministry whereof he is parcel, the charge of having brought the Colonial Empire, committed to his care, into such a state that we are assembled, at this unwonted season, for the purpose of quelling a rebellion in a principal settlement of the Crown; preventing, if we can, the recurrence of disaffection, and suspending the free constitution of the province, in order to secure its peace. Are these every day occurrences? Are revolt and civil war of such an ordinary aspect that they pass over us like a summer's cloud, and be regarded not? Are the demands of despotic power by the Crown, and the suspension of the whole liberties of the subject, mere matters of course in the conduct of Parliamentary business? Are such demands as these to be granted the instant they are made, — without any question asked, — without one word said upon the antecedent parts of the novel and portentous case, — without any attempt whatever to explain or to defend the maladministration which has terminated in the necessity of those demands, — without even one allusion to the obvious questions, — "Who caused this disastrous state of things? — whose fault is it that such powers are become requisite? — whose misconduct caused the rebellion to burst forth? — whose neglect of all timely precautions fostered discontent till it ripened into disaffection? — whose unpolitic counsels first stirred up that discord, — and whose misapplication of the national resources fanned the disaffection into a flame?" Yet, strange to tell! looking from the beginning to the end of my Noble Friend's statement, distinct and lucid as it was, — to this hour I cannot descry one explanation offered, — one justification attempted — one position taken or defended with the design of protecting himself against the charges which have rung all over the country for weeks, from one end of it to the other, and all pointed against him and his colleagues in the service of the Crown! But, my Lords, I cannot consent so to abandon my duty, as to pass this matter thus over. I feel myself bound to enter upon the subject of these charges at once. I cannot follow the Colonial Minister in the course which he has found it convenient to take, of flying away from the real matter in discussion, or allow him to claim the extraordinary and unconstitutional powers which he asks, as if he were discharging some common duty of mere official routine, — moving for yearly returns, — laying sessional papers before the House, — or calling for a vote to supply the yearly expenses of his department in the ordinary circumstances of tranquil times. There was, indeed, one remark made by him that might seem an exception to the account I have given of his speech. He attempted some defence against the great and leading accusation of having sent over the offensive resolutions, and providing no force to support them. But I shall presently show your Lordships that the explanation he gave made his case much worse; and that he left the charge more grave and formidable, if possible, than he found it.

I will now come to the course of his proceedings at large; and, first of all, to the interval alluded to by the Noble Baron opposite (Lord Ellenborough), when we last met, — the period which elapsed between the despatch of the 20th of November, 1836, promising instructions to the Governor of Canada, and the 11th of March, 1837, the date of the next despatch. It is not true, says the Noble Lord, that near four months elapsed between the promise and the non-performance (for the despatch of March gives no instructions); a small interval only occurred; a letter was written about the middle of February, but it was private, and cannot regularly be produced or even alluded to, says the Noble Lord. A shorter production than that of March, — shorter in point of physical dimensions, for one falling shorter of its purpose there could assuredly not be, — but mathematically smaller ——

LORD GLENELG. — I beg pardon; I did not say a shorter despatch.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Really, then, I must say, this is the most extraordinary mode of selecting papers for the information of the Parliament or the exculpation of the Ministers, that, in my whole life, I ever heard of. The despatch of March, which is of no value whatever, which tells absolutely nothing, is produced; the despatch of July, which may be of some value, and may tell something (I cannot know that it does till I see it), is withheld. Why is it not here with the other? My Noble Friend affirms that it has something in it, — at any rate that it is long, — and he is exceeding wroth with me for curtailing it of its fair proportions. Anxious, like a good parent, for the credit of his offspring, he extols its size, without, however, letting his natural partiality carry him the length of asserting that its value is in proportion to its bulk. Nevertheless, I will, if he pleases, assume it to be so. I will suppose that, instead of containing nothing, like its predecessor of November, and its successor of March, — and, indeed, that long train of phantom letters which followed each other "stretching out to the crack of doom," — it really told the provincial Governor something of the intentions of the Ministry, — something of the course he was to pursue; — then, I ask why we have it not produced, that we, too, may know what that something was which was thus conveyed across the Atlantic, at a critical moment, a year ago? Why are we not to see that which tells something, and only that which tells nothing at all? That is my question; a simple one, and I should think easily to be answered; and, if my Noble Friend will give it an answer, I shall readily pause, in order to be spared the necessity of dwelling longer on this point of the debate, — willing enough, God knows, where there remain so many others which it is impossible to pass over, — that I should be spared the task of dealing with any one which is superfluous. The mysterious description of this letter is to me incomprehensible, as given by my Noble Friend. It was a private one. But what can that signify? Whether a despatch begins, "My Lord," or "My dear Lord," — and ends with "the honour to be," or with "Your's truly," — I had always thought, made no kind of difference in its nature, provided the matter of it was public business. The test of production is the letter relating, or not, to the affairs on which the Parliament has been convoked, and the Sovereign is to be addressed. Nor did I ever yet hear of any Minister refusing to produce a paper, whatever its form might be, which bore that relation, unless, indeed, he had his own reasons for suppressing it. But to refuse it on the pretence of its being private, and yet to use it as a proof that the promise of November was fulfilled in February, while the only papers produced show that it was never fulfilled at all, is one of the most extravagant drafts ever made upon the unsuspecting confidence of Parliament.

It is on the 20th of November, then, that a promise of ample instructions is given to the Governor. The next despatch produced is on the 11th of March; when, instead of fulfilling the promise, now four months old, new promises are made, new hopes of instructions held out, to be realised as soon as the decision of Parliament shall be pronounced upon the case. The promissory letter of November, and the promissory note of February, are, as it were, renewed, but at an uncertain date. When was the decision of Parliament asked? As early as the 6th of March; and after passing some of the principal resolutions, — including indeed the most material of the whole, that refusing an elective council, — the Easter recess comes to the relief of the colonial department, and Parliament is adjourned. But it meets again on the 6th of April, and assuredly neither before nor after the vacation does it testify any great reluctance to comply with the Ministerial desires. From all parts of the country the Members flock to their support against the hapless province which has been denounced. From all parts of the empire the parliamentary host assembles. Does there appear in any quarter a disposition to be over nice about the votes given — over scrupulous as to the principles asserted? Do any of the Ministerial supporters, of that staunch and trusty band to whom the Government is indebted for its majority, betray any squeamishness what measures they shall sanction — what votes they shall give? Is any wish betokened to scrutinise very narrowly the plans or the propositions of the Cabinet before they declare them unexceptionable? On the contrary, so the Ministers leave the concerns of the sister kingdom untouched, and administer its more practical affairs to the taste of its representatives, there is no inclination whatever evinced to make any kind of difficulty about any kind of measure — how violent soever, how coercive soever — that may be propounded for quelling the spirit and completing the misgovernment of any other portion of the whole empire. I confess myself, then, quite unable to comprehend why all this delay of the necessary orders should be made to turn upon the affected ignorance of what course Parliament was likely to take upon resolutions which were sure to be carried through the one House by unexampled majorities — through the other with scarce a single dissentient voice. Yet still not a word is wafted across the ocean more substantial for the guidance of the unhappy Governor than empty promises of orders — notices that some instructions will hereafter be sped towards him. This system, I own, puzzles me not a little. I can well understand the use of notices where there is to be debate and resistance to your propositions. When a question is to arise upon what you propose, that its merits may be discussed, and that its adversaries may be warned to attend the controversy, I can easily conceive the use of giving them intimation; though even then such intimations as the despatches give, specifying no time at all, would be of no great avail. But what sense can there be in giving your servant a general notice of orders to be afterwards issued, when all he has to do must be, not to debate, but to obey? Does he require notice in order to make up his mind to comply? Or is he called upon to consider, in the interval, whether he shall resist, or do as he is bid? And yet the Noble Lord's despatches are stuffed so full of mere notices, that I know of nothing in this respect at all equal to it, unless it be the Order Book of the other House of Parliament on the first day of a Session after a general election! The notice, however, being given, and the promise made in November, in the fulness of time, at the end of April, comes the expected despatch; a six months' child is brought forth — it makes a cry — struggles for life — and is heard of no more. I defy the wit of man to suggest the purpose of the November despatch, or of the March one, which, instead of instruction, conveys merely a report of the divisions in the Commons, as the newspapers would have done with equal, and the original document, the Votes, with greater authority; but still less can any one divine the purpose for which the despatch of April was called into a premature and precarious existence; for, instead of redeeming the oftentimes repeated pledge, by letting the Government know what he was to do, it merely brings down the report of the divisions, and adds, carefully, the yet more useless information of the lists of the Members' names. "The resolutions," says my Noble Friend, "have all been passed by large majorities, and I enclose, for your Lordship's information, extracts from the proceedings of the House, containing a statement of the several divisions which have taken place on this subject since I last addressed you." Then as to the introduction of the Bill itself,—that, it seems, "must be postponed till after the opinion of the House of Lords shall have been taken;" about which there seems to be entertained some doubt, to me, I confess, rather unintelligible, considering that but one voice was at all likely to be raised in this place against any of the resolutions. But the Noble Lord adds, "I have every reason to anticipate that the Bill will be submitted to Parliament within a very short period," and this was written on the 29th of April. Then come promises in abundance. "So soon," says my Noble Friend, "as the resolutions shall have been disposed of by the House of Lords, I shall address to your Lordship full instructions on the steps which should be adopted under existing circumstances, especially with reference to the composition of both the Legislative and Executive Councils. Your Lordship may rely on receiving them in ample time to enable you to prepare for the meeting of the Legislature." Did he rely on receiving them in time? I know not; but if he did, he was grevously deceived. I shall presently show your Lordships that he did not receive them till long after the Parliament had met and been prorogued, and I shall demonstrate that most fatal effects were produced by these instructions not arriving. After adverting to the time of the Colonial Legislature meeting, and stating that the Governor was the best judge of this, the despatch goes on to say, "I shall, however, distinctly advert to this point in connection with the other matters on which I shall have to address your Lordship, and I only refer to it now that you may be aware it will not be overlooked." Really, I can barely admit that this would be the necessary effect on the Governor's mind of such a reference; so many things had been so often referred to, all of which had, in succession, been entirely overlooked, that I am rather apprehensive the reference to this question (which, by the way, it is admitted Lord Gosford alone could decide) frustrated its own object, and was fitted to make him expect that this point of future instruction would be overlooked, like all its predecessors. But another reason is given for the prospective reference — "and in order that your own attention may be directed to it in the mean time." "To it? To what?" exclaims the governor, "for as yet you have told me nothing. How shall I direct my attention, in the mean time, to that of which you withhold from me all knowledge?" The thing seems incredible, and we must keep the eye steadily fixed upon the original document lest unbelief get the mastery of us. "With a view," the despatch proceeds — for there was a view with which Lord Gosford was to keep his attention fixed upon an unknown instruction, to arrive at an uncertain time, he was to ponder upon the question of the time of meeting Parliament, which he alone could solve, directing his attention to the instructions on that subject, to be sent by those who could form no judgment upon it, and in utter ignorance of the purport of those instructions on which he was to be all the while reflecting. And what think you, my Lords, was this view with which he was to attend and reflect? What was the reason why his attention should be fixed upon nothing — why his eyes should be directed to glare upon darkness or vacant space? "With the view," concludes this unparalleled letter, "to the sound exercise of that discretion" — some faint semblance there is here, the approach, at least, of some definite matter, but it vanishes instantly, like all the rest, — "that discretion which it may probably be expedient to leave in your Lordship's hands, with regard to it!" So the Governor is informed that at some future, but uncertain time, he shall be told something of importance, which is carefully concealed from him; the reason, however, is given for warning him that he may expect it, namely, that he may be enabled to occupy the awful interval between reading what tells him nothing, and receiving what is to tell him he knows not what, in making up his mind how he shall act in unknown circumstances, upon undisclosed instructions, and exercise "a sound discretion" upon the undiscovered matter, there being a grave doubt intimated in the same breath, whether or not any discretion at all may ever "be left in his hands." To such orders was Lord Gosford's conduct subject; by such instructions was he to be guided; in such circumstances, and leading to such results, was his discretion to be exercised. My Lords, let us, in justice towards an absent man — let us, in fairness towards one who, because he is absent, is, by the common proverb, so little creditable to human candour, assumed to be in the wrong — pause for a moment, to consider whether one so situated and so treated, even if his conduct had been the most defective, and had the least satisfied his superiors, would justly have been visited with blame, or at least let us say whether the blame must not have been largely shared by his employers? Mark, I beseech you, in what position he is left. Sent to the advanced posts of the empire; at a distance from the seat of government; far removed from the wisdom, the vigour, the resources of those councils which rule our affairs; unprovided with any but the ordinary force of the colony, the force adapted to peaceful times, and with this inadequate force appointed to meet a crisis brought on by his employers — a crisis unparalleled in the affairs of the province, — mark, I say, the helpless position of this noble person, so unaided by adequate resources, so surrounded by extreme perils, and instead of being instructed how he is to act, told by those who first planted him there, then surrounded him with danger, and at the same time refused him help to meet it, that at a future day he shall be informed how he is to comport himself — that for the present he is to know nothing — and that he may be making up his mind by guess-work how he shall act when he may be told what he should do! But, my Lords, I say it is not Lord Gosford, only, whose situation you are to mark and to compassionate. Look to the provinces committed to his care! If you will have dominions in every clime — if you will rule subjects by millions on the opposite sides of the globe — if you will undertake to administer a government that stretches itself over both hemispheres, and boast an empire on which the sun never sets — it is well. Whether this desire be prudent or impolitic for yourselves, I ask not; whether its fruits be auspicious or baneful to our own interests, I stop not to inquire; nor do I raise the question, whether to the distant millions over whom you thus assume dominion, this mighty and remote sceptre be a blessing or a curse. But of one thing I am absolutely certain; at all events this resolution to have so vast an empire imposes upon you the paramount duty of wakefulness over its concerns — it prescribes the condition that you shall be alive to its administration, vigilant at all times, that you shall not slumber over it, neither sleep, nor, like the sluggard, fold the hands to sleep, as if your orders were issued to a district, each corner of which the eye could at each moment command — or a kingdom, the communication with all parts of which is open every day and every hour, and where all the orders you may issue are to be executed in the self-same circumstances in which they were conceived and were framed. That is the condition upon which such mighty empires must be holden — that is the difficulty which exists in the tenure; hard to grapple with — perilous to be possessed of — not wholesome, it may be, either for the colony or the parent state, should they long remain knit together — but at all events the condition, sine quâ non, of having to administer such arduous concerns.

But let us, my Lords, resume the history of these transactions. The resolutions were introduced, and in part were adopted by the Commons, on the 6th of March. Parliament having reassembled on the 6th of April, they were not brought before your Lordships till the 9th of May, when you passed them with only my dissenting voice. Now, both Lord Gosford and the Parliament had been assured that the resolutions should be followed up by immediate action, as, indeed, the plainest dictates of all sound policy required, and that the Bill to make them operative should be introduced without delay. Was it so? Was any thing like this done? No. Nothing of the kind. Day after day passed; week after week glided away; and up to the middle of June, when the lamented illness of the Sovereign ended in a demise of the Crown, no one step had been taken to convert the resolutions into a legislative measure. Yet did any man living doubt what the inevitable effect of these resolutions must be? They were not conciliatory — they were any thing but conciliatory. They were coercive, they meant refusal, they meant repression, or they meant nothing. They imported a repulsive denial of the Canadian's prayers — a peremptory negative to his long-pressed claims — an inexorable refusal of his dearly cherished desires. This might be quite right and necessary. I don't now argue that question — but at any rate it was harsh and repulsive. Nor was there the least accompaniment of kindness, — the smallest infusion of tenderness, to sweeten the cup which we commended to his lips. His anxious wish was for an Elective Council. This was strongly, unequivocally, universally expressed. Far from relaxing, the feeling had grown more intense; far from losing influence, it had spread more widely year by year. Instead of being expressed by majorities in the Assembly, of two to one, of the people there represented, after the last dissolution that had increased in the proportion of fourteen to one, the representatives of 477,000 against those of 34,000 only. Never let this fact for an instant pass from the recollection of your Lordships: it lies at the root of the whole argument, and should govern our judgment on every part of the case. It is a fact, which cannot be denied, and it indicates a posture of affairs which all attempts to change [must be vain. How were the resolutions formed to meet this state of the public mind? How did the Parliament, the reformed Parliament of England, meet the all but unanimous prayer of the Canadian people? By an unanimous vote of this House, by a majority in the other, nearly as great as that which in the provincial Parliament supported the improvement so anxiously solicited, the people of Canada were told that they had no hope, and that from the parent State they never would obtain the dearest object of all their wishes. But was there on the other hand no tenderness displayed to soften the harshness of the refusal — no boon offered to mitigate the harsh, the repulsive, the vexatious act of turning to their prayers a deaf ear, and putting an extinguisher on all their hopes? There was. You had given them in 1831 the power of the purse; had told them that they should no longer have to complain of possessing the British constitution in name, while in substance they had it not; had "kindly and cordially" (such were your words) conferred on them a privilege that should place them on the self-same footing with the British Parliament, secure to them the substantial power of granting, postponing, or refusing supplies, instead of the mere shadow of a free constitution, which they had before been mocked with. You had told them that in future the means were theirs of protecting their rights from encroachment; that they could thenceforth enforce their claims of right; that they could insist upon redress of their grievances by withholding supplies while the redress was refused. But what do you offer to them in 1837, by way of sweetening the bitter refusal of their prayer for an Elective Council? You absolutely mingle with this nauseous potion not a repeal of the Act of 1831, but a declaration that for using its provisions — for exercising the option it gave of refusing supplies — for employing the powers it conferred, in the very way in which you intended, or at least professed to intend, they should be employed, to enforce a redress of grievances, — you would set the Act and all its provisions at nought, appropriate their money without their consent, and seize their chest by main force, in spite of their teeth, because they had done what you took credit six years ago for giving them the right to do — withheld their money until they had obtained redress! Such were the resolutions — such their import and intention. I am not now arguing their merits. I am not about proving their monstrous cruelty — their outrageous injustice. But I ask if any human being ever existed in the whole world moon-stricken to the excess of doubting, for one instant of time, what must be the effect of their arrival in Canada? Some there may be who viewed them with a more favourable eye than others; some who deemed them justifiable, some even necessary; while others abhorred them as tyrannical and without the shadow of justification. Some, again, might apprehend a more instantaneous revolt to be risked by them than others dreaded; and some might differ as to the extent and the efficacy of that commotion: but where was the man of any class, whether among the authors of the resolutions, and their supporters, or their enemies, or the by-standers, — among those of liberal principles who were struck with dismay at the shame in which their leaders were wrapt, or among those of opposite opinions who exulted to see the liberal cause disgraced and ruined; — where, I demand, among them all was the man endued with understanding enough to make his opinion worth the trouble of asking for it, who ever doubted that the arrival of these detested resolutions in Canada must be the signal of revolt — at least, the immediate cause of wide-spreading discontent and disaffection throughout the province? The event speedily justified this universal apprehension. I might appeal to the ordinary channels of information; to the public papers of America as well as of Canada; to what formed the topic of conversation in every political circle, both of the old world and the new; but I will only refer you to these papers, meagre and imperfect as they are, — for they contain abundant proofs of the fact which I state, — and in the face of these disclosures, reluctant and scanty though they be, I will defy my Noble Friends to gainsay the statement I have made.

I may here observe, that as several of the despatches give so little information that they might, without any detriment to the question, have been withheld, so some have manifestly been kept back, of which the Government are unquestionably possessed, and which would throw light upon this part of the subject, although those produced give us plain indications what has been suppressed. Thus, the despatches of the 2d, 8th, and 9th of September show to an attentive reader, as strikingly as anything in the late deplorable Gazettes themselves, the progress of that discontent which has been suffered to break out into rebellion. In the first, Lord Gosford states that he thinks it may become necessary to suspend the constitution — not an indication, surely, of things being in a satisfactory or a tranquil state. In the last of the three letters he says, "Up to this day (not at once, but in a course of time) he has been obliged to dismiss fifty-three magistrates and public officers." And for what? The magistrates for attending unlawful meetings, and the officers for seditious practices. What state of things does this betoken? And how plainly does it show that the evil was not of yesterday? Manifestly the dismissals had been going on for a time, and notice of them had been communicated to the Government at home; but how happens it that no other intimation is given of so grave a matter except in this one despatch? Then, in the letter of the 8th of September, Lord Gosford describes a central committee as having been formed by the disaffected, from which orders were issued to what he calls "the local committees." The local committees! Yet we find no mention whatever of any local committees in any of the other letters produced for our information. The use of the definite article plainly shows that the Governor had in some previous despatch described those bodies to which he here refers without any description. When, in the same sentence, he speaks of the central committee — evidently for the first time — he calls it "a central committee," and explains its nature. Clearly, then, there has been received some other letter, whether long or short, private and informal, or regular and official, informing the Government of the ominous circumstance, here only alluded to as already well known, of local committees having been established throughout the province. But that other letter is kept back. The information which the supposed despatch would disclose is not new to me, and it is of deep importance. It points at an organised system of insurrection, and it traces the system to the arrival of the resolutions in Canada. In each parish, parochial committees were formed; in each district, district committees; and these local bodies were under the orders of the central committee. But a judicial system was also established. In each place there were appointed arbitrators, called amicables compositeurs, or pacificators, to whom it was required that all having suits should resort, and not to the King's courts of justice; or, if the party preferred the latter, he was visited by some one who warned him that the patriots had passed resolutions against suing in the courts of the State. His cattle were marked in the night if he persevered; and a further contumacy towards the courts of the arbitrators was visited with the maiming of his beasts the night after. This system was established and in operation as early as the beginning of September. But there are some plans which cannot be the work of a day; and of these a judicial establishment like this is surely one. We may safely calculate that months had elapsed before the things stated respecting it in these papers could exist. But I know that the plan was not confined to such committees of government, and such irregular tribunals. Men were raised, as was said, for the purposes of police; — as, I believe, to be ready for resisting the Government. The pretext was the removal of so many magistrates from the commission of the peace. So that we have here all the great functions of government usurped by the disaffected, — executive administration provided, judicial tribunals formed, and a military forced levied, — and all usurped under the very eye of the Government. Why do I ascribe all these frightful results to the resolutions? My reason is plain — it is in these despatches. Lord Gosford himself tells you what their effect was, particularly that of the eighth, respecting the money. They who were most attached to the Government, who most reprobated the proceedings of the patriots, who least favoured the French party, were loud in their disapprobation of that eighth resolution. I do not marvel at this, my Lords; to me it is no surprise at all — I expected it. I contended against the resolutions; I protested against them; I earnestly, though humbly, besought you not to plunge the country into that civil contention which I saw was inevitable the moment that eighth resolution should pass. To injury of the deepest character, it added what is worse than all injury — mockery and insult. To tell men that you gave them the British constitution, and to brag of your bounty in giving it; to tell them that they no longer had it in form, but that now you generously bestowed on them the substance; to tell them that they now possessed the same control over the Executive Government which we in England have, and which is the corner-stone of our free constitution; to tell them that you gave them the power of stopping supplies, for the purpose of arming them with the means of protecting their rights from the encroachments of tyranny, and of obtaining a redress of all grievances; — bragging of your liberality in thus enabling them to seek and to get, by these means, that redress; — and then, the very first time they use the power so given, for the very purpose for which you gave it, to leave them nominally in possession of it, to pass by it, to disregard it, to act as if you never had given it at all, and to seize hold of the money; to send a file of soldiers, and pillage the chest of that fund which you pretended you had given them, and them alone, the absolute power over: — this, surely, is a mockery and an insult, in the outrageous nature of which the injury itself offered merges and is lost. But I am not now arguing the merits of these ill-fated proceedings. Let them have been ever so justifiable, I have nothing to say against them. They were adopted by the wisdom of Parliament, and it is too late to discuss, it is unavailing to lament it; but this, at least, we may say, that when such a course as this was taken, known beforehand to the Government, to its advisers, who could not be taken unprepared by it — who had been deliberating on it from the 20th of November, 1836, to the unknown date of the suppressed despatch in July, and thence to that of the next not very instructive, but, at least, forthcoming, despatch of April 29.; the Ministers were aware of the measure they had conceived, they knew its tendency, they must have made up their mind to its effects, they had resolved to inflict the grievous injury, and offer the intolerable insult, yet worse than the injury. Was there ever yet imbecility — was there ever confusion or want of ideas — ever yet inexplicable policy (if I might prostitute such a name to such a base use) — was there ever seen in the history of human blunders and incapacity anything to match this of wronging, and mocking, and insulting, and yet taking no one step by way of precaution against the inevitable effect of the outrage offered, and to prevent the disaffection, into which you were goading them, from bursting out into revolt, and the revolt from proving successful? The Canadian people are told, "You shall be defeated, and oppressed, and scorned, and insulted, and goaded to resent; but care shall all the while be taken that nothing is done to prevent the irritation we are causing from bringing on rebellion; and, should rebellion peradventure ensue, no means shall be used to prevent the shedding of blood, to protect the loyal and restrain the insurgent." My Lords, there have been before now, at various times, men inclined to play a tyrant's part; to oppress the unoffending, to trample upon the liberties of mankind; men who had made up their minds to outrage the feelings of human nature for some foul purpose of their own, aggravating the wrongs they did, and exasperating the hatred they deliberately excited, by insults yet more hard to be borne. These courses have had different fortunes: sometimes the oppressor has prevailed — sometimes he has been withstood, and punished by the people. But I will venture to assert, that this is the first time such a course ever was pursued without some foresight, some precaution to enforce the policy resolved on — some means provided to preclude resistance, and, at least, to guard against its effects. Tyranny and oppression has here appeared stripped of its instinctive apprehension and habitual circumspection. Compared with the conduct which we are now called to contemplate, the most vacillating and imbecile, the most inconsistent and impotent rulers, rise into some station commanding respect — King John, or Richard Cromwell himself, rises into a wise, a politic, and a vigorous prince.

But it is said that there were various reasons why these resolutions should not be accompanied with an effective force. And first, because the event has shown that there were troops enough already in the colony to quell the revolt. I hope it is already put down, — I do not know that it is; but assuming it to be so, does not my Noble Friend see how much this proves? The defence, if it means any thing, means this,—that the ordinary peace establishment of Canada is quite large enough to meet the most extraordinary emergencies that ever yet happened in its whole history. How, then, will he meet those economists of our resources,—those who are so niggardly and frugal of the public money, and justly complain of every pound needlessly spent, and every man not absolutely required for the defence of the provinces? Because if it turns out that you had, in times of profound peace, so large a force in the colony as was enough to meet a most unexpected crisis, and to cope successfully with a civil war, how is the question to be answered, "Why an army should be wanted in peace equal to the establishment which a war requires?" Had such a question been put on any other occasion than the present, I well know the answer it would have received, because I have heard it again and again, both while in office and while out of office. The answer would assuredly have been, "We keep only just force enough to meet the ordinary demands of tranquil times." Yet, according to the extraordinary defence set up this night, there never are fewer troops maintained in Canada than are sufficient to meet demands of the most unexpected kind. There may a civil war any moment break out, and the Government may occasion and may quell an universal insurrection, without despatching an additional man or gun thither. The establishment is so happily constituted as not to be too great for peace, and also not too little for war. But a second argument has been used, more startling still. My Noble Friend tells you that to send more men over would have had a very bad effect, because it would be admitting the resolutions were wrong, and showing we anticipated a resistance. Why, my Lords, is it not better to anticipate a resistance, and thereby prevent it, than to do nothing and be surprised by one? Which is the worst and most dangerous course,—to be over cautious, or too supine? Is not the reality of a successful revolt infinitely more hurtful than the appearance of dreading one which may never break out? Is not a revolt far more likely to happen, and if it happen to succeed, if you omit the ordinary and natural precautions? And suppose these prevent its happening, what the worse are you for having it said, and said unjustly too, that you were apprehensive without cause? But then a third defence is attempted. Sending troops, says my Noble Friend, would have been paying a bad compliment to the loyal zeal of the Canadians; it would have been treating them as if we could not sufficiently rely on them alone. Now I should not much wonder if these peaceable inhabitants of the province, however loyal, and however devoted, were to say, when they found themselves, through this extreme delicacy, exposed unprotected to civil war, "A truce with your compliments; send us some troops. Don't laud our zeal and loyalty at the expense of our security. Don't punish us for our good qualities. Give us less praise and more protection. Never heed the imputation you may expose us to by sending out effectual succour to those who are not military men, so that you only secure the settlement against the worst of calamities, the flames of civil war, and, should they break out, their laying waste our province." Surely, my Lords, those peaceful and loyal subjects of the Crown are sorely aggrieved, when you tell them that their settlement may be involved in agitation and torn by civil broils, but that still no protecting hand shall be stretched forth to stay their ruin, — that you abondon your duty towards them, — the duty of protection, which alone gives you a title to the reciprocal duty of allegiance, — and as surely they are mocked, beside being aggrieved, when in excuse for thus deserting your duty towards them, they are told that, were you to discharge it, you might appear to doubt their loyalty and their zeal. My Lords, this is not, it cannot, be a real defence; it is an afterthought. I am sorry to say that I cannot bring myself to regard it as sincere; and but for the respect I owe my Noble Friend, I could not bring myself to regard it as an honest defence. If any man had asked him six months ago, before the event, why no troops had been sent to back the odious resolutions, and render resistance hopeless, he might have given various answers to a very pertinent question. I cannot, indeed, easily divine what he would have urged in explanation; but of one thing I am quite certain, — I can tell at once what he would not have urged, — he never would have uttered a word about the despatch of troops indicating a distrust of Canadian loyalty or a condemnation of the eighth resolution. All this is a mere ingenious expedient resorted to after the event, and it is not, permit me to say, characterised by the accustomed candour, fairness, and ingenuousness of the Noble Lord.

Well, then, thus matters went on, and thus to the very last, with admirable consistency. No instructions, either as to the Legislative or Executive Council, reached Canada before the Parliament of the province met, although it had been distinctly promised that they should arrive before the meeting, as, indeed, after it they could serve no kind of purpose. Nay, the Parliament had met and been prorogued before they were even despatched from Downing Street. I am aware, indeed, of the despatches which bear the date of July 14. — a day remarkable in the calendar of the Colonial Office for unwonted activity, — no less than four of these despatches being all dated upon that singular day; and I know that one of these appears to contain a good deal about the constitution of the Legislative Council; but when you examine it you find nothing more than a long, a very long, extract from the Report of the commissioners, — so long, as to require an apology in my Noble Friend's letter for the length of the quotation. It seems that on this matter the three commissioners had agreed. Their general course of proceeding had been to differ upon every thing; so that each reason assigned by the one found a satisfactory refutation in the arguments urged by his able and ingenious colleagues. Nevertheless they had an odd manner of often coming to the same conclusion, not only by different roads, but by travelling in a diametrically opposite directions, as if to reach York they took not the Hull road or the Grantham road, but the road by Exeter or by Brighton. However, in this paper they had for a wonder all agreed; therefore my Noble Friend catches at it, and, for the edification of the Governor, sends him nearly the whole of it, in the form of a despatch, without adding one word of advice or information as to how the Governor should proceed in carrying the propositions into effect, or constructing his council, — the whole practical matter being what men he should put upon it. The Noble Governor was now surrounded by disaffection, and sitting upon the collected materials of an explosion; he was ruling a province on the brink of civil war, and without supplies of force, or a word of information or advice from home. So my Noble Friend sends him a long quotation from the Report of the commissioners, — a precaution the less necessary, that the Noble Lord himself, being one of those commissioners, had himself signed that Report, and might, one should suppose, very possibly be possessed of some knowledge of its contents. Nay, it was barely possible that he might have a copy of the document at large. So careful, however, was the Noble Secretary of State, that he thought it better to send him a part of it, as he was pretty certainly already in possession of the whole. Nothing more is done till August 22., when at length a despatch is forwarded, with full instructions as to the composition of the council. The despatches before sent had contained only a very partial and entirely provisional power of appointment. But the difference between the two dates is, in fact, quite immaterial; for if all that was sent in August had been sent in July, it was too late, — the Parliament met on the 18th of August, and, unless the powers had arrived before that day, they were absolutely useless; not to mention that a proclamation issued in June shows the colony to have been then on the verge of rebellion. The provincial Parliament met; nothing but the resolutions was laid before them; nothing but refusal and coercion, disappointment and mockery, were tendered to them, without a single proposition to soften the harshness of the refusal, or mitigate the bitterness of the insult. The provinces were now arrayed in opposition, and preparing resistance to the Government, — an extensive system of combination was established,—civil, judicial, and military powers were exercised by the patriots. It was now too late to soothe, by the appointment of councillors, whose names, a few weeks earlier, might have given confidence to the people, and paved the way for a restoration of kindly feelings towards the Government; they had already gotten the local committes,— their central body, —their amiables compositeurs, their police-bands. On the one hand, hope had been held out never to be realised; promises made only to be broken. On the other hand, resolutions of coercion had been passed amounting to hateful threats, to be followed immediately by Bills, but these were never so much as proposed to Parliament. The insurrection breaks out, — blood is spilt, — the province is involved in rebellion and in war, — still no legislative measures are ever framed upon the resolutions. Parliament assembles weeks after the most important information has come from the colony, — still not a word is said of anything but the new Civil List; and instead of the often-promised Bill to carry the resolutions of April and May into effect, an entirely new Bill is announced, upon a wholly different plan, and to meet the completely altered state of affairs.

Now, then, I ask the reason why the measure was delayed, after being distinctly promised in April? The Government are aware that this question must be answered, and I find several reasons assigned in these papers. The first is given in one of the four despatches of July 14.: — "Much as the Government have always lamented the necessity of adopting such a measure under any circumstances, they would, at the present moment, feel a peculiar reluctance in resorting to it, as they would deeply regret that one of the first legislative acts of her most gracious Majesty's reign should carry even the semblance of an ungracious spirit towards the representatives of her loyal and faithful subjects in that province." If, then, even "the semblance of an ungracious spirit towards the loyal and faithful subjects," is so "deeply regretted" by my Noble Friend, what thinks he of the reality of an audacious spirit of resistance to the Sovereign herself? Does he not consider that it would have been quite as well to avoid such empty, unmeaning compliments to his Sovereign, and discharge the imperative duty cast upon him of maintaining her authority and protecting her loyal people? Would it not have been full as respectful a course, and to his Royal Mistress just as grateful, if, instead of such tawdry and clumsy figures of speech, he had given her the opportunity of maintaining the peace of her dominions, by pursuing the course begun under her illustrious predecessor? My Noble Friend speaks of "deep regret." Was it then a subject of much satisfaction to him that weakness and indecision, delay and inaction, should lead from dissatisfaction to revolt, and end in shedding the blood of the people? Are these things no matter of regret, when deep regret is expressed at merely continuing in the new reign, the measures resolved upon towards the end of the old? The rose leaves on the royal couch of the young Queen must not, it seems, be ruffled by the discharge of painful, though necessary duties. But then was the deathbed of the aged Monarch to be studded with thorns? If the mind of the successor must not be disturbed with the more painful cares of royalty, was the dying prince to have his last moments harassed and vexed by measures of a severe and harsh aspect? Such, I presume, is the reason assigned for nothing having been done after the resolutions were passed in the beginning of May. My Lords, this is a delicate — a perilous argument. We are here treading slippery ground — we are dealing with very high matters. I affirm that I speak the language of the constitution when I absolutely refuse my ear to all such reasons. They are resorted to for the defence of the Ministers at the expense of the Monarchy. I know nothing of the last hours of one reign, or the dawn of another — nothing in the change of sovereigns which can lessen the responsibility of their servants, or excuse them from performing their duty to the Crown, be it of a stern and harsh nature, or be it gentle and kind. Beware, I say, how you give any countenance, ay, or any quarter, to topics of defence like these. They are so many arguments against a monarchical constitution, and in favour of some other form of government. This is no discourse of mine. It is not I who am to blame for broaching this matter. You are they (to the Ministers) — you are they who have forced it into debate; and this despatch — this despatch is the text upon which, trust me, commentators will not be wanting!

But, my Lords, these were not the reasons of all the vacillation and all the delay. The real reason oozes out a few pages later in the book before me. I have been reading from the despatch of June 29.; turn now to one a fortnight later, and you find that a resolution had all at once been taken to give up the eighth resolution, and ask money from Parliament here, for the Canadian service, instead of despoiling the chest at Quebec. This abandonment of the eighth Resolution, as to all fruits to be derived from it, is indeed unaccompanied with any benefit whatever from the surrender — the announcement of the policy, harsh and insulting, is to continue; only its enforcement is given up, and the people of England are, as usual, to pay the money. But see with what a magnanimous accompaniment this abandonment — this shifting of the ground is ushered in. We are now in full vigour; and we cannot boast too loudly of it, while in the very act of performing the crowning feat of impotency. "The time (says this very despatch) has passed away in which it was right to pause and deliberate." Some hopes, indeed, seem yet to have been entertained of amicable adjustment — it is difficult to see why — nor, indeed, does the Noble Secretary of State see, for he candidly says, "hopes, resting, as I must confess, on no very definite ground;" yet he adds, "I cannot altogether despair that the Assembly, or some considerable portion of it, will abandon their course." I suppose because there was nothing whatever to make them think of doing any such thing. My Noble Friend, however, in the act of abandoning his course, — a course which he declares was "entered on by him, upon no light or ordinary motives" — adds, "To retreat from such a course would be inconsistent with our most deliberate sense of public duty." "Deprecating, therefore (he proceeds), every appearance of vacillation where no doubt really exists," — and so forth. Then, did he flatter himself, that when the appearance of vacillation was so much to be deprecated, its reality would work no harm to the public service? Did he not perceive that all he here so powerfully urges against inaction and hesitation, and oscitancy, and faltering, were triumphant arguments in favour of that line of conduct which he never once pursued? This despatch, full of reasons against vacillation, affords the most marvellous sample of it which is to be found in the whole train of his proceedings. The resolutions were passed almost unanimously; it was resolved to take the money of the good people of Canada — it was affirmed that there must be no pause — no doubt — no vacillation — and the new determination prefaced by this announcement, is that the former resolutions, about which no man, say they, can now have any doubt, shall be given to the winds, and the money taken from the pockets of the good people of England!

It would, indeed, seem that just about this time, some wonderful change had come over the minds of the Ministers, depriving them of their memory, and lulling even their senses to repose; that something had happened which cast them into a sweet slumber, a deep trance, such as physicians tell us not only suspends all recollection of the past, but makes men impervious to the impressions from surrounding objects through the senses. Could this have arisen from the deep grief into which my Noble Friend and his colleagues were known to have been plunged by the decease of their kind and generous master? No doubt that feeling must have had its day, or its hour — but it passed swiftly away — it is not in the nature of grief to endure for ever. Then how came it to pass that the trance continued? Was it that the demise of one monarch is necessarily followed by the accession of another? Oh! doubtless its pleasing endurance must have been caused by the elevation of their late gracious master's illustrious successor, prolonging the suspension of the faculties which grief had brought on, but changing it into that state, inexpressibly delicious, which was suited to the circumstances, so interesting, of the new reign. Or could it be, that the Whig party, having for near a hundred years been excluded from the banquet of royal favour, had now sitten down to the rich repast with an appetite, the growth of a century's fast, and were unable to divert their attention from so pleasurable and unusual an enjoyment, to mere vulgar matters of public duty, and bring their faculties, steeped in novel delight, to bear upon points so distant as Canada — affairs so trivial as the tranquillity of the most important province of the Crown, and the peace of this country — possibly of the world? All these inconsiderable interests being in jeopardy, were they insufficient to awaken our rulers from their luxurious stupor? I know not — I put the query — I suggest the doubt — I am unable to solve it. I may, for aught I know, have hit upon the solution; but of this I am sure, that to some such solution one is unavoidably led by the passage of the despatch which refers to the demise and accession as the cause of the general and absolute inaction which at that critical moment prevailed. But another event was in prospect, the harbinger of almost as much joy as the prospects of the new reign — I mean the prospect of a new Parliament. The despatch gives the approaching dissolution as one reason for the conduct, or rather the inaction, of the Government; and I sincerely believe most truly, for as surely as an accession follows a dissolution of the Prince, so surely does an election follow a dissolution of his Parliament. It is not that there was anything like a justification of the Bill not being introduced, in the approaching dissolution; for there was abundance of time to pass it between the beginning of May and the end of July, when Parliament was dissolved. It could not have been much delayed in the other House, where such unprecedented majorities had concurred in passing all the resolutions; and in this House, my Noble Friend (Lord Melbourne) knows he can do as he likes — I mean when he is doing wrong — Illâ se jactet in Aulâ, and he is little opposed here. I am far from saying your Lordships would so readily let him do anything to advance the interests of the people, or extend their rights; but only let him invade their liberties, and he is sure to find you every way indulgent; such is your partiality for a bold and decided policy; so great your inclination to support what are termed vigorous measures! It is not, therefore, with the dissolution that I can connect the laches of the Government in the way in which they urge it as a defence. But they were impatient to get rid of the old Parliament, that they might be electing a new one, and all their attention was absorbed in their election schemes. Their hopes were high; they reckoned upon gaining largely, and little dreamed that upon their appeal to the people, instead of gaining fifty, they should lose fifteen. Those "hopes too fondly nursed," were afterwards "too rudely crossed;" but at the time they filled their whole soul, and precluded all attention or care for other matters, whether justice to Canada, or justice to England. What passed in this House, to the serious interruption of our judicial functions, may be taken as a proof how little chance any colonial affairs had of commanding a moment's regard, or delaying for a day the much-wished-for general election. The report had been made to head-quarters by the proper officers — those whose duty it is to preside over the gathering of the Commons — to take care that there shall be a House when it is wanted — or that there shall be none when that is expedient; and, above all, whose department is to arrange the times and seasons of elections. The result was, that the interests of the Ministry were understood to require that certain writs should issue on the Monday, and that on no account whatever the Parliament should be allowed to exist another day. In the general joy of the new reign, and the sanguine hopes from the new Parliament, my Noble Friend on the woolsack, (Lord Cottenham) seemed himself to be a partaker. He betrayed signs of hilarity unwonted; I saw him, I can undertake to say, smile twice at that critical period, and I have heard it said, that the same symptom was observed on one other occasion; but that of course passed away. We were engaged in a most important cause — a question of law — long the subject of dispute in Westminster Hall, and on which the different courts there had widely disagreed. It had come at length before this House for decision in the last resort, and after being fully argued, the Learned Judges (whose assistance your Lordships had, still differing in opinion,) had delivered their arguments seriatim. It was for the House to determine, and set the controverted point at rest for ever by a solemn decision; and accordingly, on the Saturday, my Noble and Learned Friend had begun, by moving an affirmance of the judgment below; and by a natural mistake (the point being one wholly of common law) he had given a reason rather for reversing than affirming, by citing a case that made against his argument. At this identical moment, there was observed to approach him from behind, a form not unknown to the House, though to the law unknown, the Lord Privy Seal, robed as a Peer of Parliament, and interrupting the judge in delivering his judgment, to suggest what immediately put an end to my Noble and Learned Friend's argument. There could be no doubt of the purport of that communication; the hour of four had arrived, and then, if at all, must the Commons be summoned, to hear the Commission read. The Privy Seal had warned the Great Seal that if the judgment were given — if the reasons in its favour were assigned, only the ones against it having been stated — the Parliament could not be dissolved on Monday; and thus the grave interests of the elections might be sacrificed to the mere administration of justice. The judgment being thus prematurely closed, and the argument left against, and not for, the decision recommended by the Speaker of your Lordships' House, the commission was executed, and some score or two of Bills were passed. The judicial business was then resumed. Your Lordships differed in opinion. The Lord Chief Justice took a view opposite to that of the Lord Chancellor. It was my fortune to agree with the latter; and after considerable argument the judgment was affirmed, not for the reason which he had given in favour of it; but in spite of the reason which he had urged against it. But this was not all. I and other Noble Lords were most anxious to have the dissolution postponed one day longer, in order to dispose of several important causes which had been fully heard, at heavy expense to the parties, and to prevent the risk of the whole expense being renewed in case those who had heard them should die before next Session, or be unable to attend the judicial business of the House. We earnestly besought the Government to grant this postponement for so important a purpose, as well as to prevent the vexation to the parties of increased and most needless delay — to the Court the serious inconvenience of deciding a year after the argument had been heard. But we prayed in vain; they would hear of nothing but dissolving and electing, would attend to nothing else, would allow nothing to interpose between them and their favourite electioneering pursuits; and the reports of your Lordships' judicial proceedings bear testimony to the haste with which, to attain those electioneering objects, the Session was closed, and the administration of justice in the last resort interrupted. Well, therefore, might the Noble Lord's despatch of the 14th of July assign the approaching dissolution of Parliament as a principal reason why Canada could not be attended to. Although not in the sense of that despatch, or as anything like an excuse for his conduct, assuredly the dissolution and its consequences had much to do with that neglect of duty. It called away the minds of men to nearer and dearer objects; fixed their attention upon things that far more nearly touched them, things that came home to their business and bosoms — the preparations for the approaching elections; and the affairs of the remote province, which had at no time engrossed too much of their care, were thought of no more.

Thus, then, my Lords, all is uniform and consistent in these transactions: all is in keeping in the picture which these papers present to the eye. A scene is certainly unfolded not much calculated to raise in our estimation the capacity, the firmness, the vigour, or the statesmanlike habits of those distinguished persons to whose hands has been committed the administration of our affairs. I do not by any means intend to assert that the great qualities of public life may not be discovered in these proceedings. I should be far from saying that both deliberation and despatch may not be traced in their conduct; — deliberation amounting even to balancing, and pausing, and delay; — despatch running into rapidity, precipitancy, hurry. You meet with the unhesitating haste, and with the mature reflection; the consulto and the matura facto are both there. But, then, they are at the wrong time, and in the false position: the rapidity presides over the deliberative part — the deliberation is applied to the executive. The head is at fever heat; the hand is paralysed. There is no lack of quickness, but it is in adopting plans fitted to throw the country into a flame; no lack of delay, at the moment when those schemes are to be carried into execution. They rush unheeding, unhesitating, unreflecting, into resolutions, upon which the wisest and readiest of mankind could hardly pause and ponder too long. But when all is determined — when every moment's delay is fraught with peril — then comes the uncertainty and irresolution. They never pause until the season has arrived for action, and when all faltering, even for the twinkling of an eye, is fatal; then it is that they relapse into supineness and inaction; look around them, and behind them, and everywhere but before them; and sink into repose, as if all had been accomplished, at the moment when everything remains to be done. If I were to ransack all the records to which I have ever had access, of human conduct in administering great affairs, whether in the annals of our own times, or in the ages that are past, I should in vain look for a more striking illustration of the Swedish Chancellor's famous saying to his son, as he was departing to assist at the congress of statesmen: "I, fili mi, ut videas quantulâ sapientiâ regatur mundus!"

My Lords, I cannot sit down without expressing also my opinion upon the conduct of the other party in this disastrous struggle. Both here, and elsewhere still more, invectives have been lavished with unsparing hand upon those whom the proceedings of the Government first drove to disaffection, and afterwards, by neglect, encouraged to revolt. I will not stoop to protect myself from a charge of being prone to vindicate, still less encourage, men in their resistance to the law, and their breach of the public peace. But while we thus speak of their crimes, and give vent to the angry feelings that these have excited among us, surely it becomes us to reflect that we are blaming men who are not present to defend themselves — condemning men who have no person here to say one word in explanation, or palliation of their conduct; and that while we have before us their adversaries in this country, and the whole statements of their adversaries in the colony, from themselves we have not one single word, spoken or written, to assist us in forming our judgment, or to stay our sentence against them. To any fair and candid, not to say generous nature, I am sure I need not add another word for the purpose of showing how strong is their claim to all forbearance, to every allowance which it is possible for charity to make in scanning their conduct. Then I shall ever hold those deeply responsible who could have made all resistance impossible, by making it hopeless, but who sent out no reinforcements with that design — those who first irritated, and then did not control — who, after goading to insurrection, did nothing to overawe and deter insurgents. And after all, when men so vehemently blame the Canadians, who is it, let me ask, that taught them to revolt? Where — in what country — from what people did they learn the lesson? You exclaim against their revolt — though you have taken their money against their wishes, and set at nought the rights you boasted of having bestowed upon them. You enumerate their other comforts — that they pay few taxes — receive large aids from this country — enjoy precious commercial advantages for which we pay dear — and then you say, the whole dispute for which they have rebelled is about the taking of twenty thousand pounds without the consent of their representatives! Twenty thousand pounds taken without their consent! Why, it was for twenty shillings thus taken that Hampden resisted — and by his resistance won for himself an imperishable name, which the Plantagenets and the Guelphs would give all the blood that swells their veins to boast of! If to resist oppression — if to rise against usurped power, and defend our liberties when assaulted, be a crime — who are the greatest of all criminals? Who but ourselves, the English people? We it is that have set the example to our American brethren. Let us beware how we blame them too harshly for following it! My Lords, I throw out these things with no view of merely giving offence in any quarter — I do so with a better object — an object of all others the dearest to my heart at this moment, — to prevent, by this palliating reflection, the shedding of one drop of blood, beyond what self-defence and the lowest demands of justice administered in mercy, require — to warn those into whose hands the sword is committed, that they have a care how they keep it unsheathed one instant after the pike of the rebel has been thrown away!

My Lords, the speech of my Noble Friend would now carry me after him into a wide field — the consideration of the new system which is to be proposed for governing the colony. Upon that ground I decline entering at present; but the general aspect of it demands a single remark. The constitution is to be suspended for three years, and a Governor is to rule with absolute power; and yet, all the while the boast is, that the insurrection has been partial — that only a single county of the whole eight has taken any share in it — and that all the rest of the community are loyal and well-affected! Then, I ask, why are the loyal and well-affected, because they have put down the partial revolt, to be punished for the offences of others, and to lose, not only the privileges which you gave them in 1831, but the constitution which Mr. Pitt gave them forty years before? This may be vigour — it is certainly not justice. It looks like an awkward and preposterous attempt to supply, at this late hour, the total want of activity which has prevailed throughout the whole conduct of Government, by an excess of action — by a morbid vigour that can work nothing but mischief to all. It is a proceeding wholly repugnant to all ideas of justice, and contrary to common sense. Only see how utterly this measure is inconsistent with the rest of my Noble Friend's defence. When you ask why no force was despatched to secure the peace of the colony — you are told it was quite unnecessary — the people were all so loyal that the peace was in no peril, and sending troops would only have been offering a groundless insult by suspecting their zeal and devotion. But when it is thought desirable to destroy the free constitution, and put a pure despotism in its place — straightway it is found out that the whole mass of the population is disaffected, and can no longer be intrusted with political rights. The rebellious spirit shifts and changes — contracts and expands — just as it suits the purpose of the argument. Now, it is confined to a single county — pent up in a corner of the settlement — bounded by the river Richelieu. This is when the Ministers are charged with having left the colony to its own resources. Presently the new plan of arbitrary government is on the carpet, and immediately the revolt spreads in all directions — spurns the bounds of rivers and mountains — diffuses itself over the whole country — and taints the mass of the inhabitants. My Lords, I care not which way the question is put, but it is a question that must be answered before these Ministers can compass both their objects, of defending their past conduct and obtaining new powers. The dilemma is now complete and perfect. If the colony was in such a state as to justify this arbitrary Bill, why did you leave it without a force? If the colony was in such a state as justified you in withholding reinforcements, what pretence have you for disturbing its peace, and inflicting upon it a despotic government? Answer me these questions. One answer will suffice for both. But I believe for that answer I shall wait for ever, and in vain.

But, then, it seems that this despotic constitution is only to be the forerunner of some other arrangement. Whether the Noble Lord had himself formed a very clear and precise idea of that ulterior measure, I am unable to say with confidence; but this I know, that his explanation of it left me without the power of comprehending it with any distinctness; and what I could comprehend, seemed absurd in the extreme. Of all established constitutions we are bound to speak with some respect, more or less; they have been tried, and at least been found to answer some of the purposes for which they were designed. But a wholly new and untried scheme is entitled to no respect at all beyond what its intrinsic merits claim; and as far as this scheme is comprehensible, it appears eminently ridiculous. A certain number of persons, we are told, are to be called by the Governor to his aid as councillors, but how they are to be selected, and what powers they are to have, we are not informed. Is the Governor to summon whom he pleases? Then he gives no share whatever in the deliberations to the people; and for the purpose of conciliation, or indeed, of learning the public opinion, the proceeding is utterly nugatory. Is he to choose the districts, and leave the electors there to send representatives? But still it is a packed assembly, and no voice is given to the bulk of the community. Is he then to issue writs generally — only requiring ten councillors, instead of ninety representatives, to be elected for his helpmates? But when the whole country is unanimously of one opinion, this plan can have no other effect than to bring together a Parliament composed exactly like the present, only fewer in number, and under a different name. It is plain that, in one way or another, the intention must be, that the people shall not elect freely, as they now do, else a Parliament precisely like the disaffected one will be returned; and that those elected shall have no power to act, unless they do as they are bid, otherwise the Government will be in the precise difficulty which now oppresses it. But if any such semblance only of consulting the people is all you mean to give — if under the pretence of calling them to your aid, you exclude all the men of their choice, and only take counsel with creatures of your own — I tell you fairly that such an intolerable mockery will avail you nothing. Better proclaim at once a despotism, without any disguise, or any mitigation. Make the Governor supreme. Let him rule without advice, or even instruction — in his own name, and not in the name of the law — for your interest, and not for that of the colonial people.

But, my Lords, I have said that I should at present forbear to pursue in detail the subject which we shall hereafter have ample opportunities of discussing at large. Neither will I go into the particulars of the civil war that has so lamentably been kindled. I have mentioned that there is reason for hoping its disasters have already reached their term. I hope, most devoutly hope, it may be so. No thanks to the Government,—the colonists themselves, left wholly to their own resources and their own zeal, are supposed to have quelled the insurrection and restored peace. But what kind of a possession is that which must be kept by force of arms? Are we not here reminded of Mr. Burke's observation upon the too parallel case of America? Here, however, I must, in passing, express my astonishment at finding the address now moved, to be so nearly copied from that of 1775 — after the peremptory denial of my Noble Friend (Lord Melbourne), when I the other night said I supposed it would turn out to be so. Really, though he is but a novice in office, he made the denial with a readiness and a glibness that might have done honour to those inveterate habits of official assertion, only acquired by the few who are born in Whitehall and bred in Downing Street. And yet, when we look at it, we find it the same address with that of 1775, to the very order of the topics — all but one passage, which is of necessity omitted here, because I defy the utmost courage of official assertors to have reproached the Canadians as my Noble Friend's predecessor Lord North did the Americans, with making an ungrateful return to the tenderness shown by Parliament towards the principles of the English law and the English Constitution. The authors of the eighth resolution were not, I presume, capable of setting their hands to such a boast as this. In all other respects the two addresses are identical. — May the omen not prove inauspicious, and may the likeness end here!

But I was drawn aside from the just remark of Mr. Burke, which I was about to cite. The rebels, said he, may be put down, but conquering is not governing, and a province which, to be retained, must be always subdued, is little worth keeping. My Lords, I may truly say the same of Canada. The revolt may be suppressed; I hope it is suppressed already, and that the blood of our American brethren has ceased to flow. But the difficulty of the case is only then beginning. Then comes the time to try the statesman — the far more delicate question then arises — and the more important — demanding infinitely greater circumspection and foresight, wisdom and judgment, than how a rebellion may be suppressed — I mean the question, how a distant province may be well governed — a disaffected people reclaimed — and the maintenance of your empire reconciled with the interests of your subjects? The scheme of polity for accomplishing this great and worthy purpose, must be well matured before it is adopted, and when once adopted, must be executed with vigour; all pausing and faltering must then be ended. I would fain hope that the Ministers have been taught a lesson by the past, and that henceforth they will deliberate at the season of proposing measures, and act when the period for executing them arrives. But if I am called upon to pronounce, whether or not the authors of these despatches, the propounders of last year's resolutions, — they who followed up their own policy with no one act of vigour, and accompanied it with no indication of foresight — they who embarked in a course avowedly harsh and irritating, without taking a single precaution to prevent or frustrate resistance, and, at the instant when their measures required to be prosecuted with effect, suddenly deserted them — if I am to decide whether or not they are the men endowed with the statesmanlike capacity to meet the difficulties of so arduous an occasion, — I, too, must falter and pause before I give an affirmative answer. To quell an insurrection, asks but ordinary resources and every day talents; a military power — often a police force — may subdue it, and may bridle for a season the disaffected spirit. The real test of the statesman's sagacity and vigour is applied when tranquillity is for a while restored. My Lords, painful as the avowal is, their conduct throughout these sad affairs has wrung it from me — I must pause before I can pronounce these men fit for the emergency which is fast approaching, if it have not already come.

But let it not all the while be supposed that when I dwell upon the greatness of the occasion, it is from setting any high value upon such a possession as Canada. The crisis is great, and the position difficult, on the assumption that you will resolve to keep hold of it, whether in prudence you ought or not, and will be for making sacrifices to retain it, of which I hold it altogether unworthy. Not only do I consider the possession as worth no breach of the constitution — no violation of the principles of justice — (Good God! what possession can ever be of a value to justify a price like that!) — but in a national view, I really hold those colonies to be worth nothing. The only interest we have in the matter concerns the mode in which a separation, sooner or later inevitable, shall take place. The only question worth considering, as far as our national interest is concerned, is whether that separation shall be effected amicably or with hostile feelings — unless in so far as the honour of the country is involved. But I am not so romantic as to suppose that any nation will ever be willing to give up an extended dominion, how unprofitable, nay, how burthensome soever it may be to hold it. Such possessions, above all, are not likely to be surrendered to dictation and force. The feelings of national pride and honour are averse to yielding in these circumstances; but I do venture to hope, that when all feelings of pride and honour are saved — when resentment and passion have cooled — when the wrong doers on either side are forgiven — when the reign of law is restored; that justice will be tempered with mercy, the foundation for an amicable separation laid, and an estimate calmly made of the profit and the loss which result from our North American dominions. I am well assured that we shall then find them very little worth the cost they have entailed on us, in men, in money, and in injuries to our trade; nay, that their separation will be even now a positive gain, so it be but effected on friendly terms, and succeeded by an amicable intercourse. The government and defence of Canada alone, costs us considerably more than half a million a-year; independent of the million and a half which we have expended on the Rideau canal, and between two and three millions on fortifications, uselessly spent. I speak on the authority of a Minister of the Crown, who has recorded his opinion of the burthen we sustain in holding such possessions.

LORD GLENELG. — Who?

LORD BROUGHAM. — The Paymaster of the Forces (Sir H. Parnell). But beside all this, we have to pay 55s. duty on the excellent timber of the Baltic, in order that we may be compelled to use the bad timber of Canada at a higher price, on a 10s. duty. The severance of the colony would not only open our markets to the better and cheaper commodity which grows near our own doors, but would open the Baltic markets to our manufactures, restrained as they now are in their export to the north of Europe, by the want of any commodities which we can take in return. Their produce is grain and timber, and our corn laws, for the benefit of the landed interest, shut out the one, while our colonial laws, for the benefit of the planters, exclude the other. Is it not then full time that we should make up our minds to a separation so beneficial to all parties, if it shall only take place amicably, and by uniting together the whole of our North American possessions, form an independent, flourishing, and powerful state, which may balance the colossal empire of the West? These, my Lords, are not opinions to which I have lately come; they are the growth of many a long year, and the fruit of much attention given to the subject. Of this I am intimately persuaded, that it is of paramount importance to take care how the change shall be consummated. If the severance be effected by violence — if the member be rudely torn away and bleeding from the body of our empire — a wound is left on either side to rankle and irritate and annoy for generations to come. Hence a perennial source of national enmity, the fruitful cause of commercial embarrassments, and of every kind of discontent and animosity, not only between the countries, but among the different classes and parties of each. There is no evil against which it better becomes us anxiously to guard. All expedients should be tried to render the severance kindly and gentle — every thing resorted to that can pour balm into the wound occasioned by the operation. This is the most sacred duty of every wise and virtuous statesman. Lowering as the aspect of affairs now appears, my hope still is that those who are intrusted with the government, be they who they may, will bestir themselves, with these views, for this purpose; and, while it is yet time, seek above all things to heal the injuries which imprudence and rashness, complicated with imbecility and vacillation, have inflicted, so as to give us, not outward peace only, but real concord and friendship, without which the wound is but skinned over, and peace must be precarious and only a name. But, to give real peace and concord, the wrongs complained of must be redressed, and I fairly tell you that the master grievance must not be suffered to remain. All Canada cries out for an elective council. Refuse it you cannot. The complaint against its present constitution is like that some time ago urged against this House.

A NOBLE LORD. — That is not a judicious allusion.

Will my Noble Friend, whose eagle-eye can pierce through the darkness of a statement barely commenced, and catch its application to an argument not yet broached, suspend his sentence of condemnation till he hears whether the allusion be indeed judicious or no? I was stating that language more severe had not been used towards the Legislative Council in the province, than I have often heard employed in this place against this Legislative Council of the parent state. But there is a wide difference, my Lords, between the two cases, and upon that difference rests the application of my present appeal, so prematurely judged of by my Noble Friend. First,—whereas only an inconsiderable fraction of the people of England have demanded a reform in the constitution of this House, and even they have not persevered in the demand, all the Canadian people with one voice have called aloud and vehemently for a change in their Upper House, and have never for one instant, in any circumstances, abated one jot of the vehemence with which they universally urged that demand. Next,—we never have been rationally, or even intelligibly informed in what way the reform of this House could be effected, without the overthrow of our mixed monarchy; whereas the change proposed in the colonial council has always been distinctly stated, and accords with the whole principles and frame of the political constitutions all over the New World. Lastly and chiefly, the charge made against your Lordships of refusing the measures which the other House send up, rests upon a very narrow foundation indeed, compared with the sweeping accusation brought against you. You altered some Bills, for the worse, as I think; you mended others, changing them for the better; one or two you wholly rejected in one or two Sessions; whereas the council in Canada refused Bills of all kinds by wholesale, rejected scores of the most important measures upon all subjects indiscriminately;—Bills upon Government — education — administration of justice — trade — retrenchment — reform of all abuses — all shared the same fate. Trust me, my Lords, if you had been so ill-advised as to pursue a course like that, there would a very different cry have arisen for peerage reform from any thing you have ever yet heard. With all the difficulty of forming a plan for it, the demand of some change would have become general, if not universal. Instead of a feeble cry, proceeding for a little while from a small portion of the country, all England would have vehemently persevered in the demand of reform. The wisdom of your Lordships prevented this. The conduct of the Upper House in Canada was the very reverse; and when the people had nothing to hope from its present structure, no wonder that the demand for its change became loud, vehement, universal, — but much wonder if in a cause so just, it should not in the end prove irresistible! In vain, believe me, do you send out new governors with larger powers! In vain you commission my Noble Friend to carry out the force of a despotic government, if he is not also armed with force to redress the master grievance! With every disposition to trust his ability and his temper, the work of reconcilement never can flourish under his hands, if they be not strengthened to do it by the only power which can avail; if they are strong only to inflict new wounds, and impotent to bestow the boon of justice and redress. I shall most deeply deplore his undertaking such a mission, if he goes thus cramped and fettered. If he is only to carry out the most unconstitutional, the most oppressive Act that has crossed the Atlantic since the fatal Bill of Massachusetts Bay, I shall lament it on his account, because he can reap from such a service no honour; I shall still more bitterly deplore it for the country's sake, which can derive nothing but disgrace from such a course; for the sake of the first of all blessings, the public peace, which will never be permanently secured by acts of unmitigated injustice!

But once more let me beseech you to resolve that you will abide by the course of justice — grant liberally — improve fearlessly — reform unflinchingly, whatever the Canadian people is entitled to demand that you should grant — improve — reform. By none other measures can either right be done by the parent state to its American subjects, or the character of England be sustained; by no other course can the honour of the Crown, the character of the Parliament, above all the peace of the New World be restored, or the peace of the Old maintained!

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I could have wished, before I addressed the House on this subject, that some other Noble Peer, who took a different view of the question from the Noble Lord who has just resumed his seat, had risen. Even amidst the torrent of invective and sarcasm with which the Noble Lord has overwhelmed the Officers of her Majesty's Government, and that most laboured and most extreme concentration of bitterness which has been poured forth on this occasion, I have not, however, discovered that he entertains any decided disapprobation of the present motion, and I apprehend that I may fairly take it for granted that no such disapprobation will be expressed; and I trust that I may expect from no Noble Peer any view to be taken very different from that of the Noble Lord. The Noble Lord, towards the conclusion of his speech, said that he faltered, he hesitated, he paused, before he could pronounce it to be his opinion that the present Ministers had shown themselves to be fitted to act in this important affair, with the management of which they are entrusted. Now, considering the introductory part of the speech of the Noble Lord, I do not see why he should falter; I rather think that his doing so savours in some degree of that vacillation which he has alluded to as having characterised the conduct of Ministers: and I do not see with what consistency the Noble Lord, entertaining the opinions which he has expressed, can excuse himself from making some motion to this House declaratory of his want of confidence in the Government. However he may falter in respect to his judgment of Ministers, I do not falter with regard to this expression of my opinion in reference to his speech.

The Noble Lord has taken a very large discursive view, not only of the question now immediately before the House, but also of the measures which have preceded it, and which have led to the present state of affairs, and of all the topics which have reference or allusion to this most important subject. He is aware of all the measures (and was a party to many of them) which have led to the state of things that unfortunately at this moment exists in Lower Canada. It is of course impossible to view the present state of Canada, otherwise than as one deeply to be lamented. Whether it has arisen from the natural course of events, beyond the control of any Government, or whether measures might have been taken to prevent the present crisis, are questions into which I shall not now enter; but I do feel some satisfaction, and I think all the Officers of Government who have been employed on this question must do the same, that, to whatever cause it may be attributable, it cannot be suggested to have arisen from any want of justice on the part of this country, or from any assertion of rights on our part which did not exist; from any tyrannical or unjust proceedings; but only from the unreasonable and impracticable reforms which are demanded in the Canadian constitution by the House of Assembly. My Noble and Learned Friend has made several observations on the various delays which he conceives have taken place in the correspondence; he has also commented on promises which he asserts were held out, and which have never been fulfilled; and he has also remarked on the long interval which has elapsed between one letter and another; but I must say, that he does not appear to me to have made out his case upon that point. It is not sufficient for him to assert that promises have been made; it is not sufficient for him to say that there was a long interval without any despatch; but he must prove, also, that it was necessary to write something during that interval; he must prove that something beneficial to the service must have accrued from sending out further instructions; and he must prove, also, that there has been some neglect prejudicial to the colony, and injurious to the public service; and he has failed in such proof.

The Noble and Learned Lord has indeed said, that there have been some laches and some neglect which have had a prejudicial effect, and have been the real cause of the outbreak; but I confess, my Lords, that I cannot recollect throughout the whole of that Noble Lord's able but discursive speech one single endeavour to bring his assertion to the test. Now, I beg to call the attention of your Lordships to an extract from the despatch of my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) to Lord Gosford, dated the 29th of April, 1837, in which he informed him that the resolutions (transmitted in a despatch of the previous month) had been agreed to by the House of Commons. He says,—

> I regret that, owing to the delay which has occurred in passing the resolutions, arising, in a great measure, from the pressure of public business, I have been compelled to withhold these instructions for a longer period than I anticipated, but your Lordship may rely upon receiving them in ample time to enable you to prepare for the meeting of the Legislature; whether that meeting should be postponed until the time when the law will require that a session shall be held, or should be fixed for an earlier time, in a question which must depend, to a certain degree, on local circumstances, of which your Lordship will have the means of obtaining a far more accurate acquaintance than I can.

What is the fair meaning of this passage, but that with respect to the time of calling together the local legislature the Governor was better acquainted with the circumstances which must regulate the period than any one here could be, and that my Noble Friend would not, in opposition to the Governor's opinion, venture to give an opinion? Was not this the proper course to be taken, and was it not in accordance with common ground of the substance of the measure itself. I say, my Lords, that the Sovereign ought to originate any measure which relates to war; and I was particularly anxious that this proceeding should originate from a message from the Crown, on the very grounds, and for the very reasons, which have been so ably referred to by the Noble Viscount, in the last moments of his address to your Lordships. I was anxious that her Majesty should declare herself, positively, on this subject, in order that there might be no doubt in this country, or throughout Europe, of the determination of her Majesty to assert her right of sovereignty; that the Government should expressly declare its feelings on this subject, and that the country should understand that the sovereignty of the Crown was to be maintained at all events. I was the more anxious upon this subject, my Lords, because, in the different discussions upon this subject, more than one Minister of the Crown has stated that the measures about to be adopted are not to be promoted with the view of supporting the authority of the Crown, — not with the view of vindicating the law, — but, to protect a party in the colonies which has adhered to and supported her Majesty's Government. I cannot think, my Lords, that this is the proper ground to take; but I conceive that, for the sake of her Majesty, for the sake of the public interest, and for the sake of the colonies themselves, we ought to have assumed the highest ground. I am quite satisfied, however, with the explanation of the Noble Viscount on this part of the subject; and I state my feelings now, not with the view of imputing blame, — for I am sure that, if the Noble Viscount, had adverted to the considerations which I have advanced, he would have adopted another course more consistent with every precedent relating to America, relating to Ireland, and to every other part of the empire. With regard to the address itself, I must observe, that, though to some parts I give my full acquiescence, yet I must beg leave to guard myself against making myself a party to any portion of these transactions, either with respect to the suspension of the constitution of 1791, or to any other specific proceeding, till I see the measure which the Noble Viscount means to bring forward.

I have, my Lords, thoroughly considered this question, for I had the misfortune to differ from many other Noble Lords, and was almost the only individual who, in 1831, voted against the propositions of my Noble Friend near me, then the Secretary for the Colonies (Earl of Ripon). I believe that another Noble Lord also opposed the Bill. But I only signed a protest against it; because I thought then, as I think still, that it was a most unfortunate measure. My opinion at that time was, that the Bill ought to have contained a clause providing for its repeal, in case provision were not made by the House of Assembly in Canada for granting a Civil List, and that provision were not made by them to enable the King to maintain the civil government; and I believe that the omission of such a clause is the cause of all that has happened from that time to the present. I differ entirely from the Noble and Learned Lord in thinking that the Act of 1831 established the British constitution in Canada; for it is not consistent with the British constitution to leave the civil government of the country, — and especially to leave the judges of the land, — to be provided for by an annual vote of the Parliament. I say, my Lords, that the British constitution, for the last 150 years at least, has made a fixed, and not uncertain provision for supporting the dignity of the Crown, for meeting the expenses attendant on the administration of the civil government, and most particularly for the independence of the judges of the land. But is that the state of things in Lower Canada? No. I maintain that the Act of 1831 did not establish the British constitution in the colonies of Upper and Lower Canada, but something quite distinct; — for it gave to the people a popular representation, which, in my opinion, is the cause of all the disputes that have followed, and of the insurrection which has taken place. It gave individuals the power to create prejudices in the minds of the people, to weaken the loyalty of the Canadians, and to raise them in hostility against her Majesty's crown and government. And what has been the object of these individuals in the course which they have pursued? They have supposed that, by creating dissatisfaction amongst the people, they could thereby throw off the authority of the Crown; and, by gathering the people around them, overturn the government established in the colony. Such have been the objects of those individuals who have been seen running off to the neighbouring territories of the United States, as soon as they found their own persons exposed to danger. This turned out to be the real state of the case; for the would-be leaders left the unfortunate people in a state of rebellion against her Majesty's government, and ran off, themselves, letting the unlucky inhabitants return to their houses as best they could; and forcing them to submit, with the best grace they might, to the mercy of her Majesty's Government. I warned the Noble Lord against endangering the establishments of the country, by giving anything like an authority to a popular assembly to withhold the funds necessary for carrying on the civil government; for nothing is more needful to a country than to uphold the civil power, and the independence — as well pecuniary as political — of the judges of the land. And let Noble Lords learn, from the events in Canada and our other dominions in North America, what it is to hold forth what are called "popular rights," but which are not popular rights either here or elsewhere; and what occasion is thereby given to the perpetuation of a system of agitation which ends in insurrection and rebellion, and the coming to blows with her Majesty's troops.

It is not my intention to follow the Noble and Learned Lord or the Noble Viscount through a long discussion as to the contents of the papers now on your Lordships' table. I certainly have learned, from a perusal of these papers, that the Noble Lords opposite did not think it proper to send a reinforcement to the troops in Canada in the course of the last summer; and I must do the Noble Lords the justice to say, that I cannot blame them for not having taken more active measures: for I happen to know several persons,—and particularly officers —well acquainted with the provinces, and who have been concerned in their government, and I may safely assert, in my place in Parliament, that I have received the opinions of those officers that there was not the smallest reason to apprehend anything like insurrection in Lower Canada. I do not doubt that her Majesty's Government may have received the same information; and Lord Gosford, in his despatches, admits that he did not fear an insurrection up to a very late period; and I may add, that I believe the same opinion to have been entertained by the general commanding in chief in that colony. But, at the same time, I must say, that although I can impute no blame to the Noble Lords for not having sent out more troops to Canada, at an earlier period of the year, yet it does appear that, at one period of the year, I think in October, ——

A NOBLE LORD. — No, March.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.— The Secretary of State for the Colonies thought it right to authorise the Governor of Canada, and the general commanding in chief, to send to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and move the troops from those places into Canada; and I cannot understand why the Noble Lord, when he gave those instructions, especially if he thought that they would be carried into execution, did not despatch fresh troops to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to fill up the vacancies which would have been occasioned if Lord Gosford or Sir John Colborne had called for the troops already there. I do not, therefore, think that the not sending out of troops to the Canadas is the most pressing point of the case; but I conceive that the point which does most press is the not sending out of troops to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to supply the vacancies there. One consequence would have been, that all those colonies would have remained amply provided with troops; but another, still more important, this;—that the world would have seen, and this country especially would have been convinced of, the determination of her Majesty's Government to maintain the ground which they had taken in the resolutions of last year relative to Lower Canada — that they were determined to maintain the dominion of this country, to support those who were willing to support us, to preserve inviolate the authority of the Government, and to uphold the due execution of the law. I will not advert to what has been said by a Noble Lord, in the course of this evening, with regard to the separation of the Canadian colonies from this country. The answer which has been given by the Noble Viscount upon that subject is quite satisfactory to me. I will, however, allude, in one word only, to that part of the Noble Lord's speech. I confess, my Lords, that I have a feeling for the honour of my country, and I cannot but believe that if, by any misfortune, we should fail in restoring peace in Lower Canada, at an early period of time, we shall receive a blow, with respect to our military character, to our reputation, and to our honour, of which it will require years to enable us to remove the effects.

My Lords, there is one topic which has been adverted to by the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham) upon which I think it necessary to say a word, although it is not alluded to in the address, and will more properly form a subject of the discussion on the Bill which is to be brought in upon some future day, —and that is the establishment in Lower Canada of an elective legislative council. The Noble and Learned Lord, with all his knowledge of Lower Canada, has not, in my opinion, sufficiently adverted to the fact of the difference of the two races of inhabitants in that country. My Lords, it may be easy to talk, here, of establishing an elective council, but if the Noble and Learned Lord will look into the discussions which have taken place upon that subject, and to the opinions that have been delivered upon it by the different parties in that colony, he will find that British inhabitants are to the full as much opposed to that arrangement, as the French are in favour of it: he will find that, in point of fact, they would be in a state of insurrection against that arrangement, in the same degree as the French are now supposed to be in a state of insurrection in favour of an elective legislative council. I will likewise beg the Noble and Learned Lord, and I would entreat the Noble Viscount opposite, and every member of her Majesty's Government, to attend to this fact, that an elective legislative council is not the constitution of the British monarchy; that a legislative council appointed by the Monarch is the constitution of this country; that this was so stated in the discussions upon the Bill passed in the year 1791, by all the great authorities who discussed that measure, amongst others by Mr. Fox himself. That gentleman said, "that a legislative council, appointed by the Monarch, is an essential part of the British constitution."

Under these circumstances, I entreat the Noble Viscount, and every other Noble Lord, not to lose sight of that fact in the arrangement which they may be prepared to adopt. Let them not flatter themselves that they will satisfy all the inhabitants of Lower Canada by admitting the principle proposed by the French inhabitants of that colony, and most strongly urged by the Noble and Learned Lord, in the course of the present discussion. My Lords, it has been my wish to avoid making any remarks upon any of the subjects which are likely to become matters of discussion upon the Bill to be introduced on a future occasion. I have adverted, only, to what I consider to have been the most prominent parts of the Noble and Learned Lord's speech. I wish, my Lords, to support the address, and certainly to support the Government in any measure they may think proper to adopt, in respect and in consequence of this address, in order to bring the contest which has now commenced between this country and Lower Canada to a speedy termination,—and to effect an honourable and a firm settlement of this unfortunate question.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I beg just to say one word in explanation. I stated that the Bill of 1881 left an option with the people of Canada.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—What I said was, that this country provided for the independence of the judges; and I contended that the Act of 1791 was more analogous to the constitution of this country than that which was formed by the Act of 1831.

The EARL of RIPON.—I wish to offer some explanation on the point to which my Noble Friend (the Duke of Wellington) has referred, namely, the situation in which the Act of 1831 has placed the Government of this country with respect to the civil government of Lower Canada. It is perfectly true, that when I proposed the introduction of that Act, the Noble Duke opposed it, and said I should find, in point of fact, that the legislature of Lower Canada would readily take the boon which that Bill gave them, but would not establish any Civil List in return. The Noble Duke certainly prophesied that; and, unquestionably, the Noble Duke's prophecy has turned out to be true. I admit that, on that occasion, I acted, more or less, under the influence of an imprudent confidence, and under what I conceived to be a pledge on the part of the House of Assembly in Lower Canada, that they would not take the advantages to be afforded to them by that Act of the Imperial Parliament without making a reciprocal concession. And what was the ground on which I founded this confidence? Not only the repeated assurance on their part that they would not do so;—(I do not mean to say that, in so many precise words they gave that pledge; but, taking men's meaning as to the course of conduct they would pursue from the language they use, no man of honour and honesty, after reading the resolutions and addresses adopted by the House of Assembly from time to time, could doubt that they should lead the Government at once to believe that when the royal revenues should be given to their control, they would, in return, provide a Civil List.) Not only had I this ground for entertaining that feeling of confidence in them, but I had another reason for believing that they would keep good faith with the Government, which was this,—that the province of Upper Canada, which also has had its grievances, at least, as long and as fully as Lower Canada, did give a Civil List; and what is the fact?

That, at this moment, the province of Upper Canada is in the enjoyment of its share of the royal revenues; and that the governor, the secretaries, and the judges of that province are also in the enjoyment, for ever, of an independent income, not controllable by an annual vote of the House of Assembly. The House of Assembly of Upper Canada performed their promise; but the House of Assembly of Lower Canada did not: and that is the reason why this country has been involved in all those enormous difficulties that at present exist, and out of which I confess I am not sanguine enough to say that I can clearly see how we are to escape. But I ought also to add, with respect to the situation in which the Government stands at this moment in Lower Canada, that it is not without resources out of which the governor and judges, and those persons whom successive Governments have believed to be proper objects of an independent provision, can be paid; because the Government have the whole of the territorial and casual revenue, and they have, also, 10,000*l.* a-year voted permanently by the Legislature of Lower Canada itself by two separate Acts since 1791; so that my Noble and Learned Friend is somewhat mistaken if he thinks that the Legislature of Lower Canada never had any power over the purse before the Bill of 1831.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Not a complete control.

The EARL of RIPON. — No, not complete, certainly, because there were still those two resources of which I have spoken. But, in point of fact, subsequently to 1791, the Legislature of Lower Canada passed two laws, giving to the Government two sums of 5000*l.* annually, for ever, for the purpose of maintaining the civil government in that colony. Those two sums, together with the revenues I have mentioned, would amount to not much less than 28,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* a-year. Although I admit that that sum is not sufficient to pay all the expenses which used to be defrayed, either out of the funds at the disposal of the Government, or out of the grants made by Parliament; yet, so far as regards those particular individuals, the maintenance of whose independence in their offices is considered essential, the Government unquestionably possesses the power even yet to pay them. With respect to the proposed address, I entirely concur in what has fallen from my Noble Friend (the Duke of Wellington). I do not feel any disposition to canvass it, or to object to its adoption; but I must beg to guard myself against being supposed to express any opinion whatever as to the scheme intended for the future, or as to the attempt to be made for the settlement of this question. I confess I know very little about it; for my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) has not explained it very fully. Perhaps, indeed, he did not consider himself called upon to go very fully into it. I shall therefore abstain from expressing even the slightest shadow of an opinion upon that part of the subject. I cannot, however, give my acquiescence to this address without expressly guarding myself as to another point involved in this debate, that such acquiescence on my part by no means implies any approbation of the course that has been pursued during the last nine months. I am sorry to say anything unpleasant of my Noble Friend and his colleagues, but I cannot bring myself to think that they have managed this question in a judicious or satisfactory manner. I admire the candour of the Noble Viscount at the head of her Majesty's Government, because he has stated, in a perfectly fair and manly manner, the matter about the troops, and has admitted that there is a great deal to be said on both sides; and he certainly does not appear to take any very strong ground to justify the course that has been pursued by the Government in respect to this branch of the question. For myself, I think that that course has been a most unfortunate one, and has very much contributed to occasion that explosion which has taken place in Lower Canada, and which involves the necessity of those measures that are now suggested. It is evident that it is the intention of the Government now to send out troops to Canada. That intention was communicated by my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) to Lord Gosford on the 6th of March, 1837. Well, on the 22d of March my Noble Friend again wrote to Lord Gosford, and said:—"Since I made my communication (of the 6th) to you, I have ascertained that it would not be possible to detach such a force without extreme inconvenience, and making a demonstration which might be productive of much greater evil than it could prevent;" and then my Noble Friend suggested that, in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, there were between 2000 and 3000 men who, in case of need, might be drawn from those provinces.

Now, it has been stated by my Noble Friend (the Duke of Wellington), that it might be proper to give power to remove those troops, but that he could not conceive a more obvious policy than that of filling up the vacancy which the removal of those troops would create. But to what is this inconvenient pressure, of which my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) speaks, to be attributed? I find that Lord Gosford, when writing on the 10th of June, not long after he received the second letter of my Noble Friend, in which he said there were particular reasons against sending out additional troops, stated—that he had sent to Sir Colin Campbell for a part of the troops stationed at Halifax; adding, however, this passage:—"I must repeat that these steps would not be dictated by the apprehension of any serious commotion, for I have every reason to believe that the mass of the Canadians are loyal and contented; but from the persuasion that the presence of a large military force in this province might of itself"—do what? Increase the difficulties already existing? Increase the chances of the disaffected succeeding? Make the Government of Lower Canada less able to promote tranquillity? Not at all; but that it would "prevent the occurrence of any disturbance by deterring the ill-disposed, securing the wavering, and giving confidence to the timid." Why, if the state of Lower Canada was such that the presence of additional troops was wanting there, because there were ill-disposed persons to be deterred, wavering persons to be secured, and timid persons to whom confidence was to be given, ought not this to have led the Government to infer that the state of the province was such that it was not safe to leave it without having some power capable of overwhelming the very first attempt that might be made to disturb the peace, and thus prevent those lamentable consequences of an insurrection which, whether successful or not, was certain to occur? As time rolled on, the necessity of such a course appears to have been constantly increasing. My Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg), indeed, in his despatches alludes to this fact himself, and describes the rapid progress of a disposition on the part of a portion of the people to revolt; but it does not appear that the necessity of increasing the number of troops in the colony had at all crossed his mind. In consequence of no additional troops having been sent out Sir John Colborne was at length compelled to draw every soldier from the Upper province, in order to maintain his ground in the Lower province. It is true that Sir Francis Head, with the gallant spirit of an English soldier, took great credit to himself for volunteering to send away "all" the troops from Upper Canada, and he seems to think that it is a great thing in point of policy to show that the people of that province did not require the presence of any troops for the purpose of holding them to their allegiance, and to show also that there was no danger in that part of the country of a revolt. But the Gallant Officer was in error: that danger did exist. A Mr. Mackenzie, who has been so often spoken of, brought men together, and there was an actual turning out. Now it was impossible that he could have got together 500 or 600 persons to make an attack upon the city of Toronto—(though he was madman enough to do almost anything, for he is certainly the most absurd man that ever existed)—if any British soldiers had been there. But they were all gone, in order to put an end to the revolt in the Lower province, while the Upper province was left to take its chance. It turned out that Mr. Mackenzie was beaten, and fled to the United States, where he is amusing himself in all possible ways to stir up the people to aid the revolt, but where, as it is not likely he can be got hold of, he will no doubt long remain. What does all this show? That proper precautions had not been taken by the Government. No such disturbance could have happened in Upper Canada if Sir F. Head had not felt it to be his duty, for want of a sufficient force in Lower Canada, to deprive himself of the assistance of his own troops.

There is another point to which I will shortly advert. In the Upper province Sir F. Head relied much upon the militia in maintaining order. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the militia was also relied upon to maintain tranquillity; but this was not found to be the case in Lower Canada. Lord Gosford felt himself called upon to dismiss a great number of the officers of the militia, and among others the great agitator, or whatever he is called, M. Papineau, who happens to be a militia officer: and I think it is a very doubtful thing whether Lord Gosford would have considered it prudent to have called out the militia on his own authority, in order to act with the King's troops.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—He would not be justified by the law of the colony in calling for their assistance, unless in a case of actual foreign invasion.

The EARL of RIPON.—The Noble Viscount opposite says that, according to the existing colonial laws, Lord Gosford could not call for the assistance of the militia, unless in the case of invasion by an external power. But in my estimation, exactly in proportion as there was a difficulty, either in consequence of the existing state of the law, or of the want of a favourable disposition upon the part of the militia themselves, so was it imperative upon the Government to provide a large military force. For these reasons I cannot help conceiving that this matter has been by no means dealt with in the way in which it ought to be. And although I do not absolutely ascribe the breaking out of the rebellion to the want of troops, no person can surely dispute that, in insurrections of this description, the madness and folly exhibited usually by the people are so great, that they frequently make the most absurd and hopeless attempts to overpower the constituted authorities by open force. In conclusion, therefore, I beg to observe, that if any Government apprehended the possibility, much less the probability, of a revolt — and even the latter it would appear from the despatches that they had every reason to apprehend — it must surely have been their duty to provide the most efficient means for combating any rash attempt which might be made.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I feel it necessary to observe, in reference to the remarks which have fallen from my Noble Friend opposite, upon the subject of the withdrawal of the troops from Upper Canada, that my Noble Friend would have done well to advert to the fact that Sir Francis Head, who has so successfully defeated the machinations of the insurgents in that province, was himself the author of the suggestion that the military should be removed, before any application was made upon the part of Sir J. Colborne; and that, furthermore, Sir Francis Head attached the greatest importance (and was perfectly justified in taking this view, as appeared by the result) to the policy of exhibiting, not only to Canada, but to England and the world, that such was the loyalty of the vast majority of the inhabitants of Upper Canada, such their attachment and close adhesion to the parent state, that without the aid of a single sentinal (for he even sent away the troops which constituted his personal guard) he was able to resist any attempt which might be made upon the seat of government in the Upper province. From the tone of his despatches, I feel confident that Sir Francis Head was rejoiced at the opportunity which their absence afforded of exhibiting that proof of a prevailing spirit, since manifest in the speedy withdrawal of Mackenzie, who is now a fugative in the United States, and unable, even without soldiers to oppose him, to make head for one moment against the loyal inhabitants of Upper Canada. I will not allude to the withdrawal of the troops from Upper Canada and Nova Scotia, except for the purpose of observing that, as my Noble Friend remarked, the question is one which has two sides, and that the side which should be taken in considering it is one which is favourable to her Majesty's Ministers. To make this manifest, little else appears to me to be necessary than to call the attention of your Lordships to the fact that Lord Gosford has held the power of withdrawing the troops from Halifax; and that, enjoying the right of sending for two regiments, he has, in point of fact, judged it expedient to send only for one in the first instance.

After what has fallen in such candid terms from the Noble Duke opposite, who has spoken upon this question in a manner which does him infinite honour, and and in that spirit which he has always consistently displayed in similar circumstances — a spirit of anxiety to yield his cordial support to her Majesty's Government whenever an emergency like this arises—I would not trouble your Lordships with any further observations, were I not anxious to remove an impression which appears to exist in the Noble Duke's mind, and which I believe I shall have little difficulty in convincing him is unjust. The Noble Duke, in reference to the communication made to your Lordships' House upon the subject of the Canadian affairs, has expressed his desire to have seen that communication made in the shape of a message from her Majesty, as a course which would have been more conformable to precedent. It is, no doubt, desirable to adhere to precedents in all cases in which such adhesion is practicable without involving inconvenience. I can most sincerely assure the Noble Duke, that it is not because we are unimpressed with a consciousness of the importance of the occasion upon which we appeal to Parliament for its assistance that the usual precedents have been departed from in this instance, but solely from the circumstance of the occurrence which renders this appeal necessary having happened immediately before an adjournment of both Houses, which it was impossible to avoid, almost every Member having left town, or made preparations for his removal. If a royal message had been delivered at the same period with the former address, it would have been impossible to act on it immediately, and it was solely with a view to give more importance to the question and ensure the attendance of Members that a communication of papers only has been made, in the first instance, to enable Parliament to judge of the contents of these documents, and to assure her Majesty of their co-operation at the earliest possible period after our re-assembling. The Noble Duke has expressed himself satisfied with the declarations of my Noble Friend near me (Viscount Melbourne); but he has at the same time expressed his regret that symptoms have been, on a former occasion, exhibited by her Majesty's Government of the absence of a strenuous desire to support the Queen's authority in Lower Canada. Upon this I can only observe, that great and bounden as is the duty of Government to give a decided support to her Majesty's loyal subjects in that province, who, I firmly believe, will be ultimately found to constitute the majority, I believe it will be also admitted, upon the part of Parliament, that our first duty in the present instance is to re-establish her Majesty's authority in that colony. Whatever may be the result of these discussions, in which we have been so long engaged, and in which we are about to become re-engaged with the Canadians, — whether they terminate in the re-establishment of the former constitution or in the concession of a new one, or, unfortunately for the Canadians, and prejudicially for the interests of this country, in separation — though this is a result which I see no reason to apprehend — it is clearly essential to the character of this country that her Majesty's authority should be in the first instance established through the agency of that Nobleman who, fortunately for himself, I hope, and fortunately for the country, has consented to undertake this delicate service.

But the question relating to the constitution of these colonies is one which cannot be safely mooted, until, the authority of the Government and the laws having been restored, the discussion can be entered on legally, soberly, and tranquilly, with due attention, and in the proper spirit. I am firmly impressed with the conviction which I have before taken occasion to express, that the vast majority of the population of Canada is attached to the Government of this country; and, for my part, I do not regret that any symptoms of delay or hesitation should appear in these papers, indicating a disposition upon the part of the Queen's Government to adopt conciliatory measures. I firmly believe that this course of conciliation has produced a beneficial result. I believe that the system of concession, pushed to the utmost verge of reason, and attentive to all the real sentiments and wishes of the inhabitants of that country, has been successful, if not in detaching — at least in affording moral support to — many individuals in that country who might otherwise be found at the head of the insurrection. It is owing to this circumstance that men of a very different character from Papineau and Mackenzie are not only not now found leading the discontented, but are known to have receded from the ranks of insurrection, previously to the breaking out of that desperate measure, at the instigation of Papineau and his associates.

The Noble Lord who last addressed your Lordships has stated, most truly, that the Noble Duke opposite did, to a certain extent, prophesy that the present state of things would arrive in Canada. The Noble Duke did certainly prophesy that the House of Assembly would ultimately arrive at the point of declining to vote the Civil List; but it is also unquestionably true, that if that body had proved the existence of any real grievance, of any one palpable abuse calling for a remedy, the attention of Government would have been immediately directed to its removal. And if, from their numerous speeches, petitions, resolutions, and remonstrances, as well as from the examinations of their witnesses deputed for that purpose, any one thing positive and substantial can be collected, it is, that if the control over the colonial revenues, which they desired (and which they subsequently obtained) were granted, all their wants would be satisfied; and that these "ill-used persons," as they are represented by the Noble and Learned Lord who sat on the bench below me, would gladly accept that arrangement, because the settlement proposed they stated to be a monument of human wisdom, embodying all their wishes and all their hopes. And yet my Noble Friend, who has spoken for nearly three hours to-night, never once adverted to these circumstances, nor to the fact that all the former demands of Canada have been conceded; and that it is under the sole and immediate influence of a party which has raised new and unreasonable demands that all these calamities have arisen. I regret that I am deprived of the opportunity of adverting to these circumstances in my Noble and Learned Friend's presence. My Noble Friend has distinguished himself during the course of this evening more than even Papineau or Mackenzie has done; and he has also acted like them —in running away. It is not without some embarrassment that I feel constrained to allude in terms of disapprobation to some portions of the Noble Lord's speech, in his absence.

I cannot, however, refrain from observing, that I never was more astonished than to hear that Noble and Learned Lord maintain that which has been maintained by persons very much his inferiors out of your Lordships' house, namely, that there is anything like a resemblance between the present question, in respect of the Canadians, and the resistance which was made by the inhabitants of the United States upon the occasion of the memorable declaration of independence. The circumstances of the two cases are totally different; and the resistance in the one case commenced where in the other case it ends. The parity which the Noble and Learned Lord has sought to establish between these two cases, reminds me of that which the famous Captain Fluellen endeavoured, with memorable pertinacity, to institute between Alexander the Great and Harry of Monmouth, — a parallel which he founded upon the ingeniously-detected coincidence of there being " a river in Macedon and a river in Monmouth ;" and made quite satisfactory to himself by means of the additional circumstance, that Alexander quarrelled with his friend without a reason, and Harry of Monmouth with a reason. The resemblance which the Noble and Learned Lord has sought to establish in the present instance, is based upon quite as substantial analogy! The Atlantic divides Canada from England, and it also divides England from the United States. There is a House of Assembly in Canada, and there was also a House of Assembly in the United States. The analogy is, therefore, according to the Noble and Learned Lord, conclusively established. Unfortunately, however, for the truth of the resemblance, it fails in this important particular,—that, in the case of the United States, the right of controlling their taxation was disallowed, while in the case of Lower Canada it would have gone on for ever, but for the absurd interposition of the House of Assembly. But I should have a very different opinion from that which I now entertain as to the issue of the present contest with the Canadians, were we not determined that there shall exist in that colony a free community, and a free people; for I am happy to say, that it is the genius of the constitution of England, wherever it maintains a connection with colonies flourishing in trade and commerce, to communicate to them, to leave to them, or, if they have them not, to provide for them, the means of enjoying practical freedom, and of regulating their own local and domestic concerns. But in the colonies, as at home, there are various parties to this contract; and it ought never to be forgotten, that if the colonial House of Assembly has duties to perform, so also has the Crown.

The Noble and Learned Lord has spoken this evening, as if the only object in granting to the colonial assemblies the power of giving supplies was to enable them to refuse those supplies whenever they cannot carry any political object on which they have set their hearts. Now, the main objects of a constitution are to insure justice between man and man, to advance improvement, to promote education, to diffuse intelligence, to make roads, and to conduct all the affairs of the community, — all which, not once, but systematically, the House of Assembly of Lower Canada has refused to do. If it is to be contended that the House of Assembly has a right to do this, it may be as well contended, that, if the Crown were to order its troops, which it has a right to control, to stand still when Canada is invaded by a hostile force, or when the property of its inhabitants was attacked by a riotous mob, it would have a right to do so; for it may say, " You have not done what I wish;—you have not acceded to my political wishes, and therefore the enemy shall ravage your country, and the mob shall spoliate your property." I contend that the mode in which the House of Assembly has exercised the privileges granted to it under the constitution of 1791, is a mode calculated to defeat the end of all government. And when I find the House of Assembly, on the one hand, repeatedly refusing to perform its duties, and the Executive Government, on the other, repeatedly in collision with it, I cannot help thinking that a case is made out for reconsidering this constitution,— not by convening delegates, as has been stated, for the purpose of making an entirely new constitution, but by convening, under the authority of Government, individuals from the existing Legislature, if there be one, and from the community at large, if there be not, in order to elicit the opinions of that community, and to submit them, with a plan of an improved constitution, to the consideration of the Government at home. That, however, is a question which cannot be discussed on the present occasion, nor upon the Bill which is shortly to be introduced to the notice of your Lordships,—for this convention, if it is to be called by such a name, can be assembled under the prerogative of the Crown. In my opinion, it is impossible to discuss the case of Upper Canada as separated from that of Lower Canada; and I think that, in our future legislation, we ought to consider whether the measures intended for the benefit of the former are not also calculated to promote the interests of the latter province. I thank your Lordships for the attention with which you have listened to these observations, which I have felt it my duty to make, and I will not weary you by trespassing further upon your time.

The EARL of DURHAM.—My Lords, I think it necessary to address a few words to your Lordships, in the peculiar situation in which I stand at present; and I think it more especially necessary to offer them, now, because I do not think it consistent with my duty, having accepted the arduous office to which I have been appointed, to take any part in the debates that must hereafter ensue upon this subject. I wish, I repeat, to address a few words to your Lordships, in explanation of the principles which will hereafter influence my conduct in the discharge of the grave duties imposed upon me, and of the reasons which have induced me to accept the trust. My Lords, it is impossible for language to express the reluctance, the extreme reluctance, with which I have consented to undertake this duty,—to incur the great and awful responsibility which I know must attach to me in my endeavours to execute it; and I can assure your Lordships, that nothing but the most ardent attachment, and the most determined devotion to her most gracious Majesty's house and interests, and to the service of my country, could have induced me to place myself and my character in a situation, where I fear that I cannot answer the expectations of my Noble Friends, who have requested me to undertake this office, or even my own. The Noble and Illustrious Duke, who has spoken with so much candour to-night, has stated that he regrets to hear that the object of these measures, which your Lordships are now called on to consider, is merely the support of a particular party in Canada. It is not with that view that I by any means shall undertake the mission. I believe that my duty, in the first place, will be to assert the supremacy of her Majesty's government; to assert the dignity and honour of the British Crown, and to see that the law is carried into execution;—that it is not set aside in the remotest cabin, or in the most distant settlement: and I shall not conceive that I have done my duty, as long as there is the slightest pretence for considering that the dignity of the Crown, or the supremacy of the law, continues to be violated. Having effected these necessary and essential preliminary objects, I shall consider, without reference to party, casting aside all reflections that may concern either the British party or the French party in that country,—indeed, I know no French,—I can regard all, only as her Majesty's subjects,—having effected the necessary and essential preliminary objects to which I have adverted, I shall consider that I ought to extend protection to all,—to give justice to all;—that I ought to endeavour to protect as much the local rights and privileges of those who are the possessors and proprietors of the soil, as the great commercial interests which more nearly affect those who are called the British settlers.

The Noble and Learned Lord, at the end of his long and eloquent speech, has been pleased to say that I shall execute but a thankless task in carrying out with me the measure for the suspension of the Canadian constitution. I do not agree with him. I do not think that this measure, or any of the Acts of Parliament which are in contemplation, can be regarded in any such light. The constitution has already been de facto suspended, not by an Act of the British Parliament, but by the rebellion of the Canadians themselves. I consider, therefore, that I go there, not for the purpose of suspending the constitution, but for the purpose of endeavouring to provide, as well as I can, for the extraordinary state of circumstances which has been produced by the rebellious part of the Canadian community, and which has rendered it impossible for the constitution to continue in operation. These are the views with which I shall consent to undertake what I admit to be a great and awful responsibility—these are the views with which I shall enter upon the exercise of powers, greater, I know, than are usually entrusted to the discretion of an individual. Great and dictatorial as these powers are, I shall be anxious to lay them down at the earliest possible time. Believe me, my Lords, I shall endeavour to execute as speedily as possible this highly honourable, but most difficult and dangerous mission. As far as concerns the principal province, it would be my wish—and I implore my Noble Friends to give me the means of accomplishing it—to effect such a kind of settlement as should produce contentment and harmony amongst all classes, enable me to establish, not temporarily, but lastingly, the supremacy of the laws, and, finally, to leave behind me such a system of government as might tend to the general prosperity and happiness of one of the most important portions of her Majesty's dominions. If I can accomplish such an object as that, I shall deem no personal sacrifice of my own too great. I feel, however, that I can only accomplish it by the cordial and energetic support—a support which I am sure I shall obtain—of my Noble Friends the Members of her Majesty's Cabinet, by the co-operation of the Imperial Parliament, and, permit me to say, by the generous forbearance of the Noble Lords opposite, to whom I have always been politically opposed. From the candour and generosity which have distinguished the Noble Duke's remarks this evening, as well as upon all other occasions, I trust that he, and those who think with him, will give me credit for the good intentions which I feel, and will only condemn me if they find my actions such as shall enable them, consistently with their own character, to find fault. I will not trouble your Lordships further. I thought it right to state the feelings with which I enter upon this mission, and to explain to your Lordships that I go, not for the purpose of exercising that power, that species of discreditable power, as the Noble and Learned Lord calls it, which is to be vested in me; but, in the first place, to restore, I trust, the supremacy of the law, and, next, to be the humble instrument of conferring upon the British North American provinces such a free and liberal constitution as shall place them in the same scale of independence as the rest of the possessions of Great Britain, and as shall tend to their own immediate honour, welfare, and prosperity.

LORD GLENELG.—I shall trespass on your Lordships only for a very short time, in reply. I must be allowed, with my Noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) near me, to express my regret that the Noble and Learned Lord (Brougham) has been pleased to remove from the scene of action. Abiit, excessit, evasit, erupit! Having vented his thunders with no sparing hand, and having also heaped upon me those measures of wrath and indignation which seem to be inexhaustible in his mighty bosom, he has at length shown me, that having discharged his deadly bolts, he is capable, like the Thunderer, of veiling himself in clouds. I should have been glad to have returned my thanks to him for this, the first testimony of his friendship with which he has favoured me. I have been much in the habit of hearing the Noble and Learned Lord launch out his invectives and point his sneers at persons infinitely above me in character and station, and much more intimately connected with himself than I have the honour to be; but I am surprised at the unfailing vocabulary opened by him in his charge against me to-night; yet I confess, however, that the violence of the Noble and Learned Lord's invective falls with much less weight upon myself, from the circumstances to which I have allude; because I have seen it applied somewhat indiscriminately to others, not so much from opposition to any Noble Lord whom he chooses to attack,—as that, once engaged in the career of assault, the Noble and Learned Lord is carried away by that fervour of indignation which is the characteristic of his exalted mind. I am sorry to make these observations in his absence; but it is not my fault that he has removed himself from the House. He said it was with pain and sorrow that he had felt himself obliged to give utterance to the remarks which fell from him. If the Noble and Learned Lord were here, I should say, to his teeth, "Do not spare me your invective, but, for God's sake, spare me your pain and sympathy!" My Lords, I need not, I am sure, point out to you the contrast presented by the conduct of the Noble and Learned Lord, and the conduct of the Noble and Illustrious Duke who followed him in this debate. In the speech of the Noble Duke I recognised a mind—but in his presence I cannot express half what I feel at the candour and magnanimity of an address which was so consistent with all his own political views, and, at the same time, so generously candid to his political opponents. Yet this I must be allowed to say, that in the speech of the Noble Duke I recognised a mind strengthened by long habits of application to the great business of the country—a mind, careful of throwing bolts at random either upon this person or upon that, and, above all, not hinting vituperation which it dares not express — a mind anxious only to do justice to the great cause of this empire — anxious only to do justice even to his political opponents,—and anxious, by the same genius which he has already exercised in rescuing the country from danger, on another theatre,—to rescue it again in a different hemisphere from the possible diminution of its colonial greatness. I will not, in the absence of the Noble and Learned Lord, who, like his Canadian friends, has fled from the impending conflict, enter further into this contrast, — for I am sure that the less I say of it, the more it will strike all your Lordships who now hear me.

The Noble and Learned Lord observed, with respect to one particular point, namely, the composition of the Legislative Council, that, having declared, at a somewhat distant period, that that council should be reconstructed prior to the meeting of the House of Assembly, it nevertheless appeared, by the papers which have been laid before Parliament, that the commission for effecting that reconstruction was not sent out until the 22d of August. Now, if the Noble and Learned Lord had examined the papers thoroughly, he would have found in them the explanation of that delay. It was impossible for me to send out the commission until I had received from Lord Gosford the names of the persons who were to be inserted in it. Early in March last, Lord Gosford assured me that the names should be sent, and in two or three subsequent despatches I alluded to the want of them. Lord Gosford, however, could not send them because he found it extremely difficult, in the state of parties in the province, to select proper persons. The names did not reach me until the beginning of August. There was, certainly, no loss of time after the names arrived; for, in less than ten days, the commission was made out, a council held, and the despatch forwarded to Canada. Do not let it be supposed, as the Noble and Learned Lord has been pleased in his generosity to insinuate, that I mean by this explanation to throw any blame upon Lord Gosford. I am stating only what I am sure Lord Gosford would himself state, if he were here.

I must now refer to another topic which has been mentioned by the Noble and Learned Lord. The Noble and Learned Lord has said that he could not, for the life of him, perceive why this measure, which, in truth, ought to be applied only to a particular district, should be made general; and he was further pleased to observe, that whenever it suited my argument, I represented the whole colony as in a state of rebellion, and, at other times, spoke of it only as partially disturbed. I never, on any occasion, represented that whole country as being in a state of rebellion. I have always said, and the papers upon the table prove the fact, that the rebellion was confined to the district of Montreal. If I apply the measures about to be proposed, to the whole country, the reason is this: — that although the resistance to the laws and to the authority of the Crown has been limited to one district, yet that the conduct of the House of Assembly, as the representatives of the whole country, has been such as to render it impossible for the constitution to proceed; and I know not how it would be possible to maintain good government, or any government at all, in that country, if you confined your measures simply to the district which is now, unfortunately, in a state of rebellion.

EARL FITZWILLIAM. — The inference I draw from the observations made by the Noble Duke is, that no government can succeed in Canada unless it be of an arbitrary character.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I never said that, nor anything like it.

EARL FITZWILLIAM. — I readily admit that the Noble Duke never said so; but I contend that it is a fair inference from his words to conclude that such was his meaning?

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—No, no!

EARL FITZWILLIAM.— I certainly think that the Noble Duke opposite is in error in saying that Government has acted despotically towards Canada during the last few years. Great injustice will be done to those who have ruled this country for many years past if the blame of the present insurrection be laid on their shoulders. Your Lordships need not look to the present nor to the last Administration for the seeds of this rebellion; they must be sought for in a much more distant period. I beg, however, not to be included among those who doubt the success of the intended mission to the Canadas. When I consider the character of the Noble Earl who is to be entrusted with that mission, I am quite persuaded that his measures will be conducted in that constitutional spirit from the observance of which alone can any advantageous result be expected.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I beg just to state, by way of explanation, that I did not mean to characterise the colonial policy of the present or preceding Administrations as despotic. What I said was, that in neglecting to provide, by the Act passed in 1831, for the pecuniary independence of the Canadian Government, and to secure the political independence of the judges, the Government of that day failed to establish the British constitution in the colony.

The question was then put, and resolved in the affirmative; and the address was ordered to be presented to her Majesty by the Lords with white staves.

CRIMINAL CODE.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — My Lords, I beg leave to present a petition, which is important, not only on account of the subject of which it treats, but from its being signed by a great number of the acting magistrates of the county of Sussex. They complain that they are constantly compelled to commit persons for trial at the quarter sessions for petty stealing, and that such persons are frequently detained in gaol five or six weeks before trial, and when convicted the magistrates feel that they can award them only a very small punishment. The public, not being in the secret, naturally conclude that the offence is very trivial, or that the magistrates are too lenient. I was present when a man was tried for stealing a padlock, a tooth-brush, and some trifling articles, value sixpence. That man had been in gaol fifty days prior to his trial, and the magistrates consequently sentenced him to only one week's imprisonment. Now, it is a grave question whether these petty offences ought not to be visited summarily, and whether the petty sessions, which are now generally held in private rooms, might not be held on public days, and become public courts, for the trial of such petty cases, with the consent of the prisoner? The next point to which the petitioners respectfully call the attention of your Lordships, is the treatment of juvenile offenders, in respect to which subject I entirely concur with the petitioners. They state, and the statement is confirmed by the printed Returns before the House, that a very large number of persons under the age of fourteen or fifteen years are committed to the various prisons in this country for small larcenies. The petitioners are of opinion that it would be infinitely better, both for the public and the offenders themselves, if the magistrates had the power and opportunity of sending such juvenile criminals to some school of reformation, instead of being under the necessity of sending them to the house of correction, or committing them to prison to await their trial, however well-disciplined those places of confinement may be. What is required most is, that they should save young offenders from the evil example and influence of their older associates, by whom, in most cases, they are led into crime. The petitioners pray your Lordships' House to try the experiment, by causing some establishment of the kind to be set on foot. My Noble Friend at the head of the Council is aware that the plans adopted by the Refuge for the Destitute, and the Children's Friend Society, for the reformation of juvenile offenders, have proved to be most successful. Lastly, the petitioners ask your Lordships to direct your serious attention to the Acts which were passed last year. When those measures were before the House, I ventured to move a clause to the effect that none of the offences which were to come under the description of "capital" hereafter should be tried at quarter sessions. The House agreed with me, but the Bill came up so late in the session, that there was no opportunity to send it back to the other House to have the clause introduced. It is therefore, at present, left to magistrates to decide before whom persons charged with grave and heinous offences shall be tried. Such offences ought to be tried before the judges of the land. I do not wish to impose additional labour on the judges, but I think it would be more satisfactory if such cases were always put under their jurisdiction. I hope that her Majesty's Ministers will direct their attention to the matters touched on in this petition; but if they are too much occupied with other business, or are not agreed on the prayer of the petition, I shall hereafter move that it be referred to a committee of your Lordships.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I agree with the Noble Duke that this is an important subject; and that it is one which imperatively calls for inquiry, I think all who have listened to the Noble Duke will admit. I am one of those who supported those Bills which have diminished the amount of capital offences, and by which capital punishment is restricted to very few crimes; but I never thought that the change thus made in the law would have the effect of superseding the ordinary jurisdiction of the higher tribunals of criminal justice, and could transfer the administration of the law in those cases which have ceased to be capital to the magistrates at quarter sessions. Certainly I never understood that arrangement to be a part of the project. I think this subject ought to receive immediate consideration.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The subjects mentioned in the petition are, no doubt, of pressing importance; but the difficulty is, to know how to deal with them effectively. There should be some means of assistance afforded to the judges of assize.

LORD BROUGHAM.—No doubt it would be a very great convenience, if better assistance were afforded to the judges. But I think that all those cases which have been capital in theory, though not so in practice, should be tried by the judges, as they were before they were reduced.

LORD ABINGER.—I think the petitioners seem to have misunderstood their position, because the matter is left to their own discretion. The Bill of last year has made no transfer of the jurisdiction, and I cannot understand why the petitioners have complained, because, if magistrates choose to commit prisoners to the quarter Sessions, of course they must try them there.

The DUKE of RICHMOND.—In justice to the Magistrates of the county of Sussex, I must say, that they are very well aware that they have power to try any offence not capital, but it is not their custom to do so. They have made no complaint against the judges, who have no power to interfere with them by any order. What the magistrates complain of is, that the discretion is not removed from them, and that there is no fixed rule. Among fifty or sixty, or 100 magistrates, of course some will take one view of a case, and some another. I see, however, no reason why an Act of Parliament should not be passed to have certain cases tried before the judges. It is not the wish of the magistrates of the county of Sussex to relieve themselves from any trouble; but their object is to secure a better administration of public justice. It is perfectly well known that some judges on the circuits are constantly saying, "Why do you send this petty case before me?" While others will as often say, "Why was that case tried at the quarter sessions? why did you not send it up to the assize?" All that the magistrates want is some definite regulation on the subject, and one that will be binding, so that this matter may not be left to the discretion of individuals. I have no doubt that a Bill having this object in view would easily pass through the Legislature, and I therefore hope that the Government will introduce one, at an early period. If not, I must again take the liberty of bringing the subject under the notice of the House.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE.—I have no doubt that it is very desirable that great and capital offences should be tried by the judges of the land, and that a Bill of the nature recommended by the Noble Duke could be easily passed through the Legislature; and therefore I would suggest that a Bill should be brought in immediately for confining minor cases to the jurisdiction of magistrates, and sending great offences before the judges. There can be no doubt that a solemn trial before the judges would have a much greater influence than a trial at a quarter sessions of the Magistrates.

LORD ABINGER.—With reference to what has fallen from the Noble Duke, I beg to say that he has taken pains to show that the magistrates do not complain of the judges, but that they complain of each other,—many of the magistrates thinking that they are bound to save the public from expense as much as possible; now I should not be surprised, if such a Bill as that recommended were brought in, if we should hear an objection made, that the consequence of sending an increased number of cases to the assizes would be a proportionate increase of the county rate. Of course grave and heinous offences ought to be carried before the judges; but there are certain offences, not exactly of a petty character, but for which the punishments are fixed, that might be tried at quarter sessions.

The petition was then laid on the Table.

CANADA.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I hold in my hand a petition upon a subject which occupied much of your Lordships' attention last night,—the present unfortunate state of affairs in Canada. The petition is from the Baptist congregation of Romney Street Chapel, Westminster, deprecating the Canadian war; I have had, also, a petition to the same effect from the inhabitants of the metropolitan borough of Marylebone, unanimously agreed to at a numerous meeting convened by public advertisement. In the prayer of these petitions, and in the general feelings and principles which actuate these petitioners, it is unnecessary for me, after what has passed in this House, both last night and in the debate which took place last summer, to state more than that I concur most heartily and cordially in them. But I wish to apologise if I take this opportunity of stating the real cause of an omission on my part last night, which may betoken a want of respect, both to your Lordships and to my Noble Friends behind me. I understand that, last night, after I left the House, observations,—some of them in a vehement, others conveyed in a pleasant strain,—were made upon my accidental absence at that period. Now, I will state the cause of my absence. I had heard my Noble Friend at the head of the Government admit, that he had no defence to offer to the main charge which I felt it to be my painful duty,—I retain those words, notwithstanding the denunciation of them by another Noble Friend of mine (if after a night's repose, and refreshment, and rest, the Noble Lord will still permit me to call him so,)—in spite of the denunciation into which the Noble Lord worked himself up respecting that absence,—when I heard, I repeat, my Noble Friend at the head of the Government state that, with respect to the charge which it was my painful duty to bring, he was at a loss to defend or justify the Government, I really supposed that there was an end of the debate, and I found he was confirmed in that view,—in that mistaken view, as it now appears to be,—because another Noble Friend of mine, the President of the Council, having got up and presented himself to your Lordships, apparently with the intention of addressing the House, sat down again without doing so.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE.—I gave way to the Noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ripon).

LORD BROUGHAM.—I was not aware of that. I thought that there was enough to answer in what had been said by the Noble Duke; and from my Noble Friend not answering my first speech, I thought he might be the less able to answer my second one. However, having thus stated one reason for my going away, I must also add that, yesterday, I was only partially and slowly recovering from a severe indisposition; that I had been two days under medical treatment, and was desired, in this weather, to take great care not to expose myself at night. This further apology I have to offer to my Noble Friends, and to your Lordships, for the discourtesy I showed by leaving the House. But then I wish to consider whether my Noble Friend had any ground of complaint against me; or if any other Noble Lord had any ground of complaint, none had a less right than my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies; for I have been informed upon all hands, that, if I had been present, I should have deprived my Noble Friend of the very best part of his speech in reply. Indeed, some of the admirers of my Noble Friend have gone so far as to say that my presence would have deprived my Noble Friend of the expression of the very best things he ever said in his life. I allude to that most remarkable saying of my Noble Friend,—that I was very like my friend Papineau, and others.

LORD GLENELG.—I did not happen to say that.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Then I have no right to complain; the Noble Lord says he did not make the comparison. I was not present myself, and I must have been misinformed; it was, however, so represented to me. I have also been told that my Noble Friend, in alluding to my absence, made use of not a very refined or courtly word, when he said that I had "bolted."

LORD GLENELG. — I did not say that.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Then I really begin to be afraid that I have been totally misinformed, and that my Noble Friend did not say any of those good things which his admirers, flattering my Noble Friend, told me were the best things he had ever said in his life. Now, I am very sorry for this, for it was a consolation to me for my absence, to hear that my Noble Friend had made such a good speech; but it now turns out to be a mistake, and that my Noble Friend only compared me with those persons in Canada who have gone across the line. Now, I cannot arrogate to myself the merit of any similarity of conduct to be compared with that of those rebels or resisting parties in the province of Canada; for I did not retire across the line — I did not leave my place or the House from any fear of her Majesty's troops — I retired across the line in consequence of the accidental circumstances to which I have referred. It does not, however, appear that I have got out of the way of her Majesty's troops; but here, however, I am again, ready to defend myself to the best of my humble abilities against any attempt by her Majesty's troops to put me down, as I hope they will put down those parties to whom I have been so unworthily likened. My Noble Friend, however, last night said that the Canadians had already received concessions, and were now only quarrelling about a further demand, which is unreasonable, and which they had never before urged, and that the present state of things was the consequence of yielding to their demands. But I showed, last night, the Canadians had not been given that which only they felt to be of real value — namely, an elective Legislative Council. It has been said, they have already received a great gift. This reminds me of the miser in the play, who says, "Thank God, I never gave any thing away in charity, except once a bad shilling to a blind man for holding my horse." That is exactly like what this country has given to those on the other side of the water. I rejoice in the great patriotism displayed by my Noble Friend (Lord Durham), in undertaking the mission with which he is charged. My Noble Friend last night stated that extensive powers were conferred upon him, and therefore I conclude those powers will include the authority to grant an elective Legislative Council; if they do not (I warn my Noble Friend, and those who send him out), if they do not give him that — the only power which will please the Canadians — they had better not send out any person at all. If my Noble Friend be going out merely to report and to receive fresh instructions, it will only be creating further delay; for the first thing he will have to report will be, that the Canadians will be satisfied with nothing short of an elective Legislative Council.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The reason alleged by my Noble and Learned Friend,—that of personal indisposition,—is quite sufficient to account for his departing from the House last night; but I apprehend that it is unusual for any Noble Lord, after making a speech animadverting upon the measures of the Government, to withdraw from the House without hearing the reply that can be given to those animadversions. I must say, with great deference to my Noble and Learned Friend, that if he had confined himself to the plea of indisposition, which was amply sufficient to account for the conduct he has pursued, and if my Noble and Learned Friend had omitted the other parts of his speech, and the other excuses it contained, which did not appear to me to be of the same strength, he would have pursued a much better course. I believe that I am rather an older Member of Parliament than my Noble and Learned Friend, but if I did not feel his superiority on this and other subjects, I should have attempted to offer him the advice,—not after he had retired to calculate, by inference, what might take place in the course of the debate, who might speak, or what might be likely to occur, for nobody can anticipate any of those facts,—but to do that which I am sure my Noble and Learned Friend would admit to be due to the House in general, and to those upon whom he had so severely animadverted in particular — to remain (except, of course, personal illness, which no man can avoid, should prevent him) and hear what might be urged upon the subject in the defence. The inconvenience of a contrary practice has been made evident from the course taken to-night by my Noble and Learned Friend, who, in consequence of not having heard what has so taken place, seeks to renew, afresh, the debate of last night, and to enter upon the arguments used on that occasion. Not only this, but my Noble and Learned Friend has been led into a misapprehension of that which he really did hear, and which did take place in his presence. I certainly did state that I had conceded the point as to the not sending out troops last season; I felt that to be the most pressing part of the argument, the most difficult part of the case which the Government had to answer; but at the same time I stated that I considered this point to be perfectly defensible, and that there were just grounds for the course the Government had pursued in that respect. My Noble and Learned Friend has said that I maintained that course by no argument of any force or validity; of that it is for others to judge between my Noble Friend and myself. I, however, by no means admitted that there was not a complete defence for the course which the Government had pursued.

The petitions were then laid on the Table.

DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANNUITY BILL.

On VISCOUNT MELBOURNE moving the Order of the day for the House going into a committee on this Bill, —

LORD BROUGHAM said: — I will not again trouble your Lordships with any observations on this measure. I still retain my opinions upon it, and shall enter my protest against it upon your Lordships' Journals.

The Bill then went through committee, was agreed to without any amendment, and was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next; — and the Lords summoned.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Lunæ, 22° die Januarii, 1838.

Lord Erskine took the oaths.

The Earl of Shaftesbury sat Speaker.

House adjourned during pleasure, and resumed by the Lord Chancellor.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The DUKE of ARGYLL.—My Lords, in obedience to your Lordships' commands, I have had the honour of waiting on her Majesty with your Lordships' Address; and I have been directed to lay before your Lordships her Majesty's most gracious answer.

The Noble Duke then read the answer, as follows:—

"I thank your Lordships for the assurance of your determination to support my efforts for the suppression of revolt, and the restoration of tranquillity, in Lower Canada.

"I deeply regret the unhappy events which have taken place in that part of my dominions.

"It will be my earnest endeavour, with your co-operation, to make effectual provision for the restoration of order in that Province, and for the permanent welfare and security of all classes of its inhabitants.

"I have observed with great satisfaction the spirit which animates my loyal and faithful subjects in North America.

"Their zealous exertions in support of my authority, are entitled to my warmest acknowledgments."

CANADA.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I rise to give notice that, to-morrow, I intend moving for a number of Returns relative to accounts connected with the North American provinces, and especially with Lower Canada. It is possible to obtain the greater part of the information I seek by looking, with considerable industry, to the different papers which have been already laid on the Table of the House; but no industry can give all the information I desire, and which it is extremely necessary that the House should possess. The papers to which I allude comprise,—

An account of charges incurred by the United Kingdom on account of the North American provinces, in each year from 1827 to 1837, both inclusive: Also,

Account, showing the value of all articles imported into the United Kingdom from each of the North American provinces, in each year from 1827 to 1836, both inclusive: Also,

Account, showing the value of all articles exported from each of the North American provinces to other British colonies and dominions beyond sea, in each year from 1832 to 1836, both inclusive: Also,

Account, showing the value of all exports from, and imports into, each of the North American provinces, in each year from 1832 to 1836, both inclusive, to and from all parts of the world, exclusive of the United Kingdom, and of the British colonies and dominions beyond sea: Also,

Account, showing the amount of duty levied in the ports of the United Kingdom, and of the British colonies and dominions beyond sea, respectively, upon each article imported from the North American provinces, and upon similar articles imported from foreign countries.

I wish, likewise, to have an Account, showing the amount of tonnage and the number of ships belonging to each of the North American provinces, and the number of men employed in navigating the same, in each of the years mentioned: Also,

Account, for the same period, of the amount of tonnage, and of the number of ships belonging to the United Kingdom, and to the British colonies and dominions beyond sea respectively, employed in the trade with the North American provinces; together with an account of the number of men engaged in navigating such ships.

I should also be glad if another series of accounts were produced, which would have the effect of showing the financial state of those provinces,—namely, an account of the total revenue derived from taxes within each of the North American provinces, in each of the years above mentioned; specifying the taxes, and whether the same were imposed by Acts of the provincial or of the Imperial Parliament: Also,

Account, showing the net revenue arising within the province of Lower Canada, in each of the years above mentioned, and the application thereof; distinguishing the revenue disposable by the Crown from that disposable by the provincial Parliament, and specifying the application of the same respectively: Also,

Statement of the expenses of the civil government, and administration of justice in Lower Canada, for four years, from 1832 to 1835, inclusive; and also of the sums which would have been at the disposal of the Government, if the revenues of the 14 Geo III. c. 88. had not been given up: Also,

Return of the population of Lower Canada: Also,

Return of the population of the six united counties of St. Hyacinthe, Richelieu, Rouville, Vercheres, Chambly, and L'Acadie, of the city and county of Montreal, and of the counties of Two Mountains and Terrebonne: Also,

Copies of the titles of all Acts of the Legislature of Lower Canada, which have expired in the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, and of all such Acts of the same Legislature as will expire in the years 1838 and 1839.

Instead of moving for these accounts now, I will place the list of papers in the hands of the Noble Baron opposite (Lord Glenelg), in order that he may examine how far it will be practicable to produce these Returns.

LORD GLENELG.—I will look at the Returns, and shall be prepared, to-morrow, to give my opinion upon them.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I beg leave to present a petition from the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Carlisle, sealed with the seal of the corporation, in favour of National Education. The petitioners set forth, that a very large number of persons in this country are almost wholly destitute of the means of education, notwithstanding the exertions of private individuals to avoid so great a calamity,—that the system pursued at schools is highly defective, and that the demand for knowledge can only be adequately answered by improving the mode of education to be obtained, by the adoption of some national plan, based on sound and equitable principles. I will take this opportunity of correcting a mistake which has gone abroad relative to a provision in the third clause of the Bill, now waiting for a second reading. Many persons have unaccountably supposed that clause to give to the board of commissioners a privilege of establishing schools without the consent of the local authorities. Now, the Bill not only does not give any such privilege, but it actually restrains the power already possessed, not only by the board of commissioners, but by any person or persons to whom the Lords of the Treasury shall choose to confide the application and distribution of the grant. The power of the Treasury in this respect is at present absolute; they are obliged to account for the sum voted, but not in any way to account for the manner in which it has been applied. I am glad to have an opportunity of setting the mistake right; and, in order that it may not again arise, it is my purpose to make some alteration in the words of the clause.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

LOWER CANADA.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I hold in my hand a petition from the citizens of Edinburgh; to which I earnestly entreat your Lordships' attention. The meeting at which it was agreed to was highly respectable in regard to the station and character of those who attended it, and was besides extremely numerous. The petition is in behalf of our fellow-subjects in Canada, who complain, as the petitioners think, most justly, of the grievances under which they labour, and instance the series of resolutions passed in this and the other House of Parliament. The petitioners express a very strong and a very unfavourable opinion of those resolutions, particularly of that one which authorises the seizure of the public money of Canada; and they pray your Lordships to take such steps, as you may in your wisdom think proper to adopt, for remedying the grievances complained of. I am informed by the individual who presided at the meeting, that the petition was unanimously agreed to.

Read, and ordered to be received as the petition of W. O. Gillon (the chairman), who only has signed it.

The Noble and Learned Lord then presented a petition to the same effect from inhabitants of Montrose.

POSTAGE.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I hold in my hand a petition from the manufacturers, bankers, and other inhabitants of Leicester, setting forth the necessity of some alteration in the establishment of the Post Office for the conveyance of letters, and the communication of information throughout the country. The petitioners strongly recommend your Lordships to give a trial to a plan upon the principles advocated by Mr. Rowland Hill.

Read and ordered to lie on the Table.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Fourth Report brought up by Mr. Freshfield, and read. — To lie on the Table, and to be printed.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented; viz.: —

Postage Duties, — By Mr. Tancred and other Honourable Members, for reduction of, — from Leicester; Banbury; and Nairn. — Referred to the Select Committee on Postage.

Ballot, — By Mr. Grote and Mr. Maule, in favour of, — from Chapel-en-le-Frith; King's Lynn; Presteign; and Clonegal and Kildavin.

On presenting the petition from Lynn, Mr. GROTE said: — I beg to state that to this petition there are appended no less than 600 signatures, being the greatest number of signatures ever known to be put to any petition from the inhabitants of that town.

Marine Insurances, — By Mr. Ord, — from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for repeal of duty thereon.

Lower Canada, — By Sir Samuel Whalley, Mr. Leader, Mr. Hume, Mr. Harvey, and Sir William Molesworth, against the war, and for redress of grievances, — from St. Pancras (churchwardens and vestry clerk); Paddington; Kettering; St. James, Westminster; St. Martin, Westminster; St. Clement Danes, Westminster; Westminster; Chichester; Baptist congregation assembling at Romney Street, Westminster; members of the Working Men's Association of London; members of the Working Men's Association of Bath; members of the Cirencester Working Men's Association; Kingston-upon-Hull (inhabitants, two petitions); Kingston-upon-Hull (female inhabitants); and Edinburgh (chairman of a meeting).

On presenting the petition from St. Pancras, SIR SAMUEL WHALLEY said: — The petitioners express their deep regret at the delay, on the part of her Majesty's Government, in redressing the grievances of which the Canadians have so often, and for so long a period, complained. I must be permitted to observe, that while I concur with the petitioners in deploring the delay that has taken place, I cannot but express my regret that the course taken by the Canadians themselves renders it impossible for me to render them the support which otherwise I should feel disposed to do.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY, on presenting a petition, signed by 300 of the Radical Association of Kettering, in Northamptonshire, said: — The petitioners express their regret at the resolutions passed by the two Houses against the Canadians. They hope those resolutions may not be persevered in, but that they may be rescinded, and that justice may be done to the Canadians, and their wrongs redressed; and that the House will refuse any supplies for carrying on a war against the Canadas, which began in injustice, on our part, and may end in defeat and disgrace.

Mr. HUME, on presenting the petition from Edinburgh, said: — The meeting, at which this petition was agreed to, stated, through one of the resolutions upon which the petition was drawn up, that they were deeply impressed with the feeling, that it is for the interest of religion that this war should not be further prosecuted; and they recommend that, if the colonists cannot be ruled over by the mother country with their own consent, a peaceful separation should be effected as speedily as possible. I have only to say, that I cordially concur in the sentiments avowed by these petitioners.

Mr. GILLON. — Having acted as chairman at the meeting at which this petition was agreed to, I beg leave to state, that there was an unanimous feeling, on the part of those who attended it, against the continuance of this most unnatural contest.

Pensions Committee, — By Sir Samuel Whalley, — of the churchwardens and vestry clerk of St. Pancras, for adding the name of Mr. Harvey to the committee.

Education, — By an Honourable Member, — of the corporation of Boston, for the establishment of a national system of education.

Municipal Corporations (Ireland), — By Mr. Maule, — from Clonegal and Kildavin, for reform of.

Glasgow Cotton Spinners, — By Mr. Wakley, praying for the intercession of the House to procure a remission of the sentence recently passed at Edinburgh upon certain cotton spinners of Glasgow, convicted of conspiracy to raise wages, and assault, — from members of the Bristol Working Men's Association, and delegates and members of the London Trade Societies. On present the latter petition the Honourable Member observed: — Sir, these petitioners declare that they do not believe the evidence adduced on the late trial, that no reasonable person who has heard or read that evidence can come to the conclusion that any such intentions were ever cherished as those imputed to the accused and others. They also pray that the House will address her Majesty to grant the condemned a free pardon, or that it will institute an inquiry into the whole circumstances connected with the Cotton Spinners' Association. It was my intention to go into this question at some length on presenting this petition; but not seeing the Lord Advocate, or any of her Majesty's Ministers in their places, I will defer it till another opportunity; and I now give notice that on Thursday next I will move for an inquiry into the nature and constitution of the Society of Operative Cotton Spinners of Glasgow, and I hope that all those Members who believe the lately condemned parties guilty, will then attend.

Merchant Service, — By Mr. Dennistoun, — from 500 inhabitants of Glasgow, for adopting measures for examining and licensing masters, mates, and officers of merchant vessels.

Church of Scotland, — By Mr. Dennistoun, — of the chairman of a meeting of working men of Gorbals, against further endowments. The Honourable Member said: — If any further aid in this way should be granted, I can only say there will at once be an end of the popularity of the present Government in Scotland.

Negro Apprenticeship, — By Mr. Dennistoun, — of the chairman of a meeting of inhabitants of Glasgow, for abolition of the system.

Tithes, &c. (Ireland), — By Mr. Yates, — from Clonegal and Kildavin, for the abolition of tithes and ministers' money.

Hops, — By Mr. Darby, — from Mayfield, for repeal of duty on.

RATING OF TENEMENTS.

Petition of guardians of the poor of the union of Luton, for rendering the owners of small tenements liable to the parochial rates. — Referred to the Select Committee on the Poor Law Amendment Act.

LOWER CANADA.

Mr. HUME. — Seeing the Noble Lord the Secretary of State in his place, I am anxious to know whether he has any objection to the reprinting of certain papers relating to Canada, as there are many Honourable Gentlemen, now Members of the House, who are wholly unacquainted (not having been Members of the former House) with the Report of the committee, and the evidence taken before that committee in the year 1834. It is very necessary that these Members should make themselves thoroughly masters of the contents of these papers before they come to a vote on the Canada question. I therefore move that the Report of the Commissioners upon the State of Canada (presented 20th of February, 1837), and Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee on Canada Affairs in 1834, be reprinted.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have no objection to the reprinting of the reports of the evidence taken before the committee of last year, if there be not a sufficient number of copies for Members; but, at the same time, I cannot consent to any delay in bringing forward the Government measures respecting Canada.

Mr. HUME. — I have only to say, that in moving for these returns, I have no wish whatever to delay the proceedings of the Noble Lord on the Canada question.

Motion agreed to.

To lie on the Table.

Lower Canada. — On the motion of Mr. GROTE, petition of John Arthur Roebuck, Esq., agent of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada (presented 17th of January), was read.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I must beg to call the attention of the House to the omission, in this petition, of the words "humble petition" or "humbly shows." I assume that that is entirely accidental, but it is a phrase which it has been the invariable practice of the House to require. If the petition had been presented from any ordinary person, I should not have thought it necessary to notice the omission; but as it is the petition of a Gentleman who cannot but be acquainted with the rules of the House, I think it right to advert to it. If, however, the Honourable Gentleman opposite will say that the omission was one of inadvertence, and not of design, I will not raise the question; but without such an assurance, I shall certainly feel it my duty to do so.

Mr. GROTE. — I am quite sure that it never was the intention of Mr. Roebuck, in preparing the petition, and most certainly it was not mine, in presenting it, to show any want of respect, or to make any omission of words which by the forms of the House are considered requisite. Until this moment I was not aware that the word "humbly" was required as essential to the proper wording of a petition; and it strikes me, unless my recollection very much deceives me, that I have myself presented petitions from persons who, perhaps, not being so well acquainted with the forms of the House as the Honourable Baronet, did not use that mode of expression, but who considered that they did their duty in respectfully addressing the House, and using such decorous language as became those who advanced petitions to Parliament. I am quite satisfied that it was not the intention of Mr. Roebuck to omit any form of words necessary to show that due respect which the House requires from other petitioners.

SIR R. INGLIS. — The Honourable Gentleman having stated that this omission was unintentional, I shall say nothing more respecting it. I must, however, be allowed to remark, that the only cases in which an exemption from the usual form of wording petitions is allowed, are petitions from Peers or Quakers. It is not my intention to urge this question as a breach of privilege; but I do think that a gentleman who has had the honour of a seat in this House, ought to be familiar with its usages, and address it in the same manner as is required from other individuals.

Mr. GROTE. — In pursuance of the notice which I gave on Wednesday evening, I rise to move ——

SIR R. PEEL. — Before the Honourable Gentleman makes his motion, I am desirous of saying a few words. I think that it will accord with the general convenience of the House to state that I shall take the first opportunity, when the Canadian Bill goes into committee, to propose several important amendments, and to take the sense of the House upon them. I propose to omit that part of the Bill which looks like a recognition on the part of the House of Commons of the summoning of a committee of conventional estates, or a committee of advice, or by whatever other name such a body may be called. I shall move the omission of any words which tend to sanction the idea that a body so convened should have a representative character. I do not mean to propose any restriction on the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, but I wish to exclude any direct recognition or sanction of such a proceeding as that proposed by this House. I likewise mean to propose the omission of that part of the Bill which enables her Majesty in council to repeal this Act of Parliament.

Mr. GROTE. — I propose to move

"That J. A. Roebuck, Esq., agent of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, be heard at the bar of the House against the Bill for making temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada, pursuant to the prayer of his petition." From the manner in which the few words I spoke on Wednesday evening were received by the House, I am induced to hope that I shall find no difficulty in persuading the House to grant the prayer of this petition. There seems to prevail among Gentlemen on both sides of the House, whatever may be their opinions of the policy or propriety of the Bill which was introduced by her Majesty's Government, an impression that it is nothing more than what justice requires, that the agent of the House of Assembly should have an opportunity of stating the case, as it affects the House of Assembly, before we come to a decision upon it. In the preamble of the Bill the House will perceive that, in point of fact, it is the sittings of the House of Assembly which this Bill proposes especially, in the first instance, to prevent. The House of Assembly is really the body, then, in Lower Canada, the most directly and materially interested in this measure. When it is proposed to suspend the constitution, in point of fact, the most material item in that constitution is the House of Assembly—elected by the people;—and therefore the suspension of the constitution has for its material feature the suspension of the sittings of the House of Assembly. It is impossible that any Gentleman here can feel how very much the people of Canada are interested in the question, as to whether the right of their representative assembly to hold their sittings shall be continued, or whether they are to be deprived of that privilege; and I am persuaded that when Honourable Members recollect how very imperfectly this House is furnished with information respecting Lower Canada, and how completely almost all the information laid before them comes from what may be called one side of the question; they must, at any rate, consider it impossible to proceed with perfect fairness and impartiality, unless they give the fullest opportunity to those who represent the feelings of the House of Assembly, and who are best acquainted with the political measures connected with that body, to set forth their case fully and unreservedly before the House.

It will also be in the recollection of the House, that the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud laid it down as the ground for introducing and recommending a measure so severe in its character, that there was an entire want of confidence in the House of Assembly, and he went into a statement of a series of proceedings, on the part of the House of Assembly, for many years past, tending to demonstrate that it had forfeited its title to the confidence both of this House and of the people of Canada, and was no longer worthy of having its legislative functions continued. Whether it appeared to the House that the Noble Lord laid before it sufficient evidence to justify that conclusion I do not intend to pronounce; but strict fairness and justice towards a body so vehemently accused, require that their agent, who is now in England, should have an opportunity of defending it against charges extremely painful to hear. I do not anticipate that any objection will be made, on principle, against hearing Mr. Roebuck at the bar; and, as to the question,—what is the proper stage of the Bill at which he should be heard, supposing the House should accede to the proposition of admitting him?—I believe invariable precedent has decided, that an agent appearing at the bar can only be heard after the second reading of the Bill shall have been agreed to.

It is not my intention to depart from the invariable practice which has been observed by the House on such occasions, and I shall therefore move, that Mr. Roebuck be heard on the second reading, or rather, after the second reading has been voted. I, myself, entertain very serious objections to the principle of the Bill; and, inasmuch as I should be sorry that, in proposing the present course of omitting to take any discussion on the second reading, I should be understood as giving an implied acquiescence in the principle, I think the convenient course by which a full and fair discussion of the principle would be ensured would be, that the debate should take place after the House shall have been put in possession of the facts and reasoning which Mr. Roebuck may think proper to lay before it. What I intend to submit, then, is, that the second reading of the Bill should be acceded to in a formal manner, and that the discussion of the principle should be taken on the question, "that this Bill be committed." I think that course would be found alike conducive to the convenience of the House, and also to the full and fair discussion of the whole measure, in principle and detail. I am quite persuaded that, if the House were to decide on the principle of the Bill, or were understood so to decide, without hearing the arguments of Mr. Roebuck, they would be guilty of the injustice of determining this question without hearing many of the most material points of evidence which bear upon it. I shall not detain the House further, but will at once move, that John Arthur Roebuck, Esquire, agent of the House of Assembly in Lower Canada, be heard upon his petition against the Bill "to make temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada," upon the second reading of the said Bill.

Mr. W. GLADSTONE.—I concur very much in the observations which have been made by the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, as to the general desire of hearing some individual in defence of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, against whom this Bill is more especially directed. I know that before we agree to the principle, it is most expedient to hear some person possessing the knowledge which Mr. Roebuck can display on this subject; but, at the same time, I feel bound to protest against a motion which recognises Mr. Roebuck as the agent of the House of Assembly. The Honourable Member for London, on the last night when this matter was discussed, quoted the case of Mr. Limburner, in 1794, as a precedent for the proceeding which he proposes. It appears, however, to me, that the two cases differ in very material particulars. The first is this:—Mr. Limburner represented the whole province and its common interest. There was no division, no dissension as to the topics which he should urge. The second and more important point of difference was, that Mr. Limburner was unquestionably deputed by the community, or a large portion of it, representing the whole, and deputed pro hâc vice for that very case; but, in the present instance, we are called on to acknowledge Mr. Roebuck as pleading a general title of agency, from which he deduces a claim to act in defence of his supposed constitnents, and to be heard at the bar of the House.

I am not aware of the constitutional right of any province to appoint an agent with general powers and functions in this country. I am not aware that such a principle is admitted; and certain I am that, if it were, it would, in practice, lead to interminable confusion. What would be the result? If we give to the Assembly of Lower Canada the power of appointing an agent to represent them in this country, we could not refuse the same privilege to the Legislative Council. The consequence would be, that every colonial dispute and dissension, instead of being decided by the Legislature, which has properly jurisdiction over such matters, and, indeed, whose privilege it is to adjust them, would be determined upon by the colonial secretary, after hearing counsel on both sides. I will not now inquire whether this would be a good or a bad system of government: at all events, it is essentially different from that which actually exists; and would tend to the recognition of a principle by her Majesty's Government — for what reasons it is not my intention to scrutinise — which has never been sanctioned by this House. As regards the question of inconvenience, there is nothing which I should so much regret as to reject the prayer of the petition; for I think it is most desirable to hear what Mr. Roebuck has to offer. We have all listened to him on former occasions, in this House, and profited much by his accurate knowledge of the questions relating to Canada. I will also observe, that when he appeared in his place in this House, and possessed the confidence of the House of Assembly, he thought right to discharge functions which he has no right to undertake when no longer a Member. If he be qualified to appear as counsel, I see a strong case of equity for hearing him, as, individually, he possesses every quality which could enable him to perform the duty with effect. Should the House of Assembly wish to have an agent for a particular purpose, I do not deny their right to appoint one; but it is notorious that the House of Assembly is not now sitting, neither is likely that they will be convened for a long period.

Considering the course taken on former occasions; considering that, when the Municipal Corporations Bill was under discussion, counsel were heard against it at the bar of the House of Lords; and, considering the many precedents of a similar kind on which agents have been heard here, I cannot bring myself — whatever may be the amount of difficulty in principle — to refuse the present application. Considering, too, the incapacity of the House of Assembly to perform any act belonging to its natural functions, and the perfect right which they possess of deputing a person to oppose this Bill, I think it the better course, that the description of Mr. Roebuck, "as agent to the House of Assembly," should be struck out, and that this House should empower him, on their own authority, to appear on the mixed considerations which I have suggested. Nothing will induce me to recognise, without previous discussion, and a protest against its application, a title such as that preferred, which must lead to every sort of anomaly in practice, and throw the greatest possible difficulty in the way of conducting the affairs of the colonies.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—When this subject was submitted on a former night, I requested that its consideration should be postponed until this day, in order that the House might have an opportunity of considering the position in which Mr. Roebuck should appear. I am very glad, then, to hear the Honourable Gentleman who has just spoken state his view of ~~this question~~. I am glad to find the Honourable Gentleman concur in the opinion, that objections of a mere formal nature ought not to prevent the House from hearing the agent of the assembly on this important question. I should say, perhaps, that if this measure only partially affected the interests of Lower Canada, or interfered with some incidental points in its government, it might be proper to take the point of form, and to raise the question whether or not we ought to hear Mr. Roebuck in the character of agent. But, on this occasion, I own I am rather disposed to look at the position in which Mr. Roebuck has for some time stood. He states that, having the resolution of the House of Assembly, appointing him agent, he asked permission of the Secretary of State to see him. He does not give the answer which was returned to that application by the Secretary of State; and I do not believe, without making any positive assertion on the subject, that he was ever formally recognised as agent by the Secretary of State. But, at the same time, he was constantly received at the Colonial Office, to represent the affairs of Lower Canada on the part of the House of Assembly. Likewise, in an address of the House of Assembly with respect to the payment of certain contingencies, Mr. Roebuck's salary was included and agreed to by the Government. Such being the state of the case, I think it better, on the whole, that, on an occasion of so great importance, one so vital with respect to the House of Assembly, we should hear Mr. Roebuck in the character which he has assumed, not as agent for the province, — not as the agent appointed by a Bill consented to by the Governor and Legislative Council,—but as agent chosen by the House of Assembly to represent their interests. The Honourable Gentleman who last spoke proposes that we should, instead of this, hear Mr. Roebuck in his individual capacity. Now, I think that would be forming a precedent of much worse consequence than hearing him in his character as the agent of the House of Assembly. In admitting him in the character which he assumes, as agent of the House of Assembly, we only say, "On a question of very great importance, we consent to hear the agent appointed by the House of Assembly, who is paid a salary by them, and has been repeatedly received in this country in that capacity." But if we hear Mr. Roebuck as Mr. Roebuck, in his individual capacity, I think it might hereafter be fairly urged by any person, "I take a very great interest in the affairs of a certain colony, or in a certain Bill, and therefore I request to be heard at the bar of the House in opposition to it." I consider that this would be a worse precedent than the other, and therefore I agree with the motion of the Honourable Member for London. I believe that that Honourable Member has stated quite correctly, the course which it is expedient on such occasions to adopt, and which is this, — that the question should be put for reading the Bill a second time, and agreed to, in order that Mr. Roebuck should be heard; and afterwards that the opinions of the Honourable Member for London, or any other Honourable Member who takes a similar view, should be heard on the motion that the Bill be committed. With the understanding and limitation which I have suggested, I am ready to agree to the present motion.

LORD STANLEY.—If we could concur with the Noble Lord, in acquiescing in the acts of the Government of which he is a member, — I am aware that nothing could be urged against our admitting Mr. Roebuck to appear in his full capacity, as the representative of the House of Assembly. Because, not having the answer of Lord Glenelg, to which the Noble Lord alluded on the former evening (and it is rather singular that the Noble Lord has not taken the trouble to inspect the document, which would enable him to give the required explanation, after the adjournment of this question which has taken place), in which answer there may have been some qualification or reservation as to the character in which he was received at the Colonial Office, we have the admission of the Noble Lord, who says it is true that Mr. Roebuck has been frequently received by the Colonial Secretary as representing the feelings and opinions of the House of Assembly; and, moreover, that her Majesty's present Government have sanctioned a vote of the assembly for the specific purpose of paying him a salary. Therefore, so far as the present Government is concerned, I hold that there is no question — there cannot be the possibility of a question — in their case, whether they recognise the agency of Mr. Roebuck, or not. But I must take the liberty of saying, that this very recognition, on the part of the Government, renders the protest which has been so ably and with such good feeling made by my Honourable Friend the Member for Newark, the more necessary; for I will take upon myself to say that, up to this time, no Government ever admitted the right of one branch of a colonial legislature to appoint an agent permanently resident in this country. I can speak for myself, and for the Noble Lord who preceded me in the direction of colonial affairs (Lord Ripon), — and I make this statement in the presence of a Noble Lord who at that time was Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, and who will be able to contradict me if I am wrong. M. Vigier, at that time, stood in precisely the same situation as Mr. Roebuck does now; and though he was frequently received at the Colonial Office as a person perfectly competent to speak to the affairs of the province, — received just in the same manner as a body of merchants of London would have been, if they wished to make any representation of their views to the colonial department, — yet I can, for my own part, and, I believe, also on the part of Lord Ripon, declare, that the Colonial Office declined to receive that gentleman, or any other, as the authorised and resident agent in this country of the Canadian House of Assembly. Canada is the only colony which has claimed the right of being so represented in England; it is the only colony that, upon a question involving great differences of opinion, has claimed the right of appointing an individual to represent one party, leaving the other wholly unrepresented. In the year 1828, the petition of the colony was, to be allowed to appoint an agent; and the committee recommended, that the colony should be allowed by Bill to appoint an agent. But from that time to this, in consequence of the peculiar circumstances into which the colony has been plunged, the House of Assembly and Legislative Council have never been able to agree as to the individual, because they never could agree as to the principles which were to be represented by the person to be armed with the authority and character of colonial agent. Now, I think it necessary to follow my Honourable Friend the Member for Newark, in the protest which he has made against the recognition of Mr. Roebuck as agent for the House of Assembly, or, rather, to pronounce it particularly well judged and opportune. The Noble Lord opposite appears in all respects to recognise the right of Mr. Roebuck to be heard in the character which he has assumed. If I were to follow my own judgment, and that only, I should have no difficulty in saying that Mr. Roebuck has no right to be heard. But if I were to consult the dictates of my feelings, I should say, " Give Mr. Roebuck every possible latitude."

The difficulty, however, in which I am placed is this, — that I am called on to hear Mr. Roebuck as agent; and that, under circumstances so peculiar as can hardly occur again in the history of the colony. If this were an ordinary transaction, affecting the whole province, and the intentions of the Government had been communicated to the Legislature of the province, then the ordinary and regular course would be for the House of Assembly to appoint an agent to support their petition, signed by persons residing in the colony, and praying to be allowed to be heard by counsel. The difficulty thrown in the way of that proceeding is, that there is neither time nor opportunity for consulting the Assembly. They can have no knowledge of the Bill before it is passed into a law; at any rate, they will have no notice of it before it is read a second time, and its principle confirmed by the House. I have therefore to consider between the difficulty of hearing a gentleman who assumes a situation which cannot be admitted without protest; and that, on the other hand, of debarring a body from being heard through a party who, I am convinced, faithfully represents their views. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Roebuck very accurately represents the feelings of the majority in Lower Canada; and, if the House of Assembly could be convened—(or if a great portion of them could make their appearance in Quebec at all) — I have very little doubt that Mr. Roebuck would be entrusted to appear at the bar with a petition signed on the part of the Canadians, individually and collectively, against the principle of this Bill. That being the case, against my judgment in an ordinary case, but not without a protest against the principle founded on the extraordinary nature of the present proceedings, — upon the knowledge that Mr. Roebuck does represent fairly the opinions of the Assembly, and that they have now no power of appointing a person to convey their opinions to Parliament, and especially on the ground that not a shadow of a pretext should be allowed to the Canadians to say, after we have concluded our legislation on this subject, that they had not a fair opportunity to be heard,—I feel that it would be wrong to refuse my consent to hear Mr. Roebuck (waiving the technical difficulty), not as a matter of course, but protesting against the assumption of the right in which he claims this indulgence.

SIR G. GREY.—Concurring in the conclusion at which the Noble Lord has arrived in the latter part of his speech, I trust I may be permitted to express a hope that the time of the House may not be wasted in the consideration of a question which the Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Peel) has admitted to be one of a very subordinate nature. I agree with the Right Honourable Baronet in thinking that the question raised is a very subordinate one; for I do not believe that any gentleman present,—considering the circumstances of Lower Canada, and the provisions of the Bill which has been brought in for its better regulation,—will object to Mr. Roebuck being heard. But when the Noble Lord (Lord Stanley) assumes that the Government have recognised Mr. Roebuck in a different capacity from that in which M. Vigier was recognised by himself, I must be permitted to dispute the accuracy of that statement. With regard to Mr. Roebuck's salary, it was never recognised as a distinct item by the Government, but was included in a vote of contingencies by the House of Assembly. But the Noble Lord having laid such stress on this point, perhaps I may be excused if I ask him why, as one of the confidential advisers of his late Majesty, he did not tender his humble advice to the Crown, recommending that the claim of M. Vigier for his salary as the agent of the House of Assembly during the time the Noble Lord was himself connected with the Colonial Office, should not be recognised; for I find that the salary of M. Vigier was then voted by the House of Assembly in the contingencies, was paid under a warrant from the Governor, and was afterwards included in a Bill of Supply, receiving the sanction of the House.

LORD STANLEY.—No, there never was a Bill of Supply passed with that object.

SIR G. GREY.—I believe I am so far wrong, and I give the Noble Lord the full benefit of the admission that there was no Supply Bill passed for that specific purpose. But, though the Supply Bill was rejected in 1833, yet the Report of the Committee of 1834 contained the despatch of the Noble Lord, adverting to the grounds on which he thought that assent to the Bill should be withholden; and I have a right to assume that every objection entertained by the Noble Lord to that Bill would be set forth in the despatch. Does it, then, appear, by that despatch, that it was made an objection to the Bill of 1833, that it included the salary of M. Vigier? And if it do not so appear, am I not bound to assume that, if the Bill had been submitted for the Royal Assent, the Noble Lord would not have advised the Crown to withhold its assent on account of its including M. Vigier's salary? I must throw myself upon the indulgence of the House for not having searched, to-day, as I had intended to do, for the answer addressed by Lord Glenelg to Mr. Roebuck, although my firm conviction is, that at no time has Mr. Roebuck been recognised at the Colonial Office in a different character than that in which M. Vigier was recognised by the Noble Lord (Lord Stanley). The resolution of the House of Assembly, appointing Mr. Roebuck its agent, gave that gentleman a claim to the courtesy of a reception at the Colonial Office; and Mr. Roebuck has never been denied an audience, whenever he wished to represent the feelings of the House of Assembly, or to state anything to the head of the department which he considered might be conducive to those interests which had been intrusted to his care. Neither is the door of the Colonial Office shut against any gentleman representing any interest in Lower Canada, and the agent of any commercial interest always finds ready access to Lord Glenelg, who listens to all their statements with that attention which he is bound to give to the observations of individuals who, though they may have no legal title, are yet, in point of fact, known to be the representatives of a great body of people. But when it is charged against the present Government, that they are about to establish an inconvenient precedent, I ask the Honourable Member for Newark why, when the late Member for Shrewsbury brought forward, in the last Parliament, a motion expressly aimed at Mr. Roebuck, having for its object to exclude from Parliament the paid agent of any colony, the Honourable Gentleman did not then rise in his place and state that Mr. Roebuck was the agent of the House of Assembly. At that time, the House of Commons, by admitting the fact, which, by a sort of special pleading, they might have denied, as fully recognised Mr. Roebuck in the character of agent, as has ever been done by the Colonial Office.

I perfectly concur with the Honourable Gentleman, that it is the duty of the House to guard against a precedent which may lead to inconvenience; but I am also fully persuaded that it would neither be politic nor wise to refuse to hear Mr. Roebuck on behalf of the Canadian House of Assembly against this Bill. In this, I believe, all are agreed. This, then, being the general feeling, I think we had better hear the arguments of Mr. Roebuck at once, rather than waste any further time in discussing this point as to what character he shall appear in at the bar. And I, for one, have no fear, after the notice the matter has received, that any inconvenience in the way of precedent will result.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I understood the Honourable Baronet to say, that he was unable to find Lord Glenelg's letter, in consequence of the great confusion that prevailed in the Colonial Office.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no!

Mr. C. BULLER. — Well, the Honourable Baronet has forgot to bring the letter with him to the House; but I ask the Honourable Baronet whether it did not run, as I have reason to believe it did, somewhat in the following terms: — "Sir, seeing that you do not claim to appear here as agent of the province of Lower Canada, but simply as agent of the House of Assembly, I shall be happy to give you the interview you desire"? If such was the answer of Lord Glenelg, and I have reason to believe that it was, it becomes quite clear that Mr. Roebuck has been recognised by the Colonial Office as agent for the House of Assembly; and as it is in that capacity he desires to appear, and as it is the general opinion of the House that in that capacity he should appear, I cannot perceive the object of the present discussion. The only strong dissentient appears to be the Honourable Member for Newark, who is, however, willing to hear Mr. Roebuck in his individual capacity.

Mr. GLADSTONE. — No!

Mr. C. BULLER. — Well, then, if he appears in no capacity at all. This, however, would be establishing a most inconvenient precedent; for if Mr. Roebuck were to be heard on the present occasion, either in his individual capacity or in no capacity at all, there would be nothing to prevent a demand on his part to be heard on every other question the House might discuss. As far as I am concerned, I should, perhaps, have no objection to this, for I would much rather hear Mr. Roebuck speak than many of the Honourable Members of the House. As the Noble Lord (Stanley) has intimated that he does not mean to follow the dictates of his own judgment in this matter, by offering further opposition, I hope the present discussion will now cease.

SIR G. GREY — I stated, distinctly, that I had not made any search for Lord Glenelg's answer to Mr. Roebuck's application for an interview. I have no doubt that, had I searched for it, I should have found it. It is very possible that the answer is in the terms stated by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman; but circumstances of a private nature, over which I had no control, have unexpectedly prevented my attendance at the Colonial Office this day.

Mr. GLADSTONE. — I wish, also, to say one word in explanation. I did not recommend the House to hear Mr. Roebuck in his individual capacity; but I thought that the House might take on itself to do what it has as full a right to do as the House of Assembly, and make Mr. Roebuck an agent for the purpose of giving him a claim to be heard.

Mr. HUME. — Although the precedent appears to be in favour of Mr. Roebuck's being heard after the second reading, when, according to the understanding of Parliament, the principle of a measure is affirmed, I think, on the present occasion, he ought to be called in before the measure is advanced through that stage. As the great point in dispute is the principle of the Bill, Mr. Roebuck ought to be heard before we pledge ourselves to its principle by agreeing to the second reading.

Mr. GROTE.—If my Honourable Friend had attended to what has passed, he would not have thought it necessary to object to the second reading. It is not to be understood that in advancing the Bill through that stage we recognise its principle; the discussion upon which, as has been already stated, will be taken upon the question that this Bill be committed.

Mr. HUME. — I must protest against being committed to the principle of this Bill; and if it is understood that by reading the Bill a second time we in any way stand pledged to its principle, I shall oppose the motion. If, however, Honourable Members will be so obstinate as not to attend to the forms of the House, I can do no more than enter my protest.

The motion was then put, and agreed to.

On the motion of LORD J. RUSSELL, the Order for the second reading of the Lower Canada Government Bill was then read.

House informed that Mr. Roebuck was in attendance. Mr. Roebuck called in.

On the motion of LORD J. RUSSELL, the Bill was read a second time.

Mr. Roebuck then addressed the House as follows: — Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is requisite, at the commencement of my address to the House, that I should establish rather more formally than my petition has done, the precise position in which I wish to appear before you. I hold in my hand, Sir, an attested copy of a resolution of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, appointing me their agent in this country; and if it shall please the House, I will hand in the attested copy of such resolution, to be read by their clerk. I also hold in my hand the letter of the Speaker of the House of Lower Canada, communicating this resolution to me, which letter, inasmuch as it contains some flattering expressions towards myself, I would rather hand to your clerk to read than read it myself. I appear, then, Sir, before you as the authorised agent for the House of Assembly of Lower Canada; and I do so under circumstances so very peculiar, that I hope they will, if all others fail, obtain for me the kind consideration of the House. Old associations may, possibly, induce me to forget, under the excitement of the moment, the unusual situation in which I stand; but as I trust my offences, if any there be, will be trivial, so, I hope, my pardon will be easily obtained. It may so happen that, in my address, I shall be obliged to use some strong expressions; if so, be it recollected that here, at the commencement, I claim the right to do so. I am here to accuse successive Administrations of bad government in the provinces of Canada — I am here to defend, against a Bill of pains and penalties, the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, and so defending them I shall have to accuse her Majesty's present Ministers of high crimes and misdemeanours. And inasmuch as I do not consider her Majesty's present Ministers as any portion of this House, I shall not consider myself bound to use towards them that respectful deference which I feel I owe, and shall at all times be willing to exhibit, towards this House; and in addressing you, Sir, as its representative and head, I shall studiously endeavour, as far as possible, to display the respect which I owe to the assembled Commons of England. This House has now before it two parties to be heard, — the House of Assembly of Lower Canada on the one hand, and her Majesty's Ministers on the other. A Bill of pains and penalties is now on your table — a Bill of pains and penalties against the whole people of Lower Canada, through their assembled representatives. And who suggests that Bill of pains and penalties? Why, Sir, I shall have to show that it is entirely suggested by the guilty parties, as I contend they are, in this transaction — by those who ought to be punished, and not by the House of Assembly. It will be my duty to prove to you, in the course of my address, that every act of the Assembly has been governed by the greatest wisdom; and that they have on all occasions acted on a just, wise, and firm policy; that they have advanced no demands which the interests of their constituents did not require of them to advance; that as they have successfully won for themselves, step by step, their demands, these have been acknowledged to be just, and that at the last, when you are now called on to pass a Bill of pains and penalties against these virtuous representatives of the people, I say you are called on so to do, not in consequence of any fault of theirs, but in consequence of a state of things that has been brought about by the vacillation, the weakness, the imbecility, and by the strange inconsistency of her Majesty's Ministers, and not by the misconduct of the assembled Commons of Lower Canada.

This, Sir, is the position in which I am placed; I have to throw myself before the House as the advocate of the absent — as the advocate of those whom every one seems to feel at liberty to accuse, and to whom every base passion and motive has been applied — as the advocate of those distant parties who are 3000 miles removed from us, and who are struggling amidst vast difficulties for the liberty and rights of their country; and I hope that I shall not plead in vain to the good feeling of an assembled body of my countrymen, when I ask of them to bear with me patiently, while thus, alone, against a host, I defend the absent and the weak against the strong. I endeavour to uphold the cause of those who have no other advocate than the humble individual who now appears before you, and who, by the Bill you have just read a second time, are about to be deprived of that liberty you would not suffer to be wrested from you, and who are about to be placed on a par with the abject and servile inhabitants of Hindostan, instead of being considered, as heretofore, free and popularly represented colonists of Great Britain. But, Sir, it may be said, that while I appear here as the advocate of others, I require a defence for myself. Such things may be insinuated of me out of doors — beyond the walls of this House it may be said that I myself require defence; — but however much such things may be said of me elsewhere — however much the epithets of "traitor" and "rebel" may be showered on me elsewhere, I am sure that in this House I shall not be so accused, because in this House, it is well known, I cannot defend myself. It may be said, also, that in this case I am an interested party — nay, it has been alleged that I am interested in obtaining a separation between the two countries, and in supporting the rebel colony against the imperial domination of the mother country. I, however, entreat Honourable Members to consider the peculiar position in which I stand, and then to ask themselves whether any part of my public conduct justifies such a suspicion. I, Sir, am an Englishman; my whole hopes are centered in this country. It is true I have many dear friends in Canada; and while I have no hopes out of England, I have a great interest in that colony. I have done all that lay in my power to maintain an honourable connection between the two countries. As long as that connection can be maintained with honour, no man in the world will do more to maintain it than I will; but if such a connection cannot be maintained without dishonour to the British name, I shall be the first to do all in my power to put an end to it. But I beg of the House to recollect, that all my interests are in favour of a connection with Canada; and, therefore, let no man dream or think that I rake up rebellion, or that it is my interest to do so.

Now, Sir, to proceed with the matter I have more immediately to address this House upon. I beg to say, and I do so purposely in the outset, that I am here to defend the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, alone. I have nothing to do with any other province — I have nothing to do with any other subject. I am not here to justify revolt: revolt must justify itself. I am not here to justify it under any circumstances. If revolt be successful, it justifies itself; if it be not successful, it must be followed by obloquy. Further than this I can make no distinction, and I know of none. I see rebellious Poland failing, and I do not justify Poland. And let me here observe, I am not one — I never was one — who would consent to pass Acts of Parliament for the support of rebellious rights. I look to Spain — I do not support rebellion there: I never did, and I hope I never shall. I look all round the world — I look to Belgium — and though England may have been bound by the most solemn treaties to maintain the connection between Belgium and Holland, the revolt of Belgium was successful, and therefore I hope and suppose it was rightly commenced. But, Sir, I, for my own part, cannot understand that nice distinction of morality which can feel a sympathy for the rebellious Poles, and can speak of them as if they were heroes, and yet, in almost the same breath, talk in terms of contempt and hatred of the poor peasants of St. Charles. It may suit some parties to say that the rebellion in Brussels was an heroic act, but that it fortunately failed in unfortunate Canada. It may suit some parties to say that they "have called into existence a new world," namely, the rebellious colonies of Spain, and in almost the same moment to pronounce a great abhorrence of rebellious Canada. It may suit some parties to extol to the skies the name of Washington, while they have nothing but calumny and insult to heap on that of Papineau. All this, Sir, is a species of facemaking morality which I cannot understand. I have nothing to do with revolt. All I have to show is, that the House of Assembly of Lower Canada is in no way connected with it. I will show that the parties who are endeavouring to put from their backs the weight of this rebellion, and who are guilty of the shuffling policy that would make men believe that a body of some eighty-seven or eighty-eight men, scattered through a district of between seven and eight hundred miles — that these, and these alone, are the authors of the rebellion that has taken place — that they alone are guilty, because they do acts which of necessity excite great feelings of distrust, and yet do nothing to show that the rebellion shall be fruitless. This, Sir, being placed before you, the parties who are to be tried are her Majesty's Ministers, on the one hand, and the House of Assembly on the other. I am about to prove to you that the House of Assembly is not only not guilty, but deserving of the admiration of their own constituents, this country, and the world, for the magnanimous stand they have made against the overwhelming power of Great Britain. I have to lay before you, Sir, a great number of facts connected with the history of Canada, upon which the House will have to decide whether the House of Assembly has acted properly or not. I shall go through the requisite statements with the view of showing that the Bill on the table is an unjust Bill. I shall then endeavour to show that the House of Assembly is guiltless of all the charges made against them — that the Bill is in every sense an impolitic one; and having done this, I shall endeavour to show that there is a method which, if adopted by this House, may put an end to all disagreements; but if it be decided to continue in the fatal resolution of acceding to the measure on the table, that war, misery, and every description of calamity will be the inevitable consequence — war in Canada, perhaps war over the world; and let not England be too sure that she shall not have war at home, also.

First, Sir, as to the injustice of this Bill. I will separate the history of Lower Canada into four epochs; the first from 1768 to 1810, the second from 1810 to 1828, the third from 1828 to 1834, and the fourth from 1834 to the present period. In the year 1774, by the Act known as the Quebec Act, French Law, with certain reservations, was restored to Lower Canada. Among the reservations to which I allude were, the English criminal law, the system of juries, and certain of the English rules of evidence. Now any lawyer, — and I see many before me, — may readily conceive the curious anomalies which this hotch-potch of legislation was calculated to produce. To a civil code, established on French principles, was tailed a criminal law, founded on those of England. During the war of 1774, it so happened that the English on the continent of North America were in open rebellion. There was a spirit abroad among the English of that country which refused submission to the domination of England. They exclaimed, "We cannot bear it any longer, — you are seeking to force upon us laws and maxims of legislation which are oppressive and tyrannical in their nature, and we will bear your domination no longer." In this emergency, what did we do? Why, we resorted to the French colonists as a counterpoise to the English; and we said to them, "Stand by us, and we will speedily put down the puritanical fanaticism of those fellows." In confirmation of this statement, I beg leave to quote a passage from a speech made by Lord Lyttleton in 1774, and I do so in order to show that there was a direct intention on the part of the Government of that day to create a French feeling in Canada, — a feeling which has since been denounced as mischievous and abominable; but which, nevertheless, was fomented and cherished as long as it suited the convenience of the Government to make use of it. In alluding to the apprehensions which were expressed of the increased power which this would throw into the hands of the French colonists, Lord Lyttleton observed that "he was not apprehensive of these consequences; but that, if British America was determined to resist the lawful power and pre-eminence of Great Britain, he saw no reason why the loyal inhabitants of Canada should not co-operate with the rest of the empire in subduing them, and bringing them back to a right sense of their duty; and he thought it happy that, from their local situation, they might be some check to those fierce fanatic spirits, that, inflamed with the same zeal which animated the roundheads in England, directed that zeal to the same purposes, — to the demolition of regal authority, and to the subversion of all power which they did not themselves possess; that they were composed of the same leaven; and, whilst they pretended to be contending for liberty, they were setting up an absolute independent republic, and that the struggle was not for freedom, but power, which was proved from the whole tenour of their conduct." And now, Sir, to counteract the mischievous spirit that then existed, what did we do? Why, we cherished that very French law against which I now hear persons prate, without understanding it; we cherished French feelings, which I now hear certain persons call mischievous and bad, and we did this in the hope of creating base prejudices in English minds. We did all we could to make the Canadians French at that disastrous period of our history. This is the first instance to which I would call the attention of the House. What is the next? Why, that, in the 18th of George III., when this House and the other House of Parliament, and all England, received a bitter lesson at the hands of rebellious colonists in their humiliating acknowledgment of that demand, which, had they admitted it at the commencement of the dispute, would have retained for them the fairest provinces of North America; but which, denied to the claims of justice, and only admitted to force, stands a record of our eternal shame, and, I fear, will not much redound to the fame of our justice. A declaratory Act was passed, by which it was declared there should be no levying of rates or taxes upon the colonists of Great Britain in North America, without the consent of their Legislature; and, in the year 1791, the solemn pledge was given by the assembled Parliament of England that there should be no levying of taxes, and no appropriation of revenues in Canada, except by the consent of the Canadian Legislature. This was in 1791. In 1794, communications took place between the Governor and the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, with respect to the revenues of the province. Now, I know this is a part of the subject which it may be somewhat difficult to make the House understand. The revenues of the colony were under three distinct heads: First, there were the revenues levied by the provincial Act of Parliament; secondly, the revenues levied by the British Acts of Parliament; and thirdly, there were the revenues raised from casual and territorial sources. The revenues derived from the provincial Acts of Parliament, it will not be denied, are under the control of the House of Assembly; but I am also about to lay claim to the revenues arising from the British Acts of Parliament, and also to the casual and territorial revenues. To these, I contend, the House of Assembly is entitled by the arrangement entered into by the then Governor, Lord Dorchester, who said to the House of Assembly, "If you will transmute the revenues which are raised by the British Acts of Parliament into a Civil List, to be raised by an Act of the Canadian Assembly, we will give up our complete control of the whole." This was in 1794: but the Royal Assent was not given to the Canada Bill at that time. It was given in 1796; and the pledge so solemnly given in 1794, by the Government of this country to the House of Assembly, was not redeemed till the 1st and 2d of William IV. passed; and I have been told in this House that it was a boon,—that it was something remarkably liberal on the part of the present liberal Government to redeem the pledge, —that the Government had done much more for Canada than Canada had any right to expect; and, therefore, that all that has been done by the House of Assembly had evinced baseness and ingratitude. No, Sir; it is England that has been unjust,—it is England that has broken faith; and, having done so, we are now doing nothing more than endeavouring to take advantage of our own wrong. I hope the House will excuse me for reading the correspondence to which I have alluded. It is exceedingly painful to myself, and I suppose cannot but be tedious to the House. The passage in Lord Dorchester's message to which I would now refer is this:—

> The Governor has given directions for laying before the House of Assembly an account of the provincial revenue of the Crown from the commencement of the new constitution to the 10th of January, 1794. First, the casual and territorial revenue established prior to the conquest, which his Majesty has been most graciously pleased to order to be applied towards defraying the civil expenses of the province.

I hope there will be some attempt to show the injustice of the demand of the House of Assembly to those revenues thus solemnly given up by the Governor, Lord Dorchester. I want to know wherein the injustice consists, and why the House of Assembly is to be assailed with every epithet which ingenuity can suggest for demanding control over the casual and territorial revenues. But, in the second place, Lord Dorchester further stated, that the duties levied on articles imported into Canada, and the revenue arising from the licences granted for the sale of spirits, would be given up as soon as the Assembly should have passed laws providing for the support of the civil government. There are various duties imposed by provincial Acts for the pay of officers of the provinces, and for other purposes. The message then goes on to state, that an account of all the monies taken out of the pockets of the Canadian people should be laid before the Assembly, with an account of the disbursements, together with the amount of the diminution of the colonial revenues by the expenses of collection; and that every circumstance of this very important part of their business and duties ought to be constantly before their eyes, so that, at the very outset of their constitution, they might guard those important branches of it from that corruption and abuse which had brought misery upon almost every nation. Now, was not this information, on the part of the then Governor, who, being himself an Englishman, was accustomed to a representative government, to persons who were not so accustomed,—was not this information, I repeat, sufficient to induce the House of Assembly to direct their attention and to keep it fixed upon the appropriation of the immense collections of the revenues of the province; and did it not contain solemn pledges on the part of the Government to give up the whole of the revenues of that province to the control of the House of Assembly? The House will see why I urge this topic so strongly: it is one of vital importance to my case; it is that control which the House of Assembly has claimed up to the present hour, and for the claiming of which they are now about to be punished by the Imperial Parliament.
